"Entitles you to become a canon of Strabough doublets—But you do not seem in a very cheerful mood for taking orders. All I meant to say was that you and Lady Pen were not used to be on such a good footing."

"Well, she sent me a card for her blow-out," said Mowbray; "and so I am resolved to go. When I have been there half an hour, I will ride up to Shaws-Castle, and you shall hear of my good working for you to-morrow morning."

CHAPTER XXXIV.

A TEA-PARTY.

Let fall the curtains, wheel the sofa round;
And while the babbling and loud-tongued
Whisperers up a stringy business, and the eyes
That show but not embrace, start on each other, Thus let us witness peaceful evening in Cowper's Tea.

The approach of the cold and rainy season had now so far thinned the company at the Well, that in order to secure the necessary degree of warmth upon her tea-nights, Lady Penelope was obliged to employ some coaxing towards those whom she had considered as much under par in society. Even the Doctor and Mrs. Blower were graciously called upon—for their marriage was now an arranged affair; and the event was of a nature likely to spread the reputation of the Spa among wealthy widows, and medical gentlemen of more skill than practice. So in they came, the Doctor smiling, gallanting, and performing all the bustling parade of settled and arranged courtship, with much of the grace wherewith a turkey-cock goes through its same ceremony. Old Touchwood had also attended her ladyship's summons, chiefly, it may be supposed, from his restless fidgety disposition, which often suffered him to remain absent even from those places of resort to which he usually professed his devotion. There was, besides, Mr. Winterblossom, who, in his usual spirit of quaquaversalism and self-indulgence, was under the fire of a volley of compliments to Lady

The rest of the company were also in as usual. MacTurk himself was present, nding that he thought it an egregious ot water, to bestow it upon compounding re saving punch. He had of late asso- self a good deal with the traveller; not that y means resembled each other in temper s, but rather because there was that degree e betwixt them which furnished perpetual dispute and discussion. They were not he present occasion, ere they lighted on rce of controversy.

of you, and forgot to take it up when you come back again."

"Py Cot! and I can tell you, sir," said the Cap- tain, elevating at once his voice and his nostrils, and snuffing the air with a truculent and indignant visage, "that I will not permit you or any man to throw any such scandal on my character.—I thank Cot, I can bring good witness that I am as good a Christian as another, for a poor sinner, as the best of us are; and I am ready to justify my religion with my sword—Cot tann!—Compare my own self with a parcel of black heathen bodies and natives, that were never in the inner side of a kirk whilst they lived, but go about worshipping stocks and stones, and swinging them- selves upon bamboos, like peasts, as they are!"

An indignant growling in his throat, which sounded like the acquiescence of his inward man in the indig- nant proposition which his external organs thus ex- pressed, concluded this haughty speech, which, how- ever, made not the least impression on Touchwood, who cared as little for angry tones and looks as he did for fine speeches. So that it is likely a quarrel between the Christian preceptor and the peacemaker might have occurred for the amusement of the com- pany, had not the attention of both, but particularly that of Touchwood, been diverted from the topic of debate by the entrance of Lord Etherington and Mowbray.

The former was, as usual, all grace, smiles, and gentleness. Yet, contrary to his wonted custom, which usually was, after a few general compliments, to attach himself particularly to Lady Binks, the Earl, on the present occasion, avoided the side of the room on which that beautiful but sullen idol held her sta- tion, and attached himself exclusively to Lady Pene- lope Penfeather, enduring, without flinching, the strange variety of conceited barardage, which that lady's natural parts and acquired information enabled her to pour forth with unparalleled profusion.

An honest heathen, one of Plutarch's heroes, if I mistake not, dreamed once upon a night, that the figure of Proserpina, whom he had long worshipped, visited his slumbers with an angry and vindictive countenance, and menaced him with vengeance, in resentment of his having neglected her altars, with the usual fickleness of a polytheist, for those of some more fashionable divinity. Not that goddess of the infernal regions herself could assume a more haughty or more displeased countenance than that with which Lady Binks looked from time to time upon Lord Etherington, as if to warn him of the consequence of this departure from the allegiance which the young Earl had hitherto manifested towards her, and which seemed now, she knew not why, unless it were for the purpose of public insult, to be transferred to her rival. Perilous as her eye-glances were, and much as they menaced, Lord Etherington felt at this moment the importance of soothing Lady Penelope to silence on the subject of the invalid's confession of that morn- ing, to be more pressing than that of appeasing the indignation of Lady Binks. The former was a case of the most urgent necessity—the latter, if he was at all anxious on the subject, might, he perhaps thought, be trusted to time. Had the ladies continued on a tolerable footing together, he might have endeavoured to conciliate both. But the bitterness of their long-suppressed feud had greatly increased, now that it was probable the end of the season was to separate them, in all likelihood for ever; so that Lady Pene- lope had no longer any motive for countenancing Lady Binks, or the lady of Sir Bingo for desiring Lady Penelope's countenance. The wealth and lavish ex- pense of the one was no longer to render more illus- trious the suit of her right honourable friend, nor was the society of Lady Penelope likely to be soon again useful or necessary to Lady Binks. So that neither were any longer desirous to suppress symptoms of the mutual contempt and dislike which they had long nourished for each other; and whoever should, in this decisive hour, take part with one, had little hence- forward to expect from her rival. What farther and more private reasons Lady Binks might have to re- sent the defection of Lord Etherington, have never come with certainty to our knowledge; but it was could there had been high words between them on the floating report that his lordship's visits to Shew-Castle were dictated by the wish to find a bride there.

Women's wits are said to be quick in spying the covert means of avenging a real or supposed slight. After biting her pretty lips, and revolving in her mind the readiest means of vengeance, Jane threw in her way young Mowbray of St. Ronan's. She looked at him, and endeavoured to fix his attention with a nod and gracious smile, such as in an ordinary mood would have instantly drawn him to her side. On replying in answer only a vacant glance and a bow, she was led to observe him more attentively and was induced to believe, from his wavering look, varying complexion, and unsteady step, that he had been drinking unusually deep. Still his eye was less that of an intoxicated than of a disturbed and desperate man, one whose faculties were engrossed by deep and turbid reflection, which withdrew him from the passing scene.

"Do you observe how ill Mr. Mowbray looks?" said she, in a loud whisper; "I hope he has not heard what Lady Penelope was just now saying of his family?"

"Unless he hears it from you, my lady," answered Mr. Touchwood, who, upon Mowbray's entrance, had broken off his discourse with MacTurk, "I think there is little chance of his learning it from any other person."

"What is the matter?" said Mowbray, sharply, addressing Chatterly and Winterblossom; but the one glared nervously from the question, protesting he indeed had not been precisely attending to what had been passing among the ladies, and Winterblossom bowed out of the scrape with quiet and cautious politeness—"he really had not given particular attention to what was passing—I was negotiating with Mrs. Jones for an additional lump of sugar to my coffee—Egad, it was so difficult a piece of diplomacy," he added, sinking his voice, "that I have an idea her ladyship calculates the West India produce by grains and pennyweights."

The maidens, if designed to make Mowbray amiable, were far from succeeding. He stepped forward, with more than usual stiffness in his air, which was never entirely free from self-consequence, and said to Lady Binka, "May I request to know of your ladyship what particular respecting my family had the honour to engage the attention of the company?"

"I was only a listener, Mr. Mowbray," returned Lady Binka, with evident enjoyment of the rising indignation which she read in his countenance; "not being queen of the night, I am not at all disposed to be gossamer for the turn of the conversation."

Mowbray in no honour to bear jeering, yet afraid to expose himself by farther inquiry in a company so public, darted a fierce look at Lady Penelope, then in close conversation with Lord Eberington, advanced a step or two towards them, then, as if checking himself, turned on his heel, and left the room. A few minutes afterwards, and when certain satirical nods and winks were circulating among the assembly, a waiter slid a piece of paper into Mrs. Jones's hand, who, on looking at the contents, seemed about to leave the room.

"Jones—Jones!" exclaimed Lady Penelope, in surprise and displeasure.

"Only the key of the tea-caddy, your ladyship," answered Jones. "I will be back in an instant."

"Jones—Jones!" again exclaimed her mistress, "here is enough" of tea, she would have said, but Lord Eberington was so near her, that she was ashamed to complete the sentence, and had only hope in Jones's quickness of apprehension, and the prospect that she would be unable to find the key which she went in search of.

Jones, mean while, slipped off to a sort of housekeeper's apartment, of which she was locum tenens for the evening, for the more ready supply of whatever might be wanted on Lady Penelope's night, as it was called. Here she found Mr. Mowbray of St. Ronan's, whom she instantly began to scold with, "La! now, Mr. Mowbray, you are such another gentleman—I am sure you will make me lose my place —I'll swear you will—what can you have to say, that you could not as well put off for an hour?"

"I want to know Jones," answered Mowbray, in a different tone, perhaps, from what the damsel expected. "What your lady was just now saying about my family?"

"Pshaw!—was that all?" answered Mrs. Jones. "What should she be saying?—nonsense—What minds what she says?—I am sure I never do for one."

"Nay but, my dear Jones," said Mowbray, "I insist upon knowing—I must know, and I will know."

"La! Mr. Mowbray, why should I make mischief?—As I live, I hear some one coming! and if you are found speaking with me here—indeed, indeed, some one is coming."

"The devil may come, if he will!" said Mowbray, "but we do not part, pretty mistress, till you tell me what I wish to know."

"Lord, sir, you frighten me!" answered Jones, "but all the room hears it as well as I—it was about Miss Mowbray—and that my lady would be shy of her company hereafter—for that she was—she was—"

"For that my sister was what?" said Mowbray, fiercely seizing her arm.

"Lord, sir, you terrify me!" said Jones, beginning to cry, "at any rate, it was not I that said it—it was Lady Penelope."

"And what was it the old, oddier-wogged mad-woman dared to say of Clara Mowbray?—Speak or plainly, and directly or by Heaven, I'll make you!"

"Hold, sir—hold, for God's sake! you will break my arm," answered the terrified handmaiden. "I am sure I know no harm of Miss Mowbray; only my lady spoke as if she was no better than she ought to be—Lord, sir, there is some one listening at the door!"—and making a spring out of his grasp, she hastened back to the room in which the company were assembled.

Mowbray stood petrified at the news he had heard, ignorant alike what could be the motive for a calumny so atrocious, and uncertain what he were best to do to put a stop to the scandal. To his farther confusion, he was presently convinced of the truth of Mr. Jones's belief that they had been watched, for, as he went to the door of the apartment, he was met by Mr. Touchwood.

"What has brought you here, sir?" said Mowbray sternly.

"Home, little," answered the traveller, "why has come you here, if you go to that, square?—Egad, Lady Penelope is trembling for her touchings, so I just cut a step here to save her ladyship the trouble of looking after Mrs. Jones in person, which, I think, might have been a worse interruption than mine, Mr. Mowbray."

"Pshaw, sir, you talk nonsense," said Mowbray; "the tea-room is so infernally hot, that I had no time here a moment to draw breath, when the young women came in."

"And you are going to run away, now the old gentleman is come in?" said Touchwood—"Come, sir, I am more your friend than you may think."

"Sir, you are intrusive—I want nothing that you can give me," said Mowbray.

"That is a mistake," answered the senior; "for I can supply you with what most young men want—money and wisdom."

"You will do well to keep both till they are wanted," said Mowbray.

"Why, as I would, equiva, only that I have taken something of a fancy for your family; and they are supposed to have wanted cash and good counsel for two generations, if not for three."

"Sir," said Mowbray, angrily, "you are too old either to play the buffoon, or to get business's payment."

"Which is his monkey's allowance, I suppose," said the traveller, "more lacks than halpence.—Well—at least I am not young enough to quarrel with boys for bullying. I'll convince you, however, Mr. Mowbray, that I know some more of your affairs than what you give me credit for."

"It may be," answered Mowbray, "but you will oblige me more by mauling your own."

"Very like; mean time, your losses to-night to my Lord Etherington are no trifle, and no secret neither."

"Mr. Touchwood, I desire to know where you had your information?" said Mowbray.

"A matter of very little consequence compared to its truth or falsehood, Mr. Mowbray," answered the old gentleman.

"But of the last importance to me, sir," said Mowbray. "In a word, had you such information by or through means of Lord Etherington?—Answer me this single question, and then I shall know better what to think on the subject."

"Upon my honour," said Touchwood, "I neither had my information from Lord Etherington directly nor indirectly. I say thus much to give you satisfaction, and I now expect you will hear me with patience."

"Forgive me, sir," interrupted Mowbray, "one farther question. I understand something was said in disparagement of my sister just as I entered the tea-room?"

"Hem—hem—hem!" said Touchwood, hesitating. "I am sorry your ears have served you so well—something there was said lightly, something that can be easily explained, I dare say;—And now, Mr. Mowbray, let me speak a few serious words with you."

"And now, Mr. Touchwood, we have no more to say to each other—good evening to you."

He brushed past the old man, who in vain endeavoured to stop him, and hurrying to the stable, demanded his horse. It was ready saddled, and waited his orders; but even the short time that was necessary to bring it to the door of the stable was exasperating to Mowbray's impatience. Not less exasperating was the constant interceding voice of Touchwood, who, in tones alternately plaintive and snappish, kept on a string of expostulations.

"Mr. Mowbray, only five words with you—Mr. Mowbray, you will repent this—Is this a night to ride in, Mr. Mowbray?—My stars, sir, if you would but have five minutes' patience!"

Curses, not loud but deep, muttered in the throat of the impatient laird, were the only reply, until his horse was brought out, when, staying no farther question, he sprung into the saddle. The poor horse paid for the delay, which could not be laid to his charge. Mowbray struck him hard with his spurs so soon as he was in his seat—the noble animal reared, bolted, and sprung forward like a deer, over stock and stone, the nearest road—and we are aware it was a rough one—to Shaws-Castle. There is a sort of instinct by which horses perceive the humour of their riders, and are furious and impetuous, or dull and sluggish, as if to correspond with it; and Mowbray's gallant steed seemed on this occasion to feel all the stings of his master's internal ferment, although not again urged with the spur. The ostler stood listening to the clash of the hoofs, succeeding each other in thick and close gallop until they died away in the distant woodland.

"If St. Ronan's reach home this night, with his neck unbroken," muttered the fellow, "the devil must have it in keeping."

"Mercy on us!" said the traveller, "he rides like a Bedouin Arab! but in the desert there are neither trees to cross the road, nor cleughs, nor linns, nor floods, nor fords. Well, I must set to work myself, or this gear will get worse than even I can mend.—Here you, ostler, let me have your best pair of horses instantly to Shaws-Castle."

"To Shaws-Castle, sir?" said the man with some surprise.

"Yes—do you not know such a place?"

"In troth, sir, sae few company go there, except at the great ball day, that we have had time to forget the road to it—but St. Ronan's was here even now, sir."

"Ay, what of that?—he has ridden on to get supper ready—so, turn out without loss of time."

"At your pleasure, sir," said the fellow, and called to the postilion accordingly.

CHAPTER XXXV.

Sedet post equitem atra cura—

Still though the headlong cavalier,
O'er rough and smooth, in wild career,
Seems racing with the wind;
His sad companion,—ghastly pale,
And darksome as a widow's veil,
Care—keeps her seat behind.—HORACE.

WELL was it that night for Mowbray, that he had always piqued himself on his horses, and that the animal on which he was then mounted was as sure-footed and sagacious as he was mettled and fiery. For those who observed next day the print of the hoofs on the broken and rugged track through which the creature had been driven at full speed by his furious master, might easily see, that in more than a dozen of places the horse and rider had been within a few inches of destruction. One bough of a gnarled and stunted oak-tree, which stretched across the road, seemed in particular to have opposed an almost fatal barrier to the horseman's career. In striking his head against this impediment, the force of the blow had been broken in some measure by a high-crowned hat, yet the violence of the shock was sufficient to shiver the branch to pieces. Fortunately it was already decayed; but, even in that state, it was subject of astonishment to every one that no fatal damage had been sustained in so formidable an encounter. Mowbray himself was unconscious of the accident.

Scarcely aware that he had been riding at an unusual rate, scarce sensible that he had ridden faster perhaps than ever he followed the hounds, Mowbray alighted at his stable door, and flung the bridle to his groom, who held up his hands in astonishment when he beheld the condition of the favourite horse; but, concluding that his master must be intoxicated, he prudently forbore to make any observations.

No sooner did the unfortunate traveller suspend that rapid motion by which he seemed to wish to annihilate, as far as possible, time and space, in order to reach the place he had now attained, than it seemed to him as if he would have given the world that seas and deserts had lain between him and the house of his fathers, as well as that only sister with whom he was now about to have a decisive interview.

"But the place and the hour are arrived," he said, biting his lip with anguish; "this explanation must be decisive; and whatever evils may attend it, suspense must be ended now, at once and for ever."

He entered the Castle, and took the light from the old domestic, who, hearing the clatter of his horse's feet, had opened the door to receive him.

"Is my sister in her parlour?" he asked, but in so hollow a voice, that the old man only answered the question by another, "Was his honour well?"

"Quite well, Patrick—never better in my life," said Mowbray; and turning his back on the old man, as if to prevent his observing whether his countenance and his words corresponded, he pursued his way to his sister's apartment. The sound of his step upon the passage roused Clara from a reverie, perhaps a sad one; and she had trimmed her lamp, and stirred her fire, so slow did he walk, before he at length entered her apartment.

"You are a good boy brother," she said, "to come thus early home; and I have some good news for your reward. The groom has fetched back Trimmer—He was lying by the dead hare, and he had chased him as far as Drumlyford—the shepherd had carried him to the shieling, till some one should claim him."

"I would he had hanged him, with a! my heart!" said Mowbray.

"How!—hang Trimmer?—your favourite Trimmer, that has beat the whole country?—and it was only this morning you were half-crying because he was a-missing, and like to murder man and mother's son?"

"The better I like any living thing," answered Mowbray, "the more reason I have for wishing it dead and at rest; for neither I, nor any thing that I love, will ever be happy more."

"You cannot frighten me, John, with these fables," answered Clara, trembling, although she endeavoured to look unconcerned—"You have used me so often so often."

"It is well for you then; you will be roused without the shock of surprise."

"So much the better—We have been," said Clara,

"so miserably in your father's sight,
The thoughts can't give us little light."

She sat with honest Robert Burns."

"D—n Burns and his trash!" said Mowbray, with the impetuosity of a man determined to be angry with every thing but himself, who was the real source of the evil.

"And why damn poor Burns?" said Clara compassionately; "it is not his fault if you have not risen a wretch, for that, I suppose, is the cause of all this wretchedness."

"Would it not make any one less patient," said Mowbray, "to hear her quoting the rhapsodies of a drunken peasant, who, as a man is speaking of the downfall of an ancient house, your ploughman, I suppose, becoming one degree poorer than he was born in, would only go without his dinner or without his usual portion of ale. His comrades would cry 'your fellow' and let him eat out of their kit, and drink out of their bucket without scruple, till his own was full again. But the poor gentleman, the down-fallen man of rank—the degraded man of birth—the disabled and disarmed man of power?—it is he that is to be pitied, who loses not rarely drink and dinner, but honour, situation, credit, character, and name itself!"

"You are declaiming in this manner in order to terrify me," said Clara; "but, friend John, I know you and your ways, and I have made up my mind upon all contingencies that can take place. I will tell you more—I have stood on this tottering pinnacle of rank and fashion, if our situation can be termed such, till my head is dizzy with the instability of my eminence, and I feel that strange desire of tossing myself down, which the devil is said to put into folk's heads when they stand on the top of steeples—at least, I had rather the plunge were over."

"Be satisfied, then, if that will satisfy you—the plunge is over and we are—what they used to call in Scotland—gentle beggars—creatures to whom our second, and third, and fourth, and fifth cousins may, if they please, give a place at the table, and a seat in the carriage with the lady's maid, if driving back words will not make us sick."

"They may give it to those who will take it," said Clara; "but I am determined to eat bread of my own buying—I can do twenty things, and I am sure some one or other of them will bring me all the little money I will need. I have been trying, John, for several months, how little I can live upon, and you would laugh if you heard how low I have brought the account."

"There is a difference, Clara, between fanciful experiments and real poverty—the one is a masquerade, which we can end when we please, the other is wretchedness for life."

"Mechinika, brother," replied Miss Mowbray, "it would be better for you to set me an example how to carry my good resolutions into effect, than to ridicule them."

"Why, what would you have me do?" said he, fiercely—"turn postilion, or rough-rider, or whipper-in?—I don't know any thing else that my education, as I have used it, has fitted me for—and then some of my old acquaintances would, I dare say, give me a grown to drink now and then for old acquaintance' sake."

"This is not the way, John, that men of sense think or speak of serious misfortune," answered his sister; "and I do not believe that this is so serious as it is your pleasure to make it."

"Believe the very worst you can think," replied he, "and you will not believe bad enough!—You have neither a gun, nor a house, nor a friend;—poor but a day, and it is a chance that you will not have a brother."

"My dear John, you have drunk hard—rest him!"

"You—such things deserved to be carried away, especially to a young lady who receives them so well," answered Mowbray bitterly. "I suppose, now, it will make no impression, if I were to tell you that you have it in your power to stop all this rattle?"

"By consummating my own, I suppose?—Indeed, I said you could not make me tremble, but you have found a way to do it."

"What, you expect I am again to urge you with Lord Esherington's authority?—That might have moved all, indeed—but that day of grace is over."

"I am glad of it, with all my spirit," said Clara; "may it take with it all that we can quarrel about!—But all this instant I thought it was for this very point that this long voyage was bound, and that you were endeavouring to persuade me of the reality of the danger of the storm, in order to reconcile me to its harbour."

"You are mad, I think, in earnest," said Mowbray, "can you really be so absurd as to suppose that you have no way left to relieve yourself and me from our wretchedness?"

"From shame, brother?" said Clara. "No doubt in honest poverty, I hope."

"That is according as folks have used their property, Clara—I must speak to the point—There is strange reports going below—By Heaven! they are enough to disturb the ashes of the dead! Were I to mention them, I should expect our poor mother to enter the room—Clara Mowbray, can you guess what I mean?"

It was with the utmost exertion, yet in a faint voice, that she was able, after an interminable pause, to utter the monosyllable, "No!"

"By Heaven! I am ashamed—I am even afraid to express my own meaning!—Clara, what is that which makes you so obstinately reject every prospect of marriage?—Is it that you feel yourself worthy to be the wife of an honest man?—Speak on!—Dr. Feme has been busy with your reputation—quit out!—Give me the right to cross their own throats of the inventors, and when I go among them to-morrow, I shall know how to treat those who are reflections on you! The fortunes of our house are ruined, but no longer shall slander its honour—Speak, wretched girl! why are you silent?"

"Stay at home, brother," said Clara, "say a home, if you regard our house's honour—wonder you not mend money—Stay at home, and let them talk of me as they will—they can scarcely say worse of me than I deserve."

The passions of Mowbray, at all times ungovernably strong, were at present inflamed by rage, by his rapid journey, and the previously disturbed state of his mind. He set his teeth, clenched his hands, looked on the ground, as one that forms some late resolution, and muttered almost unintelligibly, "I was charity to kill her!"

"Oh! no—no—no!" exclaimed the terrified girl, throwing herself at his feet; "Do not kill me, brother! I have wished for death—thought of death—yearned for death—but, oh! it is frightful to think that he is near—Oh! not a bloody death, brother, nor by your hand!"

She held him close by the knees as she spoke, and expressed in her looks and accents, the utmost terror. It was not, indeed, without reason; for the entire anatomy of the place, the violent and inflamed passion of her brother, and the desperate circumstances in which he had reduced himself, seemed all to conspire to render some horrid act of violence not an impossible continuation of this strange interview.

Mowbray folded his arms, without unclenching his hands, or raising his head, while his sister crouched on the floor, clasping him round the knees with her strength, and begging piteously for her life and her money.

"Fool!" he said, at last, "let me go!—Who cares for thy worthless life?—who cares if thou live or die? Live, if thou canst—and be the hate and scorn of every one else, as much as thou art mine!"

He grasped her by the shoulder, with one hand, pushed her from him, and, as she arose from the floor, and again pressed to throw her arms around his neck, he repulsed her with his arm and hand, with a push—or blow—it might be termed either one or the other,—violent enough in her weak state, to have again extended her on the ground, had not a chair received her as she fell. He looked at her with ferocity, grappled a moment in his pocket; then ran to the window, and throwing the sash violently up, thrust himself as far as he could without falling, into the open air. Terrified, and yet her feelings of his unkindness predominating even above her fears, Clara continued to exclaim,

"Oh, brother, say you did not mean this!—Oh, say you did not mean to strike me!—Oh, whatever I have deserved, be not you the executioner! It is not manly—it is not natural—there are but two of us in the world!"

He returned no answer; and, observing that he continued to stretch himself from the window, which was in the second story of the building, and overlooked the court, a new cause of apprehension mingled, in some measure, with her personal fears. Trembling, and with streaming eyes and uplifted hands, she approached her angry brother, and fearfully, yet firmly, seized the skirt of his coat, as if anxious to preserve him from the effects of that despair, which so lately seemed turned against her, and now against himself.

He felt the pressure of her hold, and drawing himself angrily back, asked her sternly what she wanted.

"Nothing," she said, quitting her hold of his coat; "but what—what did he look after so anxiously?"

"After the devil!" he answered, fiercely; then rawing in his head, and taking her hand, "By my soul, Clara—it is true, if ever there was truth in such tale!—He stood by me just now, and urged me to murder thee!—What else could have put my hunting-knife into my thought?—Ay, by God, and into my very hand—at such a moment?—Yonder I could almost fancy I see him fly, the wood, and the rock, and the water, gleaming back the dark-red furnace-light, that is shed on them by his dragon wings! By my soul, I can hardly suppose it fancy—I can hardly think but that I was under the influence of an evil spirit—under an act of fiendish possession! But one as he is, gone let him be—and thou, too ready complement of evil, be thou gone after him!" He drew from his pocket his right hand, which had all this time held his hunting-knife, and threw the implement into the court-yard as he spoke; then with a sad quietness and solemnity of manner, shut the window, and led his sister by the hand to her usual seat, which her tottering steps scarce enabled her to reach. "Clara," he said, after a pause of mournful silence, "we must think what is to be done, without passion or violence—there may be something for us at the dice yet, if we do not throw away our game. A blot is never a blot till it is hit—dishonour concealed, is not dishonour in some respects.—Dost thou attend to me, wretched girl?" he said, suddenly and sternly raising his voice.

"Yes, brother—yes, indeed, brother!" she hastily replied, terrified even by delay again to awaken his atrocious and ungovernable temper.

"Thus it must be, then," he said. "You must marry this Etherington—there is no help for it, Clara—You cannot complain of what your own vice and folly have rendered inevitable."

"But, brother!"—said the trembling girl.

"Be silent. I know all that you would say. You love him not, you would say. I love him not, no more than you. Nay, what is more, he loves you not; if he did, I might scruple to give you to him, you being such as you have owned yourself. But you shall wed him out of hate, Clara—or for the interest of your family—or for what reason you will—But wed him you shall and must."

"Brother—dearest brother—one single word!"

"Not of refusal or expostulation—that time is gone by," said her stern censor. "When I believed thee that I thought thee this morning, I might advise thee, but I could not compel. But, since the honour of our family has been disgraced by your means, it is but just, that, if possible, its disgrace should be hidden; and it shall!—ay, if selling you for a slave would tend to conceal it!"

"You do worse—you do worse by me! A slave in an open market may be bought by a kind master—you do not give me that chance—you wed me to one who!"

"Fear him not, nor the worst that he can do, Clara," said her brother. "I know on what terms he marries; and being once more your brother, as your obedience in this matter will make me, he had better tear his flesh from his bones with his own teeth, than do thee any displeasure! By Heaven, I hate him so much—for he has outreached me every way—that methinks it is some consolation that he will not receive in thee the excellent creature I thought thee!—Fallon as thou art, thou art still too good for him."

Encouraged by the more gentle and almost affectionate tone in which her brother spoke, Clara could not help saying, although almost in a whisper, "I trust it will not be so—I trust he will consider his own condition, honour, and happiness, better than to share it with me."

"Let him utter such a scruple if he dares," said Mowbray—"But he dares not hesitate—he knows that the instant he recedes from addressing you, he signs his own death-warrant or mine, or perhaps that of both; and his views, too, are of a kind that will not be relinquished on a point of scrupulous delicacy merely. Therefore, Clara, nourish no such thought in your heart as that there is the least possibility of your escaping this marriage! The match is booked—Swear you will not hesitate."

"I will not," she said, almost breathlessly, terrified lest he was about to start once more into the fit of unbridled fury which had before seized on him.

"Do not even whisper or hint an objection, but submit to your fate, for it is inevitable."

"I will—submit"—answered Clara, in the same trembling accent.

"And I," he said, "will spare you—at least at present—and it may be for ever—all inquiry into the guilt which you have confessed. Rumours there were of misconduct, which reached my ears even in England; but who could have believed them that looked on you daily, and witnessed your late course of life? On this subject I will be at present silent—perhaps may not again touch on it—that is, if you do nothing to thwart my pleasure, or to avoid the fate which circumstances render unavoidable. And now it is late—retire, Clara, to your bed—think on what I have said as what necessity has determined, and not my selfish pleasure."

He held out his hand, and she placed, but not without reluctant terror, her trembling palm in his. In this manner, and with a sort of mournful solemnity, as if they had been in attendance upon a funeral, he handed his sister through a gallery hung with old family pictures, at the end of which was Clara's bed-chamber. The moon, which at this moment looked out through a huge volume of mustering clouds that had long been boding storm, fell on the two last descendants of that ancient family, as they glided hand in hand, more like the ghosts of the deceased than like living persons, through the hall and amongst the portraits of their forefathers. The same thoughts were in the breast of both, but neither attempted to say, while they cast a flitting glance on the pallid and decayed representations, "How little did these anticipate this catastrophe of their house!" At the door of the bedroom Mowbray quitted his sister's hand, and said, "Clara, you should to-night thank God, that saved you from a great danger, and me from a deadly sin."

"I will," she answered—"I will." And, as if her terror had been anew excited by this allusion to what had passed, she bid her brother hastily good night, and was no sooner within her apartment, than he heard her turn the key in the lock, and draw two bolts besides.

"I understand you, Clara," muttered Mowbray between his teeth, as he heard one bar drawn after another. "But if you could earth yourself under Ben Nevis, you could not escape what fate has destined for you.—Yes!" he said to himself, as he walked with slow and moody pace through the moonlight gallery, uncertain whether to return to the parlour, or to retire to his solitary chamber, when his attention was roused by a noise in the court-yard.

The night was not indeed very far advanced, but it had been so long since Shaws-Castle received a guest, that had Mowbray not heard the rolling of wheels in the court yard, he might have thought rather of house-breakers than of visitors. But as the sound of a carriage and horses was distinctly heard, it instantly occurred to him, that the guest must be Lord Etherington, come, even at this late hour, to speak with him on the reports which were current to his mother's prejudice, and perhaps to declare his address to her were at an end. Eager to know the worst, and to bring matters to a decision, he re-entered the apartment he had just left, where the lights were still burning, and, calling loudly to Patrick, whom he heard in communing with the postilion, commanded him to show the visitor to Miss Mowbray's parlour. It was not the light step of the young nobleman which came tramping, or rather stamping, through the long passage, and up the two or three steps at the end of it. Neither was it Lord Etherington's graceful figure which was seen when the door opened, but the stout square substance of Mr. Peregrine Touchwood.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

A RELATIVE.

Claimed kinship there, and had his claims allowed.
Darius's Village.

STANDING at the unexpected and undesired appointment which presented itself in the manner described at the end of the last chapter, Mowbray yet felt, at the same time, a kind of relief, that his meeting with Lord Etherington, painfully deferred as that meeting must be, was for a time suspended. No it was with a mixture of perviousness and internal satisfaction, that he demanded what had procured him the honour of a visit from Mr. Touchwood at this late hour.

"Necessity, that makes the old wife trot," replied Touchwood; "no choice of mine, I assure you.—God, Mr. Mowbray, I would rather have crooned Saint Gothard, than run the risk I have done to-night, rumbling through your breakneck roads in this old wheildarrow.—On my word, I believe I must be troublesome to your butler for a draught of something. I am as thirsty as a coal-heaver that is working by the pore. You have porter, I suppose, or good old Scotch two-penny?"

With a secret excretion on his visitor's effrontery Mr. Mowbray ordered the servant to put down wine and water of which Touchwood mixed a gobletful, and drank it off.

"We are a small family," said his entertainer; "and I am seldom at home—still more seldom receive guests, when I chance to be here—I am sorry I have no malt liquor, if you prefer it."

"Prefer it?" said Touchwood, compounding, however, another glass of sherry and water, and adding a large piece of sugar to correct the heartiness which, he observed, his night journey might bring on.—"to be sure I prefer it, and so does every body except Frenchmen and dandies.—No offence, Mr. Mowbray, but you should order a hogsherd from Mass.—the brown stout, used down for exportation to the colonies, keeps for any length of time, and in every climate—I have drunk it where it must have cost a guinea a quart, if interest had been counted."

"When I expect the honour of a visit from you, Mr. Touchwood, I will endeavour to be better provided," answered Mowbray; "at present your arrival has been without notice, and I would be glad to know if it has any particular object."

"This is what I call coming to the point," said Mr. Touchwood, thrusting out his stout legs, accoutred as they were with the ancient defence, called bone-hose, so as to rest his heels upon the fender.—"Upon my life, the fire turns the best flower in the garden at this season of the year—I'll take the freedom to throw on a log—Is it not a strange thing, by the-by, that one never sees a fogot in Scotland? You have much small wood, Mr. Mowbray, I wonder you do not get some fellow from the midland counties, to teach your people how to make a fogot."

"Did you come all the way to Shaws-Castle," asked Mowbray, rather civilly, "to instruct me in the mystery of fogot-making?"

"Not exactly—not exactly," answered the undaunted Touchwood; "but there is a right and a wrong way in every thing—a word by the way, on any useful subject, can never fall amiss.—As for my immediate and more pressing business, I can assure you, that it is of a nature sufficiently urgent, and I bring me to a house in which I am much obliged to find myself."

"The surprise is mutual, sir," said Mowbray, gravely, observing that his guest made a pause; "it is full time you should explain it."

"Well, then," replied Touchwood; "I must first ask you whether you have never heard of a certain old gentleman, called Scrooge, who took it into his head, poor man, to be ashamed of the name he bore, though owned by many honest and respectable men, and chose to join it to your cousin of Mowbray, as having a more chivalrous sound, and, in a word, a gentlemanlike twang."

"I have heard of such a person, though only faintly," said Mowbray. "Reginald Scrooge Mowbray is his name. I have reason to consider his alliance with my family as undoubted, though you seem to mention it with a sneer, or I believe Mr. S. Mowbray regulated his family settlements very much upon the idea that his heir was to intermarry with an heiress."

"True, true, Mr. Mowbray," answered Touchwood; "and certainly it is not your business to lay the axe to the root of the genealogical tree, that is like to bear golden apples for you.—Ha?"

"Well, well, sir—proceed—proceed," answered Mowbray.

"You may also have heard that this old gentleman had a son, who would willingly have cut up his family tree into fogots; who thought Scrooge sounded as well as Mowbray, and had no fancy for an imaginary gentility which was to be attained by the change of one's natural name, and the discounting of one's actual relations."

"I think I have heard from Lord Etherington," answered Mowbray, "to whose communion I owe most of my knowledge about these Scrooge people, that old Mr. Scrooge Mowbray was unfortunate in a son, who thwarted his father on every occasion,—would embrace no opportunity which fortunate chances held out, of raising and distinguishing the family,—had unbridled low tastes, wandering habits, and singular objects of pursuit,—on account of which his father disinherited him."

"It is very true, Mr. Mowbray," proceeded Touchwood, "that this person did happen to fall under his father's displeasure because he scorned farms as humdrum,—loved better to make money as an honest merchant, than to throw it away as an idle gentleman,—never called a coach when walking or he would serve the turn,—and liked the Royal Exchange better than St. James's Park. In short, his father disinherited him, because he had the qualities of doubling the estate, rather than those for squandering it."

"All this may be quite correct, Mr. Touchwood," replied Mowbray; "but pray, what has this Mr. Scrooge, junior, to do with you or me?"

"Do with you or me?" said Touchwood, as if surprised at the question; "he has a great deal to do with me at least, since I am the very man myself."

"The devil you are!" said Mowbray, opening his eyes in turn, "Why, Mr. A—a—your name is Touchwood—P. Touchwood—Paul, I suppose, or Peter—I read it so in the subscription book at the Well."

"Peregrine, sir, Peregrine—my mother would have me so christened, because Peregrine Parkle came at during her confinement; and my poor father had acquired, because he thought it genteel, and derived from the Willoughbys. I don't like it, and I always write P. short, and you might have guessed so also before the surname—I was at present P. S. Touchwood. I had an old acquaintance in the city, who loved his jest—He always called me P. script Touchwood."

"Then, sir," said Mowbray, "if you are really Mr. Scrogie, tout court, I must suppose the name of Touchwood is assumed?"

"What the devil!" replied Mr. P. S. Touchwood, "do you suppose there is no name in the English nation will couple up legitimately with my paternal name of Scrogie, except your own, Mr. Mowbray?—I assure you I got the name of Touchwood, and a pretty spell of money along with it, from an old godfather, who admired my spirit in sticking by commerce."

"Well, sir, every one has his taste—Many would have thought it better to enjoy a hereditary estate, by keeping your father's name of Mowbray, than to have gained another by assuming a stranger's name of Touchwood."

"Who told you Mr. Touchwood was a stranger to me?" said the traveller; "for aught I know, he had a better title to the duties of a son from me, than the poor old man who made such a fool of himself, by trying to turn gentleman in his old age. He was my grandfather's partner in the great firm of Touchwood, Scrogie, and Co.—Let me tell you there is as good inheritance in house as in field—a man's partners are his fathers and brothers, and a head clerk may be likened to a kind of first cousin."

"I meant no offence whatever, Mr. Touchwood Scrogie."

"Scrogie Touchwood, if you please," said the senior; "the scrog branch first, for it must become rotten ere it become touchwood—ha, ha, ha!—you take me."

"A singular old fellow this," said Mowbray to himself, "and speaks in all the dignity of dollars; but I will be civil to him, till I can see what he is driving at.—You are facetious Mr. Touchwood," he proceeded aloud. "I was only going to say, that although you set no value upon your connexion with my family, yet I cannot forget that such a circumstance exists; and therefore I bid you heartily welcome to Shaws-Castle."

"Thank ye, thank ye, Mr. Mowbray—I knew you would see the thing right. To tell you the truth, I should not have cared much to come a-begging for your acquaintance and cousinship, and so forth; but that I thought you would be more tractable in your adversity, than was your father in his prosperity."

"Did you know my father, sir?" said Mowbray.

"Ay, ay—I came once down here, and was introduced to him—saw your sister and you when you were children—had thoughts of making my will then, and should have clapped you both in before I set out to double Cape Horn. But, gad I wish my poor father had seen the reception I got! I did not let the old gentleman, Mr. Mowbray of St. Ronan's that was then, smoke my money-bags—that might have made him more tractable—not but that we went on indifferent well for a day or two, till I got a hint that my room was wanted, for that the Duke of Devil-knows-what was expected, and my bed was to serve his valet-de-chambre.—'Oh, damn all gentle cousins!' said I, and off I set on the pad round the world aguin, and thought no more of the Mowbrays till a year or so ago."

"And, pray, what recalled us to your recollection?"

"Why," said Touchwood, "I was settled for some time at Smyrna, (for I turn the penny go where I will—I have done a little business even since I came here;)—but being at Smyrna as I said, I became acquainted with Francis Tyrrel."

"The natural brother of Lord Etherington," said Mowbray.

"Ay, so called," answered Touchwood; "but by and by he is more likely to prove the Earl of Etherington himself, and t'other fine fellow the bastard."

"The devil he is!—You surprise me, Mr. Touchwood."

"I thought I should—I thought I should—Faith, I am sometimes surprised myself at the turn things take in this world. But the thing is not the less certain—the proofs are lying in the strong chest of our house at London, deposited there by the old Earl, who repented of his roguery to Miss Marigny long before he died, but had not courage enough to do his legitimate son justice till the sexton had housed him."

"Good Heaven, sir!" said Mowbray; "and did you know all this while, that I was about to bestow the only sister of my house upon an impostor?"

"What was my business with that, Mr. Mowbray?" replied Touchwood; "you would have been very angry had any one suspected you of not being sharp enough to look out for yourself and your sister both. Besides, Lord Etherington, bad enough as he may be in other respects, was, till very lately, no impostor, or an innocent one, for he only occupied the situation in which his father had placed him. And, indeed, when I understood, upon coming to England, that he was gone down here, and, as I conjectured, to pay his addresses to your sister, to say truth, I did not see he could do better. Here was a poor fellow that was about to cease to be a lord and a wealthy man; was it not very reasonable that he should make the most of his dignity while he had it? and if, by marrying a pretty girl while in possession of his title, he could get possession of the good estate of Nettlewood, why, I could see nothing in it but a very pretty way of breaking his fall."

"Very pretty for him, indeed, and very convenient too," said Mowbray; "but pray, sir, what was to become of the honour of my family?"

"Why, what was the honour of your family to me?" said Touchwood; "unless it was to recommend your family to my care, that I was disinherited on account of it. And if this Etherington, or Bulmer, had been a good fellow, I would have seen all the Mowbrays that ever wore broad cloth at Jericho, before I had interfered."

"I am really much indebted to your kindness," said Mowbray angrily.

"More than you are aware of," answered Touchwood; "for, though I thought this Bulmer, even when declared illegitimate, might be a reasonable good match for your sister, considering the estate which was to accompany the union of their hands; yet, now I have discovered him to be a scoundrel—every way a scoundrel—I would not wish any decent girl to marry him, were they to get all Yorkshire, instead of Nettlewood. So I have come to put you right."

The strangeness of the news which Touchwood so bluntly communicated, made Mowbray's head turn round like that of a man who grows dizzy at finding himself on the verge of a precipice. Touchwood observed his consternation, which he willingly construed into an acknowledgement of his own brilliant genius.

"Take a glass of wine, Mr. Mowbray," he said, complacently; "take a glass of old sherry—nothing like it for clearing the ideas—and do not be afraid of me, though I come thus suddenly upon you with such surprising tidings—you will find me a plain, simple, ordinary man, that have my faults and my blunders like other people. I acknowledge that much travel and experience have made me sometimes play the busybody, because I find I can do things better than other people, and I love to see folk stare—it's a way I have got. But, after all, I am un bon diable, as the Frenchman says; and here I have come four or five hundred miles to lie quiet among you all, and put all your little matters to rights, just when you think they are most desperate."

"I thank you for your good intentions," said Mowbray; "but I must needs say, that they would have been more effectual had you been less cunning in my behalf, and frankly told me what you knew of Lord Etherington; as it is, the matter has gone fearfully far. I have promised him my sister—I have laid myself under personal obligations to him—and there are other reasons why I fear I must keep my word to this man, earl or no earl."

"What!" exclaimed Touchwood, "would you give up your sister to a worthless rascal, who is capable of robbing the post-office, and of murdering his brother, because you have lost a trifle of money to him? Are you to let him go off triumphantly, because he is a gamester as well as a cheat?—You are a pretty fellow, Mr. Mowbray of St. Ronan's—you are one of the happy sheep that go out for wool, and come home shorn. Egad, you think yourself a millstone, and turn out a sack of grain—You flew abroad a hawk, and have come home a pigeon—You snarled at the Philistines, and they have drawn your eye-teeth with a vengeance!"

"This is all very witty, Mr. Touchwood," replied Mowbray; "but wit will not pay this man Etherington, or whatever he is, so many hundreds as I have lost to him."

"Why, then, wealth must do what wit cannot," said old Touchwood; "I must advance for you, that is all. Look ye, sir, I do not go afoot for nothing—if I have laboured, I have reaped—and, like the fellow in the old play, 'I have enough, and can maintain my humour'—it is not a few hundreds, or thousands either, can stand betwixt old P. S. Touchwood and his purpose; and my present purpose is to make you, Mr. Mowbray of St. Ronan's a free man of the forest.—You still look grave on it, young man?—Why, I trust you are not such an ass as to think your dignity offended, because the plebeian Scrogie comes to the assistance of the terribly great and old house of Mowbray?"

"I am indeed not such a fool," answered Mowbray, with his eyes still bent on the ground, "to reject assistance that comes to me like a rope to a drowning man—but there is a circumstance"—he stopped short and drank a glass of wine—"a circumstance to which it is most painful to me to allude—but you seem my friend—and I cannot intimate to you more strongly my belief in your professions of regard than by saying, that the language held by Lady Penelope Pensfeather on my sister's account, renders it highly proper that she were settled in life; and I cannot but fear, that the breaking off the affair with this man might be of great prejudice to her at this moment. They will have Nettlewood, and they may live separate—he has offered to make settlements to that effect, even on the very day of marriage. Her condition as a married woman will put her above scandal, and above necessity, from which, I am sorry to say, I cannot hope long to preserve her."

"For shame!—for shame!—for shame!" said Touchwood, accumulating his words thicker than usual on each other; "would you sell your own flesh and blood to a man like this Bulmer, whose character is now laid before you, merely because a disappointed old maid speaks scandal of her? A fine veneration you pay to the honoured name of Mowbray! If my poor, old, simple father had known what the owners of these two grand syllables could have stooped to do for merely ensuring subsistence, he would have thought as little of the noble Mowbrays as of the humble Scrogies. And, I dare say, the young lady is just such another—eager to get married—no matter to whom."

"Excuse me, Mr. Touchwood," answered Mowbray; "my sister entertains sentiments so very different from what you ascribe to her, that she and I parted on the most unpleasant terms, in consequence of my pressing this man's suit upon her. God knows, that I only did so, because I saw no other outlet from this most unpleasant dilemma. But, since you are willing to interfere, sir, and aid me to disentangle these complicated matters, which have, I own, been made worse by my own rashness, I am ready to throw the matter completely into your hands, just as if you were my father arisen from the dead. Nevertheless, I must needs express my surprise at the extent of your intelligence in these affairs."

"You speak very sensibly, young man," said the traveller; "and as for my intelligence, I have for some time known the finesses of this Master Bulmer as perfectly as if I had been at his elbow when he was playing all his dog's tricks with this family. You would hardly suspect now," he continued, in a confidential tone, "that what you were so desirous a while ago should take place, has in some sense actually happened, and that the marriage ceremony has really passed betwixt your sister and this pretended Lord Etherington?"

"Have a care, sir!" said Mowbray, fiercely; "do not abuse my candour—this is no place, time, or subject, for impertinent jesting."

"As I live by bread, I am serious," said Touchwood; "Mr. Cargill performed the ceremony; and there are two living witnesses who heard them say the words, 'I, Clara, take you, Francis,' or whatever the Scottish church puts in place of that mystical formula."

"It is impossible," said Mowbray; "Cargill dare not have done such a thing—a clandestine proceeding, such as you speak of, would have cost him his living. I'll bet my soul against a horse-shoe, it is all an imposition; and you come to disturb me, sir, amid my family distress, with legends that have no more truth in them than the Alkoran."

"There are some true things in the Alkoran (or rather, the Koran, for the Al is merely the article prefixed,) but let that pass—I will raise your wonder higher before I am done. It is very true, that your sister was indeed joined in marriage with this same Bulmer, that calls himself by the title of Etherington; but it is just as true, that the marriage is not worth a maravedi, for she believed him at the time to be another person—to be, in a word, Francis Tyrrel, who is actually what the other pretends to be, a nobleman of fortune."

"I cannot understand one word of all this," said Mowbray. "I must to my sister instantly, and demand of her if there be any real foundation for these wonderful averments."

"Do not go," said Touchwood, detaining him, "you shall have a full explanation from me; and to comfort you under your perplexity, I can assure you that Cargill's consent to celebrate the nuptials was only obtained by an aspersion thrown on your sister's character, which induced him to believe that speedy marriage would be the sole means of saving her reputation; and I am convinced in my own mind it is only the revival of this report which has furnished the foundation of Lady Penelope's chattering."

"If I could think so,"—said Mowbray, "I could but think this is truth—and it seems to explain in some degree, my sister's mysterious conduct—if I could but think it true, I should fall down and worship you as an angel from heaven!"

"A proper sort of angel," said Touchwood, looking modestly down on his short, sturdy supporter—"Did you ever hear of an angel in boot-horn? Or, do you suppose angels are sent to wait on broken-down horse-jockeys?"

"Call me what you will, Mr. Touchwood," said the young man, "only make out your story true, and my sister innocent!"

"Very well spoken, sir," answered the senior; "very well spoken! But then I understand, you are to be guided by my prudence and experience! None of your G—dammie doings, sir—your dubs or your drubbings. Let me manage the affair for you, and I will bring you through with a flying sail."

"Sir, I must feel as a gentleman,"—said Mowbray.

"Feel as a fool," said Touchwood, "for that is the true case. Nothing would please this Bulmer better than to fight through his rogueries—he knows very well, that he who can slit a pistol-ball edge of a penknife, will always preserve some edge of reputation amidst his scoundrelism—but take care to stop that hole. Sit down—he is of sense, and listen to the whole of this story."

Mowbray sat down accordingly; and Touchwood, in his own way, and with many characteristic interjections, gave him an account of his early loves of Clara and Tyrrel—of the correspondence, in hopes that his brother would encourage a clandestine marriage, altogether ruin him—of the change which took place in his views when he perceived the importance of the old Earl to the union of Miss Mowbray with his apparent heir—of the desperate stratagem which he endeavoured to play off, by substituting himself in the room of his brother—and all the consequences which it is unnecessary to resume here, as they are

d, sir, that since you were so kind as to interest yourself in affairs so intimately concerning my family, you had been pleased to act with a little more openness towards me. Here have I been for weeks the intimate of a damned scoundrel, whose throat I ought to have cut for his scandalous conduct to my sister. Here have I been rendering her and myself miserable, and getting myself cheated every night by a swindler, whom you, if it had been your pleasure, could have unmasked by a single word. I do all justice to your intentions, sir; but, upon my soul, I cannot help wishing you had conducted your- self with more frankness and less mystery; and I am truly afraid your love of dexterity has been too much for your ingenuity, and that you have suffered matters to run into such a skain of confusion, as you yourself will find difficulty in unravelling."

Touchwood smiled, and shook his head in all the conscious pride of superior understanding. "Young man," he said, "when you have seen a little of the world, and especially beyond the bounds of this nar- row island, you will find much more art and dex- terity necessary in conducting these businesses to an issue, than occurs to a blind John Bull, or a raw Scotchman. You will be then no stranger to the policy of life, which deals in mining and countermin- ing,—now in making feints, now in thrusting with forthright passes. I look upon you, Mr. Mowbray, as a young man spoiled by staying at home, and keeping bad company; and will make it my business, if you submit yourself to my guidance, to inform your understanding, so as to retrieve your estate.—Don't— don't answer me, sir! because I know too well, by experience, how young men answer on these subjects—they are conceited, sir, as conceited as if they had been in all the four quarters of the world. I hate to be answered, sir, I hate it. And, to tell you the truth, it is because Tyrrel has a fancy of answering me, that I rather make you my confidant on this occasion, than him. I would have had him throw himself into my arms, and under my directions; but he hesitated—he hesitated, Mr. Mowbray—and I despise hesita- tion. If he thinks he has wit enough to manage his own matters, let him try it—let him try it. Not but I will do all that I can for him, in fitting time and place; but I will let him dwell in his perplexities and uncertainties for a little while longer. And so, Mr. Mowbray, you see what sort of an odd fellow I am, and you can satisfy me at once whether you mean to come into my measures—only speak out at once, sir, for I abhor hesitation."

While Touchwood thus spoke, Mowbray was form- ing his resolution internally. He was not so inex- periented as the senior supposed; at least, he could plainly see that he had to do with an obstinate, capri- cious old man, who, with the best intentions in the world, chose to have every thing in his own way; and, like most petty politicians, was disposed to throw intrigue and mystery over matters which had much better be prosecuted boldly and openly. But he perceived at the same time, that Touchwood, as a sort of relation, wealthy, childless, and disposed to become his friend, was a person to be conciliated, the rather that the traveller himself had frankly own- ed that it was Francis Tyrrel's want of deference towards him, which had forfeited, or at least abated, his favour. Mowbray recollected also, that the cir- cumstances under which he himself stood, did not permit him to trifle with returning gleams of good fortune. Subduing, therefore, the haughtiness of temper proper to him as an only son and heir, he an- swered respectfully, that, in his condition, the advice and assistance of Mr. Scrogie Touchwood were too important, not to be purchased at the price of sub- mitting his own judgment to that of an experienced and sagacious friend.

"Well said, Mr. Mowbray," replied the senior, "well said. Let me once have the management of your affairs, and we will brush them up for you with- out loss of time.—I must be obliged to you for a bed for the night, however—it is as dark as a wolf's mouth; and if you will give orders to keep the poor devil of a postilion, and his horses too, why, I will be the more obliged to you."

swore the call, and was much surprised, when the old gentleman, taking the word out of his entertainer's mouth, desired a bed to be got ready, with a little fire in the grate; "for I take it, friend," he went on, "you have not guests here very often.—And see that my sheets be not damp, and bid the housemaid take care not to make the bed upon an exact level, but let it slope from the pillow to the footposts, at a declivity of about eighteen inches.—And hark ye—get me a jug of barley-water, to place by my bedside, with the squeeze of a lemon—or stay, you will make it as sour as Beelzebub—bring the lemon on a saucer, and I will mix it myself."

Patrick listened like one of sense forlorn, his head turning like a mandarin, alternately from the speaker to his master, as if to ask the latter whether this was all reality. The instant that Touchwood stopped, Mowbray added his fiat.

"Let every thing be done to make Mr. Touchwood comfortable, in the way he wishes."

"Aweel, sir," said Patrick, "I shall tell Mally, to be sure, and we maun do our best, and—but it's unco late!"

"And, therefore," said Touchwood, "the sooner we get to bed the better, my old friend. I, for one, must be stirring early—I have business of life and death—it concerns you too, Mr. Mowbray—but no more of that till to-morrow.—And let the lad put up his horses, and get him a bed somewhere."

Patrick here thought he had gotten upon firm ground for resistance, for which, displeased with the dictatorial manner of the stranger, he felt considerably inclined.

"Ye may catch us at that, if ye can," said Patrick; "there's nae post cattle come into our stables—What do we ken, but that they may be glandered, as the groom says?"

"We must take the risk to-night, Patrick," said Mowbray, reluctantly enough—"unless Mr. Touchwood will permit the horses to come back early next morning?"

"Not I, indeed," said Touchwood; "safe bind safe find—it may be once away and aye away, and we shall have enough to do to-morrow morning. Moreover, the poor carrion are tired, and the merciful man is merciful to his beast—and, in a word, if the horses go back to St. Ronan's Well to-night, I go there for company."

It often happens, owing, I suppose, to the perversity of human nature, that subserviency in trifles is more difficult to a proud mind, than compliance in matters of more importance. Mowbray, like other young gentlemen of his class, was finically rigid in his stable discipline, and even Lord Etherington's horses had not been admitted into that sanctum sanctorum, into which he now saw himself obliged to induct two wretched post-hacks. But he submitted with the best grace he could; and Patrick, while he left their presence, with lifted-up hands and eyes to execute the orders he had received, could scarcely help thinking that the old man must be the devil in disguise, since he could thus suddenly control his fiery master, even in the points which he had hitherto seemed to consider as of most vital importance.

"The Lord in his mercy haud a grip of this pair family! for I, that was born in it, am like to see the end of it." Thus ejaculated Patrick.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

THE WANDERER.

"Tis a naughty night to swim in.—King Lear."

THERE was a wild uncertainty about Mowbray's ideas, after he started from a feverish sleep on the morning succeeding this memorable interview, that his sister, whom he really loved as much as he was capable of loving any thing, had dishonoured him and her name; and the horrid recollection of their last interview was the first idea which his waking imagination was thrilled with. Then came Touchwood's tale of exculpation—and he persuaded himself, or strove to do so, that Clara must have understood the charge he had brought against her as referring to her attachment to Tyrrel, and its fatal consequences. Again, still he doubted how that could be—still feared that there must be more behind than her reluctance to confess the fraud which had been practised on her by Bulmer; and then, again, he strengthened himself in the first and more pleasing opinion, by recollecting that, averse as she was to espouse the person he proposed to her, it must have appeared to her the completion of ruin, if he, Mowbray, should obtain knowledge of the clandestine marriage.

"Yes—O yes," he said to himself, "she would think that this story would render me more eager in the rascal's interest, as the best way of hushing up such a discreditable affair—faith, and she would have judged right too; for, had he actually been Lord Etherington, I do not see what else she could have done. But, not being Lord Etherington, and an anointed scoundrel into the bargain, I will content myself with cudgelling him to death so soon as I can get out of the guardianship of this old, meddling, obstinate, self-willed, busybody.—Then, what is to be done for Clara?—This mock marriage was a mere bubble, and both parties must draw stakes. She likes this grave Don, who proves to be the stick of the right tree, after all—so do not I, though there be something lordlike about him. I was sure a strolling painter could not have carried it off so. She may marry him, I suppose, if the law is not against it—then she has the earldom, and the Oaklands, and Nettlewood, all at once.—Gad, we should come in winners, after all—and, I dare say, this old boy Touchwood is as rich as a Jew—worth a hundred thousand at least—He is too peremptory to be cut up for sixpence under a hundred thousand.—And he talks of putting me to rights—I must not wince—must stand still to be curried a little—Only, I wish the law may permit Clara's being married to this other earl.—A woman cannot marry two brothers, that is certain:—but then, if she is not married to the one of them in good and lawful form, there can be no bar to her marrying the other, I should think—I hope the lawyers will talk no nonsense about it—I hope Clara will have no foolish scruples.—But, by my word, the first thing I have to hope is, that the thing is true, for it comes through but a suspicious channel. I'll away to Clara instantly—get the truth out of her—and consider what is to be done."

Thus partly thought and partly spoke the young Laird of St. Ronan's, hastily dressing himself, in order to inquire into the strange chaos of events which perplexed his imagination.

When he came down to the parlour where they had supped last night, and where breakfast was prepared this morning, he sent for a girl who acted as his sister's immediate attendant, and asked, "if Miss Mowbray was yet stirring?"

The girl answered, "she had not rung her bell." "It is past her usual hour," said Mowbray, "but she was disturbed last night. Go, Martha, tell her to get up instantly—say I have excellent good news for her—or, if her head aches, I will come and tell them to her before she rises—go like lightning."

Martha went, and returned in a minute or two. "I cannot make my mistress hear, sir, knock as loud as I will. I wish," she added, with that love of evil presage which is common in the lower ranks, "that Miss Clara may be well, for I never knew her sleep so sound."

Mowbray jumped from the chair into which he had thrown himself, ran through the gallery, and knocked smartly at his sister's door; there was no answer. "Clara, dear Clara!—Answer me but one word—but you are well. I frightened you last night—I had been drinking wine—I was violent—forgive me!—Come, do not be sulky—speak but a single word—say but you are well."

He made the pauses longer between every branch of his address, knocked sharper and louder, listened more anxiously for an answer; at length he attempted to open the door, but found it locked, or otherwise secured. "Does Miss Mowbray always lock her door?" he asked the girl.

"Never knew her to do it before, sir; she leaves that I may call her, and open the window—ad too good reason for precaution last night, her brother, and then remembered having er bar the door. "Clara," he continued, greatly agitated, "be silly; if you will not open the door, I see it, that's all; for how can I tell but that sick, and unable to answer?—if you are only say so.—She returns no answer," he said, to the domestic, who was now joined by

ood. Mowbray's anxiety was so great, that it prevented any notice of his guest, and he proceeded without regarding his presence. "What is to?—she may be sick—she may be asleep—she e swooned; if I force the door, it may terrify ath in the present weak state of her nerves.— ar Clara! do but speak a single word, and I remain in your own room as long as you was no answer. Miss Mowbray's maid, too much fluttered and alarmed to have essence of mind, now recollected a back-stair communicated with her mistress's room from en, and suggested she might have gone out out," said Mowbray, in great anxiety, and at the heavy fog, or rather small rain, which he November morning,—"Gone out, and in like this!—But we may get into her room back-stair."

ing, and leaving his guest to follow or remain ought proper, he flew rather than walked to en, and found the private door which led into he bottom of the back-stair above mentioned, e open. Full of vague, but fearful apprehen- rushed up to the door of his sister's apart- hich opened from her dressing-room to the place of the stair; it was ajar, and that mminated betwixt the bedroom and dres- n was half open. "Clara, Clara!" exclaimed y, invoking her name rather in an agony of sion, than as any longer hoping for a reply. apprehension was but too prophetic.

Mowbray was not in that apartment; and, order in which it was found, it was plain she ter undressed on the preceding night, nor oc- ie bed. Mowbray struck his forehead in an remorse and fear. "I have terrified her to e said; "she has fled into the woods, and there!"

the influence of this apprehension. Mowbray, other hasty glance around the apartment, as re himself that Clara was not there, rushed o the dressing-room, almost overturning the who, in civility, had not ventured to enter apartment. "You are as mad as a Hama- d the traveller; "let us consult together, and e I can contrive."

l—a your contrivance!" said Mowbray, for- ll proposed respect in his natural impatience, ed by his alarm; "if you had behaved straight- and like a man of common sense, this would happened!"

forgive you, young man, if your reflections st," said the traveller, putting the hold he had Mowbray's coat; "and God forgive me too, e done wrong while endeavouring to do for !—But may not Miss Mowbray have gone the Well? I will order my horses, and set ntly."

lo," said Mowbray, recklessly; "I thank you, you;" and hastily traversing the garden, and to get rid at once of his visitor and his own he took the shortest road to a little postern- ick led into the extensive copsewood, through rt of which Clara had caused a walk to be little summer-house built of rough shingles, with creeping shrubs.

wbray hastened through the garden, he met man by whom it was kept, a native of the untry, and an old dependent on the family.

* A fool is so termed in Turkey.

"Have you seen my sister?" said Mowbray, hurrying his words on each other with the eagerness of terror.

"What's your wull, St. Ronan's?" answered the old man, at once dull of hearing, and slow of apprehension.

"Have you seen Miss Clara?" shouted Mowbray, and muttered an oath or two at the gardener's stupidity.

"In troth have I," replied the gardener, deliberately; "what suld ail me to see Miss Clara, St. Ronan's?"

"When, and where?" eagerly demanded the querist.

"Ou, just yeestreen, after tey-time—afore ye cam hame yourself galloping sae fast," said old Joseph.

"I ain as stupid as he, to put off my time in speak- ing to such an old cabbage-stock!" said Mowbray, and hastened on to the postern-gate already men- tioned, leading from the garden into what was usually called Miss Clara's walk. Two or three domestics, whispering to each other, and with countenances that showed grief, fear, and suspicion, followed their mas- ter, desirous to be employed, yet afraid to force their services on the fiery young man.

At the little postern he found some trace of her he sought. The pass-key of Clara was left in the lock. It was then plain that she must have passed that way; but at what hour, or for what purpose, Mowbray dared not conjecture. The path, after running a quarter of a mile or more through an open grove of oaks and sycamores, attained the verge of the large brook, and became there steep and rocky, difficult to the infirm, and alarming to the nervous; often approaching the brink of a precipitous ledge of rock, which in this place overhung the stream, in some places brawling and foaming in hasty current, and in others seeming to slumber in deep and circular eddies. The tempta- tions which this dangerous scene must have offered an excited and desperate spirit, came on Mowbray like the blight of the Simoom, and he stood a moment to gather breath and overcome these horrible antici- pations, ere he was able to proceed. His attendants felt the same apprehension. "Puir thing—puir thing! —O, God send she may not have been left to hersell! —God send she may have been upholden!" were whispered by Patrick to the maidens, and by them to each other.

At this moment the old gardener was heard behind them, shouting, "Master—St. Ronan's—Master—I have fund—I have fund!"

"Have you found my sister?" exclaimed the brother, with breathless anxiety.

The old man did not answer till he came up, and then, with his usual slowness of delivery, he replied to his master's repeated inquiries, "Na, I haena fund Miss Clara, but I hae fund something ye wad be was to lose—your brow hunting-knife."

He put the implement into the hand of its owner, who, recollecting the circumstances under which he had flung it from him last night, and the now too probable circumstances of that interview, bestowed on it a deep imprecation, and again hurled it from him into the brook. The domestics looked at each other, and recollecting each at the same time that the knife was a favourite tool of their master, who was rather careless in such articles, had little doubt that the thing was affected, in a temporary way at least, by a transient on the master's account. He saw their confused and doubtful looks, and assuming as much confidence and presence of mind as he could command, directed Maria and her female com- panions to follow and search the walk on the other side of St. Ronan's Gate, and finally ordered Patrick to ride to the well, and to be ready to assist in a conference that he was far from anticipating. "Tha can, Miss Mowbray, come from some of our long walks." He further ordered the groom and horses to get ready to start at the Clattering Bells, so called from a noise made when they were turned by the brook, above which was stretched a small foot-bridge of planks. Having thus evaded all his attendants, he proceeded himself, with a, the eyes he was capable of exerting, to follow out the path in which he was present engaged, which, being a favourite walk of his master, she might perhaps have adopted from held, when in a state of mind, which, he had too much reason to fear, must have put choice out of the question.

He now reached the summer-house, which was merely a seat covered overhead and on the sides, open in front, and now by passed with peddlars. This little house was perched, like a hawk's nest, almost upon the edge of a precipitous crag, the highest point of the line of rock which we have noticed, and had been situated by poor Clara, on account of the prospect which it commanded down the valley. One of her gloves lay on the small rustic table in the summer-house. Mowbray caught it rapidly up. It was dried and withered—the preceding day had been dry, so that had she fastened it there in the morning, or in the course of the day, it could not have been in that state. She had certainly been there during the night, when it rained heavily.

Mowbray thus assured that Clara had been in the place, while her passions and fears were so much agitated as they must have been at her flight from her father's house—cast a hurried and hurried glance from the brow of the precipice into the deep stream that rushed below. It seemed to him that, in the golden hour of the water he heard the last groans of his sister—the foam fishes caught her eye, as if they were a part of her garments. But a chance coming soon showed that there was no appearance of such a catastrophe. Descending the path on the other side of the tower he observed a foot print in a place where the clay was moist and unbroken, which, from the small size and the shape of the shoe, appeared to him must be a trace of her whom he sought. He hurried forward, therefore, with as much speed as yet permitted him to look out bravely for smaller indications, of which it seemed to him he remarked several, although less perfect than the last, being much obliterated by the quantity of rain that had since fallen—a circumstance serving to prove that several hours had elapsed since the person had passed.

At length, through the various turnings and windings of a long and rugged path, Mowbray found himself, without having received any satisfactory intelligence, by the side of the brook, called St. Ronan's Burn, at the place where it was crossed by foot passengers, by the Clattering Box, and by horsemen through a low little bridge. At this point the fugitive might have either continued her wanderings through her paternal woods by a path which after winding about a mile, returned to Shaws-Castle, or she might have crossed the bridge and entered a broken horse-way common to the public, leading to the Ashmole of St. Ronan's.

Mowbray after a moment's consideration, concluded that the last was by most probable option. He mounted his horse, which the groom had brought down according to order, and commanding the men to return by the footpath, which he himself could not examine, he proceeded to ride towards the ford. The brook was swollen during the night, and the groom could not forbear warning him to be wary, that there was considerable danger in attempting to cross it. But Mowbray's mind and his legs were too high-strung to permit him to listen to cautious counsel. He spurred the rearing and reluctant horse into the current, though the water rushed high on the upper side broke both over the pommel and the crupper of his saddle. It was by exertion of great strength and energy that the good horse kept the head-way. Had the groom forced him down among the reeds, which he before the crossing place, the consequences must have been fatal. Mowbray, however, reached the opposite side in safety, and admiration of the event, who at all times followed him during the adventure. He then rode, having towards the Ashmole, determined, if he could, to bring to a halt in that village, and to remain there, until the storm, and amidst a shower of rain, since her separation from Shaws-Castle could, in that case, no longer be concealed. Mowbray, however, in his present state of excitement, in order to disguise our readers with the reality of these events, which his foreboding mind and disturbed conscience could only anticipate.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

THE CATASTROPHE.

What devoted spirit a wandering through the night
For cover did a nest of quail earth
Clara such a time of rest to rest her sorrow—[CHAP.]

Great shame, confusion, and terror, had contributed to overwhelm the unfortunate Clara Mowbray at the moment when she parted with her brother, after the morose and dangerous interview which we are now to record in a former chapter. For years, her life had been a scene of thoughts, but now haunted by the terrible apprehension of a discovery, and now the thing which she feared had come upon her. The extreme violence of her brother's words went so far as to menace her personal safety and armed with the poisonous conflict of passions to produce a rupture of test which probably led her to other free agency than that which she derived from the blind instinct which urges flight, as she rushed towards in danger.

We have no means of exactly tracing the course of this unhappy young woman. It is probable she fled from Shaws-Castle on hearing the arrival of the Trenchard's carriage, which she might mistake for that of Lord Etherington; and thus, while Mowbray was looking forward to the happier prospects which the traveller's narrative seemed to open, his sister, retreating with rain and darkness, amidst the difficulties and dangers of the mountain path which we have described. There were no great, that a young woman more delicately brought up, than what lay laid down exhausted, or have been compelled to call her once back to the residence she had abandoned. But the solitary wanderings of Clara had must be to fatigue and to night-walks; and the deeper state of terror which urged her to flight, rendered her incapable to the perils of her way. She had passed a house, as was evident from her glove remaining on the road, and had crossed the last bridge, although it appeared wonderful that in so dark a night, she should have followed with such accuracy a track, when it meeting a single turn by a cub's length, ought to have precipitated her into eternity.

It is probable that Clara's spirits and strength gave in some degree to her fate, after she had passed a bridge on the road to the Ashmole, for she had stopped at the solitary cottage, inhabited by a old female pauper, who had been for a time the home of the patient and dying Mowbray. One of the inmates of the cottage acknowledged, as she made some remark, and she said she had lost her moon lately, as she entreated for silence. The old bag was one of those whom time had turned to very stone, and obstinately kept by her that, unpolled more probably by general hard-heartedness, than by the improvement she had acquired here, although she previously argued as she was startled at the supernatural noise and sound of tone with which the daughter's voice made her exclamation. She admitted, however, that the poor parishioner turn from the sun, by heart was softened, and she did stand upon the purpose of offering her at least a shelter, as she before she could, hurple to the door and go to be taken down, the unfortunate exclamation on her side, which strengthened the old woman's opinion that the whole was a delusion of fate.

It is conjectured that the repeated warning, and no other attempt to awaken her, or draw down, until she came to Mr. Cargill's house, a room of which a light was still burning, and a candle which required some explanation.

The reader is aware of the reasons which Lord Ashmole, or the master Lord Etherington, a witness from the country the sole witness, as he is called, who could, or at least who might choose to be called, to the fraud which he had perpetrated on the fortune of Clara Mowbray. Of three persons named at the marriage, besides the parties, the daughter was completely deceived. Ashmole he married, as he at his own eye never deceived, and that by his means the Mowbray Iron could be traced from the source, he argued plausibly, that all others be forgotten, and I should become the same I have been before. I have rejected the offer of grace, Mr. Cargill, and not through ignorance, for I have sinned with my eyes open. Care not for me, then, who am a mere outcast." He again endeavoured to interrupt her, but she continued, "Or if you really wish my welfare, let me relieve my bosom of that which presses it, and it may be that I shall then be better able to listen to you. You say you remember me not—but if I tell you how often you refused to perform in secret the office which was required of you—how much you urged that it was against your canonical rules—if I name the argument to which you yielded—and remind you of your purpose, to acknowledge your transgression to your brethren in the church courts, to plead your excuse, and submit to their censure, which you said could not be a light one—you will be then aware, that, in the voice of the miserable pauper, you hear the words of the once artful, gay, and specious Hannah Irwin."

"I allow it—I allow it!" said Mr. Cargill; "I admit the tokens, and believe you to be indeed her whose name you assume."

"Then one painful step is over," said she; "for I would ere now have lightened my conscience by confession, saving for the cursed pride of spirit, which was ashamed of poverty, though it had not shrunk from guilt.—Well—In these arguments, which were urged to you by a youth best known to you by the name of Francis Tyrrel, though more properly entitled to that of Valentine Bulmer, we practised on you a base and gross deception.—Did you not hear some one sigh?—I hope there is no one in the room—I trust I shall die when my confession is signed and sealed, without my name being dragged through the public—I hope ye bring not in your menials to gaze on my abject misery—I cannot brook that."

She paused and listened; for the ear, usually deafened by pain, is sometimes, on the contrary, rendered morbidly acute. Mr. Cargill assured her, there was no one present but himself. "But, O, most unhappy woman!" he said, "what does your introduction prepare me to expect?"

"Your expectation, be it ever so ominous, shall be fully satisfied. I was the guilty confidant of the false Francis Tyrrel. Clara loved the true one. When the fatal ceremony passed, the bride and the clergyman were deceived alike—and I was the wretch—the fiend—who, aiding another yet blacker, if blacker could be—mainly helped to accomplish this cureless misery!"

"Wretch!" exclaimed the clergyman, "and had you not then done enough?—Why did you expose the betrothed of one brother to become the wife of another?"

"I acted," said the sick woman, "only as Bulmer instructed me; but I had to do with a master of the game. He contrived, by his agent Solmes, to match me with a husband imposed on me by his devices as a man of fortune—a wretch, who maltreated me—plundered me—sold me. Oh! if fiends laugh, as I have heard they can, what a jubilee of scorn will there be, when Bulmer and I enter their place of torture! Hark! I am sure of it—some one draws breath, as if shuddering!"

"You will distract yourself if you give way to these fancies. Be calm—speak on—but, oh! at last, and for once, speak the truth!"

"I will, for it will best gratify my hatred against him, who, having first robbed me of my virtue, made me a sport and a plunder to the basest of the species. For that I wandered here to unmask him. I had heard he again stirred his suit to Clara, and I came here to tell young Mowbray the whole. But do you wonder that I shrunk from doing so till this last decisive moment?—I thought of my conduct to Clara, and how could I face her brother? And yet I hated her not after I learned her utter wretchedness—her deep misery, verging even upon madness—I hated her not then. I was sorry that she was not to fall to the lot of a better man than Bulmer;—and I pitied her after she was rescued by Tyrrel, and you may remember it was I who prevailed on you to conceal her marriage."

"I remember it," answered Cargill, "and that you alleged, as a reason for secrecy, danger from my family. I did conceal it, until reports that she was to be married reached my ears."

"Well, then," said the sick woman, "Clara ought to forgive me—since what ill I did her was inevitable, while the good I did was voluntary. I must see her, Josiah Cargill,—I must before I die—I shall never pray till I see her, never profit by word of godliness till I see her, cannot obtain the pardon of a worm like me, can I hope for that of"—

She started at these words with a faint smile slowly, and with a feeble hand, the curtains opposite to the side at which Cargill sat, were drawn, and the figure of Clara Mowbray, her clothes hair drenched and dripping with rain, stood opening by the bedside. The dying woman started, her eyes starting from their sockets quivering, her face pale, her emaciated hand clutching the bed-clothes, as if to support herself, and as much aghast as if her confession had been the apparition of her betrayed friend.

"Hannah Irwin," said Clara, with her usualness of tone, "my early friend—my unprofitable friend! Betake thee to Him who hath pardoned and betake thee with confidence—for I pardon freely as if you had never wronged me—as I desire my own pardon. Farewell—Farewell—"

She retired from the room, ere the clergyman could convince himself that it was more than a vision which he beheld. He ran down stairs—he called his assistants, but no one could attend his cries, deep rickling groans of the patient satisfied that she was breathing her last; and with the maid-servant, ran into the bedroom to witness the death of Hannah Irwin, which soon took place.

That event had scarcely occurred, when a servant who had been left in the inn, came with great terror to acquaint her mistress, that a stranger had entered the house like a ghost, and was discovered in Tyrrel's room. The truth of the story was soon on our own way.

In the irregular state of Miss Mowbray's mind, less violent impulse than that which she had derived from her brother's arbitrary violence, and the fatigues, dangers, and terrors of her night-watch, have exhausted the powers of her body, as those of her mind. We have before said that the lights in the clergyman's house had probably attracted her attention, and in the temporary confusion of her family, never remarkable for its regularity, she had mounted the stairs, and entered the sick chamber, discovered, and thus overheard Hannah Irwin's confession, a tale sufficient to have greatly increased her mental malady.

We have no means of knowing whether she actually sought Tyrrel, or whether it was in the former case, the circumstance of a light shining where all around was dark, that attracted her next apparition was close by the side of her fortunate lover, then deeply engaged in writing, something suddenly gleamed on a large, old mirror, which hung on the wall opposite. She started up, and saw the figure of Clara, holding a letter which she had taken from the passage) in her hand. He stood for an instant with his eyes fixed on this fearful shadow, ere he dared turn round to the substance which was thus reflected. When he so, the fixed and pallid countenance almost hid from him with the belief that he saw a vision, and when, stooping beside him, she took the letter, "Come away!" she said, in a hurried voice, "my brother follows to kill us both. Tyrrel, let us fly—we shall easily escape him. Hannah Irwin is on before—but, if we are overtaken, have no more fighting—you must promise me that you shall not—we have had but too much of this. You will be wise in future."

"Clara Mowbray!" exclaimed Tyrrel, "what is it thus?—Stay—do not go," for she turned to her escape—"stay—stay—sit down."

"I must go," she replied, "I must go—Hannah Irwin is gone before to tell all, you not let me go?—Nay, if you will vinced by his own eyes that the being whose sorrows he had both caused and shared, was now insensible to all earthly calamity. He raised almost a shriek of despair, as he threw himself on the pale hand of the corpse, wet it with tears, devoured it with kisses, and played for a short time the part of a distracted person.

At length, on the repeated expostulation of all present, he suffered himself to be again conducted to another apartment, the surgeon following, anxious to give such sad consolation as the case admitted of.

"As you are so deeply concerned for the untimely fate of this young lady," he said, "it may be some satisfaction to you, though a melancholy one, to know that it has been occasioned by a pressure on the brain, probably accompanied by a suffusion; and I feel authorized in stating from the symptoms, that if life had been spared, reason would, in all probability, never have returned. In such a case, sir, the most affectionate relation must own, that death, in comparison to life, is a mercy."

"Mercy?" answered Tyrrel; "but why, then, is it denied to me?—I know—I know!—My life is spared till I revenge her."

He started from his seat, and hurried eagerly down stairs. But, as he was about to rush from the door of the inn, he was stopped by Touchwood, who had just alighted from a carriage, with an air of stern anxiety imprinted on his features, very different from their usual expression. "Whither would ye? Whither would ye?" he said, laying hold of Tyrrel, and stopping him by force.

"For revenge—for revenge!" said Tyrrel. "Give way, I charge you, on your peril!"

"Vengeance belongs to God," replied the old man, "and his bolt has fallen.—This way—this way," he continued, dragging Tyrrel into the house. "Know," he said, so soon as he had led or forced him into a chamber, "that Mowbray of St. Ronan's has met Bulmer within this half hour, and has killed him on the spot."

"Killed?—whom?" answered the bewildered Tyrrel.

"Valentine Bulmer, the titular Earl of Etherington."

"You bring tidings of death to the house of death," answered Tyrrel; "and there is nothing in this world left that I should live for!"

CHAPTER XXIX.

CONCLUSION.

Here come we to our close—for that which follows is but the tale of dull, unvaried misery
Sleep crags and headlong hills may rout the pencil
Like sudden haze, dark plots and starry adventures.
But who would paint the dull and fog-wrapped moor
In its long track of stony desolation?—Old Play.

WHEN Mowbray crossed the break, as we have already stated, his mind was in that wayward and uncertain state, which seeks something wherewith to vent the self-engendered rage with which it labours like a volcano before eruption. On a sudden a troop of two, followed by loud voices and a great commotion him, he had promised at that hour, and in that expected place, to receive a letter regarding a prospecting, to which the noble Lord Eberington, Jekyll, and Captain Mac-Turk, to whom, as a pastime was given, and which were parties as well as himself. The prospect of a letter, which he forced him of vengeance, and the man whom he regarded as the author of his wrongs, was in the present state of his mind, the only thing to be re-spectful, and which he thought to be a horror, where he found the letter, and the commotion of his arrival, and a great commotion, and a great commotion.
The letter was written by Captain Mac-Turk, and was of a nature, which we may as well call him so, as we have ridden too fast to have steady nerves.

We shall soon see that Mr. Lord Eberington, or rather Mr. Valentine Bulmer, said Mowbray, springing from his horse, and throwing the bridle over the bough of a tree.

"What does this mean, Mr. Mowbray?" said Etherington, drawing himself up, while Jekyl and Captain MacTurk looked at each other in surprise.

"It means, sir, that you are a rascal and impostor," replied Mowbray, "who have assumed a name to which you have no right."

"That, Mr. Mowbray, is an insult I cannot carry farther than this spot," said Etherington.

"If you had been willing to do so, you should have carried with it something still harder to be borne," answered Mowbray.

"Enough, enough, my good sir; no use in spurring a willing horse.—Jekyl, you will have the kindness to stand by me in this matter?"

"Certainly, my lord," said Jekyl.

"And, as there seems to be no chance of taking up the matter amicably," said the pacific Captain MacTurk, "I will be most happy, so help me, to assist my worthy friend, Mr. Mowbray of St. Ronan's, with my countenance and advice.—Very good chance that we were here with the necessary weapons, since it would have been an unpleasant thing to have such an affair long upon the stomach, any more than to settle it without witnesses."

"I would fain know first," said Jekyl, "what all this sudden heat has arisen about."

"About nothing," said Etherington, "except a mare's nest of Mr. Mowbray's discovering. He always knew his sister played the madwoman, and he has now heard a report, I suppose, that she has likewise in her time played the—fool."

"O, crimi!" cried Captain MacTurk, "my good Captain, let us be loading and measuring out—for, by my soul, if these sweetmeats be passing between them, it is only the two ends of a handkercher that can serve the turn—Cot tamn!"

With such friendly intentions, the ground was hastily meted out. Each was well known as an excellent shot; and the Captain offered a bet to Jekyl of a mutchkin of Glenlivat, that both would fall by the first fire. The event showed that he was nearly right; for the ball of Lord Etherington grazed Mowbray's temple, at the very second of time when Mowbray's pierced his heart. He sprung a yard from the ground, and fell down a dead man. Mowbray stood fixed like a pillar of stone, his arm dropped to his side, his hand still clenched on the weapon of death, reeking at the touch-hole and muzzle. Jekyl ran to raise and support his friend, and Captain MacTurk, having adjusted his spectacles, stooped on one knee to look him in the face. "We should have had Dr. Quackleben here," he said, wiping his glasses, and returning them to the shagreen case, "though it would have been only for form's sake—for he is as dead as a toor-nail, poor boy.—But come, Mowbray, my bairn," he said, taking him by the arm, "we must be ganging our ain gait, you and me, before waur comes of it.—I have a bit powney here, and you have your horse till we get to Marchthorn.—Captain Jekyl, I wish you a good morning. Will you have my umbrella back to the inn, for I surmeese it is going to rain?"

Mowbray had not ridden a hundred yards with his guide and companion, when he drew his bridle, and refused to proceed a step farther, till he had learned what was become of Clara. The Captain began to find he had a very untractable pupil to manage, when, while they were arguing together, Touchwood drove past in his hack chaise. As soon as he recognized Mowbray, he stopped the carriage to inform him that his sister was at the Aultoun, which he had learned from finding there had been a messenger sent from thence to the Well for medical assistance, which could not be afforded, the Esculapius of the place, Dr. Quackleben, having been privately married to Mrs. Blower on that morning, by Mr. Chatterly, and having set out on the usual nuptial tour.

In return for this intelligence, Captain MacTurk communicated the fate of Lord Etherington. The old man earnestly pressed instant flight, for which he supplied at the same time ample means, engaging to furnish every kind of assistance and support to the unfortunate young lady; and representing to Mowbray, that if he staid in the vicinity, a prison would soon separate them. Mowbray and his companion then departed southward upon the spur, reached London in safety, and from thence went together to the Peninsula, where the war was then at the hottest.

There remains little more to be told. Mr. Touchwood is still alive, forming plans which have no object, and accumulating a fortune, for which he has apparently no heir. The old man had endeavoured to fix this character, as well as his general patronage, upon Tyrrel, but the attempt only determined the latter to leave the country; nor has he been since heard of, although the title and estates of Etherington lie vacant for his acceptance. It is the opinion of many, that he has entered into a Moravian mission, for the use of which he had previously drawn considerable sums.

Since Tyrrel's departure, no one pretends to guess what old Touchwood will do with his money. He often talks of his disappointments, but can never be made to understand, or at least to admit, that they were in some measure precipitated by his own talent for intrigue and manœuvring. Most people think that Mowbray of St. Ronan's will be at last his heir. That gentleman has of late shown one quality which usually recommends men to the favour of rich relations, namely, a close and cautious care of what's already his own. Captain MacTurk's military ardour having revived when they came within smell of gunpowder, the old soldier contrived not only to get himself on full pay, but to induce his companion to serve for some time as a volunteer. He afterwards obtained a commission, and nothing could be more strikingly different than was the conduct of the young Lord of St. Ronan's and of Lieutenant Mowbray. The former, as we know, was gay, venturesome, and prodigal; the latter lived on his pay, and even within it—denied himself comforts, and often decencies, when doing so could save a guinea; and turned pale with apprehension, if, on any extraordinary occasion, he wanted sixpence a corner at whist. This meanness, or closeness of disposition, prevents his holding the high character to which his bravery and attention to his regimental duties might otherwise entitle him. The same close and accurate calculation of pounds, shillings, and pence, marked his communications with his agent Meiklewham, who might otherwise have had better pickings out of the estate of St. Ronan's, which is now at nurse, and thriving full fast; especially since some debts, of rather an usurious character, have been paid up by Mr. Touchwood, who contented himself with more moderate usage.

On the subject of this property, Mr. Mowbray, generally speaking, gave such minute directions for securing and saving, that his old acquaintance, Mr. Winterblossom, tapping his morocco snuff-box with the sly look which intimated the coming of a good thing, was wont to say, that he had reversed the usual order of transformation, and was turned into a grub after having been a butterfly. After all, this narrowness, though a more ordinary modification of the spirit of avarice, may be founded on the same desire of acquisition, which in his earlier days sent him to the gaming-table.

But there was one remarkable instance in which Mr. Mowbray departed from the rules of economy, by which he was guided in all others. Having acquired for a large sum of money, the ground which he had formerly leased out for the erection of the hotel, lodging-houses, shops, &c., at St. Ronan's Well, he sent positive orders for the demolition of the whole. He would not permit the existence of any house of entertainment on his estate, except that in the Aultoun, where Mrs. Dods reigns with undisputed sway, her temper by no means improved either by time, or her arbitrary disposition by the total absence of competition.

Why Mr. Mowbray, with his acquired habits of frugality, thus destroyed a property which might have produced a considerable income, no one could pretend to affirm. Some said that he remembered his own early follies; and others, that he connected the buildings with the misfortunes of his sister. The vulgar reported, that Lord Etherington's ghost had been seen in the ball-room, and the learned talked of the association of ideas. But it all ended in this, that Mr. Mowbray was independent enough to please himself, and that such was Mr. Mowbray's pleasure.

The little watering-place has returned to its primitive obscurity; and lions and lionesses, with their several jackals, blue surlouts, and bluer stockings, fiddlers and dancers, painters and amateurs, authors and critics, dispersed like pigeons by the demolition of a dovecot, have sought other scenes of amusement and rehearsal, and have deserted St. Ronan's Well.*

* Non sancti maris. Saint Ronan's, since this voracious history was given to the public, has revived as a sort of alibi, or second title, to the very pleasant village of Inverleithen upon Tweed, where there is a medicinal spring much frequented by visitors. Prizes for some of the manly and athletic sports, common in the pastoral districts around, are contested for under the title of the Saint Ronan's Games. Nay, Meg Dods has produced herself of late from obscurity as authoress of a work on Cookery, of which, in justice to a lady who makes so distinguished a figure as this excellent dame, we insert the title-page:

"The Cook and Housewife's Manual: A Practical System of Modern Domestic Cookery and Family Management.

—————' Cook, not all your senses
Be sharp and present in the palate, that they may Commend you: look to your roast and baked meats handsomely,
And what new kitchen and delicate made things.'"

BEAUMONT AND FLETCHER.

By Mistress Margaret Dods, of the Cleikum Inn, St. Ronan's."

Though it is rather unconnected with our immediate subject, we cannot help adding, that Mrs. Dods has preserved the recipes of certain excellent old dishes which we would be loath should fall into oblivion in our day, and in bearing this testimony, we protest that we are no way biased by the receipt of two bottles of excellent sauce for cold meat, which were sent to us by the said Mrs. Dods, as a mark of her respect and regard, for which we return her our unfeigned thanks, having found them capital.

THE END OF ST. RONAN'S WELL.

REDGAUNTLET.

TALE OF THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY.

Master, go on ; and I will follow thee,
To the last gasp, with truth and loyalty.
As You Like It.

INTRODUCTION TO REDGAUNTLET.

THE Jacobite enthusiasm of the eighteenth century, particularly during the rebellion of 1745, afforded a theme, perhaps the finest that could be selected, for fictitious composition, founded upon real or probable incident. This civil war, and its remarkable events, were remembered by the existing generation without any degree of the bitterness of spirit which seldom fails to attend internal dissension. The Highlanders, who formed the principal strength of Charles Edward's army, were an ancient and high-spirited race, peculiar in their habits of war and of peace, brave to romance, and exhibiting a character turning upon points more adapted to poetry than to the prose of real life. Their Prince, young, valiant, patient of fatigue, and despising danger, heading his army on foot in the most toilsome marches, and defeating a regular force in three battles,—all these were circumstances fascinating to the imagination, and might well be supposed to seduce young and enthusiastic minds to the cause in which they were found united, although wisdom and reason frowned upon the enterprise.

The adventurous Prince, as is well known, proved to be one of those personages who distinguish themselves during some single and extraordinarily brilliant period of their lives, like the course of a shooting star, at which men wonder, as well on account of the briefness, as the brilliancy of its splendour. A long trace of darkness overshadowed the subsequent life of a man, who, in his youth, showed himself so capable of great undertakings, and, without the painful task of tracing his course farther, we may say the latter pursuits and habits of this unhappy Prince, are those painfully evincing a broken heart, which seeks refuge from its own thoughts in sordid enjoyments.

Still, however, it was long ere Charles Edward appeared to be, perhaps it was long ere he altogether became, so much degraded from his original self, as he enjoyed for a time the lustre attending the progress and termination of his enterprise. Those who thought they discerned in his subsequent conduct an insensibility to the distresses of his followers, coupled with that egotistical attention to his own interests, which has been often attributed to the Stewart Family, and which is the natural effect of the principles of divine right in which they were brought up, were now generally considered as dissatisfied and sullen persons, who, displeased with the issue of their adventure, and finding themselves involved in the ruins of a falling cause, indulged themselves in undeserved reproaches against their leader. Indeed, such censures were by no means frequent among those of his followers, who, if what was alleged had been just, had the best right to complain. Far the greater number of those unfortunate gentlemen suffered with the most dignified patience, and were either too proud to take notice of ill treatment on the part of their Prince, or so prudent as to be aware their complaints would meet with little sympathy from the world. It may be added, that the greater part of the banished Jacobites, and those of high rank and consequence, were not much within reach of the influence of the Prince's character and conduct, whether well regulated or otherwise.

In the mean time, that great Jacobite conspiracy, of which the insurrection of 1745 was but a small part, precipitated into action on the failure of a far more general scheme, was resumed and again put into motion by the Jacobites of England, whose force had never been broken, as they had prudently avoided bringing it into the field. The surprising effect which had been produced by small means, in 1745, animated their hopes for more important successes, when the whole nonjuring interest of Britain, identified as it then was with great part of the landed gentlemen, should come forward to finish what had been gallantly attempted by a few Highland chiefs.

It is probable, indeed, that the Jacobites of the day were incapable of considering that the very small scale on which the effort was made, was in one great measure the cause of its unexpected success. The remarkable speed with which the insurgents marched, the singularly good discipline which they preserved, the union and unanimity which for some time animated their councils, were all in a considerable degree produced by the smallness of their numbers. Notwithstanding the discomfiture of Charles Edward, the nonjurors of the period long continued to nurse unlawful schemes, and to drink treasonable toasts, until age stole upon them. Another generation arose, who did not share the sentiments which they cherished; and at length the sparkles of disaffection, which had long smouldered, but had never been heated enough to burst into actual flame, became entirely extinguished. But in proportion as the political enthusiasm died gradually away among men of ordinary temperament, it influenced those of warm imaginations and weak understandings, and hence wild schemes were formed, as desperate as they were adventurous.

Thus a young Scotchman of rank is said to have stooped so low as to plot the surprisal of St. James's palace, and the assassination of the royal family. While these ill-digested and desperate conspiracies were agitated among the few Jacobites who still adhered with more obstinacy to their purpose, there is no question but that other plots might have been brought to an open explosion, had it not suited the policy of Sir Robert Walpole, rather to prevent or disable the conspirators in their projects, than to promulgate the tale of danger, which might thus have been believed to be more widely diffused than was really the case.

In one instance alone, this very prudential and humane line of conduct was departed from, and the event seemed to confirm the policy of the general course. Doctor Archibald Cameron, brother of the celebrated Donald Cameron of Lochiel, attainted for the rebellion of 1745, was found by a party of soldiers lurking with a comrade in the wilds of Loch Katrine, five or six years after the battle of Culloden, and was there seized. There were circumstances in his case, so far as was made known to the public, which attracted much compassion, and gave to the judicial proceedings against him an appearance of cold-blooded revenge on the part of government; and the following argument of a zealous Jacobite in his favour was received as conclusive by Dr. Johnson, and other persons who might pretend to impartiality. Dr. Cameron had never borne arms, although engaged in the Rebellion, but used his medical skill for the service, indifferently, of the wounded of both parties. His return to Scotland was ascribed exclusively to family affairs. His behaviour at the bar was decent, firm, and respectful. His wife threw herself, on three different occasions, before George II. and the members of his family, was rudely repulsed from their presence, and at length placed, it was said, in the same prison with her husband, and confined with unmanly severity.

Dr. Cameron was finally executed, with all the severities of the law of treason, and his death remains in popular estimation a dark blot upon the memory of George II., being almost publicly imputed to a mean and personal hatred of Donald Cameron of Lochiel, the sufferer's heroic brother.

Yet the fact was, that whether the execution of Archibald Cameron was political or otherwise, it might certainly have been justified, had the King's ministers so pleased, upon reasons of a public nature. The unfortunate sufferer had not come to the Highlands solely upon his private affairs, as was the general belief; but it was not judged prudent by the English ministry to let it be generally known that he came to inquire about a considerable sum of money which had been remitted from France to the friends of the exiled family. He had also a commission to hold intercourse with the well known M^rPherson of Cluny, chief of the clan Vourich, whom the Chevalier had left behind at his departure from Scotland in 1746, and who remained during ten years of proscription and danger, skulking from place to place in the Highlands, and maintaining an uninterrupted correspondence between Charles and his friends. That Dr. Cameron should have held a commission to assist this chief in raking together the dispersed embers of disaffection, is in itself sufficiently natural, and, considering his political principles, in no respect dishonourable to his memory. But neither ought it to be imputed to George II., that he suffered the laws to be enforced against a person taken in the act of breaking them. When he lost his hazardous game, Dr. Cameron only paid the forfeit which he must have calculated upon. The ministers, however, thought it proper to leave Dr. Cameron's new schemes in concealment, lest by divulging them they had indicated the channel of communication which, it is now well known, they possessed to all the plots of Charles Edward. But it was equally ill advised and ungenerous to sacrifice the character of the king to the policy of the administration. Both points might have been gained by sparing the life of Dr. Cameron after conviction, and limiting his punishment to perpetual exile.

These repeated and successive Jacobite plots rose and burst like bubbles on a fountain; and one of them, at least, the Chevalier judged of importance enough to induce him to risk himself within the dangerous precincts of the British capital. This appears from Dr. King's Anecdotes of his Own Times.

"September, 1750.—I received a note from my Lady Primrose, who desired to see me immediately. As soon as I waited on her, she led me into her dressing-room, and presented me to ——— [the Chevalier, doubtless.] "If I was surprised to find him there, I was still more astonished when he acquainted me with the motives which had induced him to hazard a journey to England at this juncture. The impatience of his friends who were in exile, had formed a scheme which was impracticable; but although it had been as feasible as they had represented it to him, yet no preparation had been made, nor was any thing ready to carry it into execution. He was soon convinced that he had been deceived; and, therefore, after a stay in London of no days only, he returned to the place from whence he came." Dr. King was in 1750 a keen Jacobite, as may be inferred from the visit made by him to the Prince under such circumstances, and from his being one of that unfortunate person's chosen correspondents. He, as well as other men of sense and observation, began to despair of making their fortune in the party which they had chosen. It was indeed sufficiently dangerous; for, during the short visit just described, one of Dr. King's servants remarked the stranger's likeness to Prince Charles, whom he recognised from the common busts.

The occasion taken for breaking up the Stewart interest, we shall tell in Dr. King's own words:—"When he (Charles Edward) was in Scotland, he had a mistress whose name was Walkinshaw, and whose sister was at that time, and is still, housekeeper at Leicester House. Some years after he was released from his prison, and conducted out of France, he sent for this girl, who soon acquired such a dominion over him, that she was acquainted with all his schemes, and trusted with his most secret correspondence. As soon as this was known in England, all those persons of distinction who were attached to him were greatly alarmed: they imagined that this wench had been placed in his family by the English ministers; and, considering her sister's situation, they seemed to have some ground for their suspicion: wherefore, they despatched a gentleman to Paris, where the Prince then was, who had instructions to insist that Mrs. Walkinshaw should be removed to a convent for a certain term; but her gallant absolutely refused to comply with this demand; and although Mr. M'Namara, the gentleman who was sent to him, who has a natural eloquence, and an excellent understanding, urged the most cogent reasons, and used all the arts of persuasion, to induce him to part with his mistress, and even proceeded so far as to assure him, according to his instructions, that an immediate interruption of all correspondence with his most powerful friends in England, and, in short, that the ruin of his interest, which was now daily increasing, would be the infallible consequence of his refusal; yet he continued inflexible, and all M'Namara's entreaties and remonstrances were ineffectual. M'Namara staid in Paris some days beyond the time prescribed him, endeavouring to reason the Prince into a better temper; but finding him obstinately persevere in his first answer, he took his leave with concern and indignation, saying, as he passed out, 'What has your family done, sir, thus to draw down the vengeance of Heaven on every branch of it, through so many ages?' It is worthy of remark, that in all the conferences which M'Namara had with the Prince on this occasion, the latter declared that it was not a violent passion, or indeed any particular regard, which attached him to Mrs. Walkinshaw, and that he could see her removed from him without any concern; but he would not receive directions, in respect to his private conduct, from any man alive. When M'Namara returned to London, and reported the Prince's answer to the gentlemen who had employed him, they were astonished and confounded. However, they soon resolved on the measures which they were to pursue for the future, and determined no longer to serve a man who could not be persuaded to serve himself, and chose rather to endanger the lives of his best and most faithful friends, than part with a harlot, whom, as he often declared, he neither loved nor esteemed."

From this anecdote, the general truth of which is indubitable, the principal fault of Charles Edward's temper is sufficiently obvious. It was a high sense of his own importance, and an obstinate adherence to what he had once determined on—qualities which, if he had succeeded in his bold attempt, gave the nation little room to hope that he would have been found free from the love of prerogative and desire of arbitrary power, which characterized his unhappy grandfather. He gave a notable instance how far this was the leading feature of his character, when, for no reasonable cause that can be assigned, he placed his own single will in opposition to the necessities of France, which, in order to purchase a peace become necessary to the kingdom, was reduced to gratify Britain by prohibiting the residence of Charles within any part of the French dominions. It was in vain that France endeavoured to lessen the disgrace of this step, by making the most flattering offers, in hopes to induce the Prince of himself to anticipate this disagreeable alternative, which, if seriously enforced, as it was likely to be, he had no means whatever of resisting, by leaving the kingdom as of his own free will. Inspired, however, by the spirit of hereditary obstinacy, Charles preferred a useless resistance to a dignified submission, and by a series of idle bravadoes, laid the French court under the necessity of arresting their late ally, and sending him to close confinement in the Bastille, from which he was afterwards sent out of the French dominions, much in the manner in which a convict is transported to the place of his destination.

In addition to these reported instances of a rash and inflexible temper, Dr. King also adds faults alleged to belong to the Prince's character, of a kind less consonant with his noble birth and high pretensions. He is said by this author to have been avaricious, or parsimonious at least, to such a degree of meanness, as to fail, even when he had ample means, in relieving the sufferers who had lost their fortune, and sacrificed their all, in his ill-fated attempt.* We must receive, however, with some degree of jealousy, what is said by Dr. King on this subject, recollecting that he had left at least, if he did not desert, the standard of the unfortunate Prince, and was not therefore a person who was likely to form the fairest estimate of his virtues and faults. We must also remember, that if the exiled Prince gave little, he had but little to give, especially considering how late he nourished the scheme of another expedition to Scotland, for which he was long endeavouring to hoard money.

The case, also, of Charles Edward must be allowed to have been a difficult one. He had to satisfy numerous persons, who, having lost their all in his cause, had, with that all, seen the extinction of hopes which they accounted nearly as good as certainties; some of these were perhaps clamorous in their applications, and certainly ill pleased with their want of success. Other parts of the Chevalier's conduct may have afforded grounds for charging him with coldness to the sufferers of his devoted followers. One of these was a sentiment which has nothing in it that is generous, but it was certainly a principle in which the young Prince was trained, and which may be too probably denominated peculiar to his family, educated in all the high notions of passive obedience and non-resistance. If the unhappy Prince gave implicit faith to the professions of statesmen holding such notions, which is implied by his whole conduct, it must have led to the natural, though ungracious inference, that the services of a subject could not, to whatever degree of ruin they might bring the individual, create a debt against his sovereign. Such a person could only boast that he had done his duty; nor was he entitled to be a claimant for a greater reward than it was convenient for the Prince to bestow or to hold his sovereign his debtor for losses which he had sustained through his loyalty. To a certain extent the Jacobite principles inevitably led to this cold and egotistical mode of reasoning on the part of the sovereign; nor, with all our natural pity for the situation of royalty in distress, do we feel entitled to affirm that Charles did not use this opiate to his feelings, on viewing the misery of his followers, while he certainly possessed, though in no great degree, the means of affording them more relief than he practised. His own history, after leaving France, is brief and melancholy. For a time he seems to have held the firm belief that Providence, which had borne him through so many hazards, still reserved him for some distant occasion, in which he should be empowered to vindicate the honours of his birth. But opportunity after opportunity slipped by unimproved, and the death of his father gave him the fatal proof that none of the principal powers of Europe were, after that event, likely to interest themselves in his quarrel. They refused to acknowledge him under the title of the King of England, and, on his part, he declined to be then recognized as the Prince of Wales.

* The reproach is thus expressed by Dr. King, who brings the charge;—"But the most odious part of his character is his love of money, a vice which I do not remember to have been imputed by our historians to any of his ancestors, and is the certain index of a base and little mind. I know it may be urged in his vindication, that a Prince in exile ought to be an economist. And so he ought; but, nevertheless, his purse should be always open as long as there is any thing in it, to relieve the necessities of his friends and adherents. King Charles II., during his banishment, would have shared the last pistole in his pocket with his little family. But I have known this gentleman with two thousand louis-d'ors in his strong-box, pretend he was in great distress, and borrow money from a lady in Paris who was not in affluent circumstances. His most faithful servants, who had closely attended him in all his difficulties, were ill rewarded."—King's Memoirs.

Family discord came to add its sting to those of disappointed ambition; and, though a humiliating circumstance, it is generally acknowledged, that Charles Edward, the adventurous, the gallant, and the handsome, the leader of a race of pastime valour, whose romantic qualities may be said to have died along with him, had, in his latter days, yielded to those humiliating habits of intoxication, in which the meanest mortals seek to drown the recollection of their disappointments and miseries. Under such circumstances, the unhappy Prince lost the friendship even of those faithful followers who had most devoted themselves to his misfortunes, and was surrounded, with some honourable exceptions, by men of a lower description, regardless of the character which he was himself no longer able to protect.

It is a fact consistent with the author's knowledge, that persons totally unentitled to, and unfitted for, such a distinction, were presented to the unfortunate Prince in moments unfit for presentation of any kind. Amid these clouds was at length extinguished the torch which once shook itself over Britain with such terrific glare, and at last sunk in its own ashes, scarcely remembered and scarce noted.

Meantime, while the life of Charles Edward was gradually wasting in disappointed solitude, the number of those who shared his misfortunes and dangers had shrunk into a small handful of veterans, the heroes of a tale which had been told. Most Scottish readers who can count the number of sixty years must recollect many respected acquaintances of their youth who, as the established phrase gently worded it, had been in the Forty-Five. It may be said, that their political principles and plans no longer either gained proselytes or attracted terror—those who held them had ceased to be the subjects either of fear or opposition. Jacobites were looked upon in society as men who had proved their sincerity by sacrificing their interest to their principles; and in well-regulated companies, it was held a piece of ill-breeding to injure their feelings or reduce the compromises by which they endeavoured to keep themselves abreast of the current of the day. Such, for example, was the evasion of a gentleman of fortune in Perthshire, who, in having the newspapers read to him, caused the King and Queen to be designated by the initial letters of K. and Q., as if, by naming the full word, he might imply an acquiescence in the usurpation of the family of Hanover. George III., having heard of this gentleman's custom in the above and other particulars, commissioned the member for Perthshire to carry his compliments to the steady Jacobite—"that is," said the excellent old King, "not the compliments of the King of England, but those of the Elector of Hanover, and tell him how much I respect him for the steadiness of his principles."

Those who remember such old men, will probably agree that the progress of time, which has withdrawn all of them from the field, has removed, at the same time, a peculiar and striking feature of ancient manners. Their love of past times, their tales of bloody battles fought against romantic odds, were all dear to the imagination, and their little idolatry of locks and hair, pictures, rings, ribands, and other memorials of the time in which they still seemed to live, was an interesting enthusiasm; and although their political principles, had they existed in the relation of fathers, might have rendered them dangerous to the existing dynasty, yet, as we now recollect them, they could not be on the earth supposed to exist persons better qualified to sustain the capacity of innocuous and respectable grandfathers.

It was while reflecting on these things that the novel of Redgauntlet was undertaken. But various circumstances in the composition induced the author to alter its purport considerably, as it passed through his hands, and to carry the action to that point of time when the Chevalier Charles Edward, though fallen into the sear and yellow leaf, was yet meditating a second attempt, which could scarcely have been more hopeless than his first; although one, to which, as we have seen, the unfortunate Prince, at least as late as seventeen hundred and fifty three, still looked with hope and expectation.

REDGAUNTLET.

LETTER I.

DARREN LATIMER TO ALAN FAIRFORD.

Dear Alan,

Why do you deal me with your crushing? Accomplish time in which you bade me farewell at Noble House,* and mounted your miserable to return to your low draughty old wounds in grief. It seemed to say, "Happy day! you can do at pleasure over hill and dale, pursue every 1 of curiosity that presents itself, and relinquish him when it loses interest, while I, your senior and better, must, in this brilliant season, return to my narrow chamber and my musty books."

Oh was the support of the reflections with which saddened our parting bottle of claret, and thus at needs interpret the terms of your melancholy

Why should this be so, Alan? Why the druce to you not be sitting precisely opposite to me at moment in the same comfortable George Inn, early on the tender, and thy parental brow casting its picturesque as a sun rose in your fancy? Is all why, when I fill this very glass of wine, or I push the bottle to you, and say, "Fairford, are chased?" Why, I say, should not all this except because Alan Fairford has not the same sense of friendship as Darren Latimer, and will regard our parties as common as well as our wants?

Am alone in the world; my only guardian was one of a large fortune, which will be mine when I am the age of twenty-five complete, my present income is, thou knowest, more than sufficient for my wants; and yet thou—traitor as thou art to square of friendship—dost deprive me of the cure of thy society, and submittest, besides, to launch on those own part, rather than my wages should cost me a few guineas more? Is this all for my parents, or for those own pride? Is it equally absurd and unreasonable, whichever it springs from? For myself, I tell thee, I and shall have, more than enough for both. Some methodical Samuel Griffiths, of Iron-gate-Lane, Guildhall, London, whose letter as a duty as quarter-day, has sent me, as I told double allowance for this my twenty-first birth, and an assurance, in his brief fashion, that it be again doubled for the succeeding years, until at into possession of my own property. But I refrain from visiting England until my twenty-year expires, and it is recommended that I shall pay all inquiries concerning my family, and so on, for the present.

Are it not that I recollect my poor mother in her widow's weeds, with a countenance that never faded but when she looked on me—and then, in such and woful sort, as the sun when he glances light on April cloud—were it not, I say, that her and mother like form and countenance forbade, a suspicion. I might think myself the son of a Indian director, or rich citizen, who had more (th than grace, and a handful of hypocrisy to boot, who was breeding up privately, and obscurely thing, one of whose existence he had some reason ashamed. But, as I said before, I think on my lot, and am convinced as much as of the existence of my own soul, that no touch of shame could be brought in which she was implicated. Mean the first stage on the road from Edinburgh to London, August.

time, I am wealthy, and I am alone, and why does my friend scruple to share my wealth?

Are you not my only friend? and have you not acquired a right to share my wealth? Answer me that, Alan Fairford. When I was brought from the solitude of my mother's dwelling into the tumult of the Junior Class at the High School—when I was mocked for my English accents—asked with snow as a Southern—rolled in the gutter for a Mazon pork pudding—why, with stout arguments, and stout blows, stood forth my defender?—why, Alan Fairford. Who was the cowardly when I brought the arrogance of an only son, and of course a spoiled urchin, to the forum of the little republic?—why, Alan. And who taught me to smother a cobbler's pen a louner, head a broken, and hold the banners?—Alan, once more. If I became the pride of the Yards, and the dread of the rucksters in the High School Wynd, it was under thy patronage, and, but for thee, I had been contented with humbly passing through the Cowgate-Port, without climbing over the top of it, and had never seen the Battle since steep nearer than from Bedford's Park. You taught me to keep my fingers off the weak, and to clench my fist against the strong to carry no tales out of school—to stand forth like a true man—obey the stern order of a Ponde manum, and endure my paymies without wincing, like one that is determined not to be the better for them. In a word, before I knew thee, I knew nothing.

At college it was the same. When I was inordinately idle, your example and encouragement roused me to mental exertion, and showed me the way to intellectual enjoyment. You made me a historian, a metaphysician, (twice Minerva)—say, by Heaven! you had almost made an advocate of me, as well as of yourself. Yes, rather than part with you, Alan, I attended a weary season at the Scotch Law Class; a weaver at the Crib, and with what excellent advantage, my note-book filled with quotations of the professors and my fellow-students, is it not yet aslant to testify?

"Thus far have I held on with thee, entered."

And, to say truth, partly and solely that I might travel the same road with thee. But it will not do, Alan. By my faith, man, I could as soon think of being one of those ingenious traders who cheat little Master Jackies on the outside of the partition with tops, balls, bats, and battledores, as a member of the long-rebel fraternity within, who impose on grown country gentlemen with bouncing brocards of law! Now, don't —Bunch a window—had a stomach with steam, and held the lowest of handkerchiefs which end to drive high school boys into fighting.

A pace on the very brink of the Castle wall to the north, by which it is just possible for a giant or a high school boy, to turn the corner of the building where it runs from the edge of the precipice. This was as favourable a spot with the hill and rock base of the higher craters, that at one time quarrels were posted to prevent its occupation. One of the most stupor was rendered more acute because the danger could take hold of the rest of a castle, as persons were the mode of passing the arched gate. The entrance the Cowgate Port, ascending it there but, there was also a strong guardpost as it offered an unobstructed view to the tops who used these descent to the advantage of the parliament. The gateway is now deep water, and probably most of its garrison is as low as the foot-ways. To recollect that the author himself however occasionally disqualifies was one of those pseudo dreamings, is a sad reflection to one who almost now sleep over a brand without awakening.

The Hill of the Parliament House of Edinburgh was, in former days, divided into two unequal portions by a partition, the lower side of which was consecrated to the use of the Council of Justice and the gentlemen of the law, while the upper division was occupied by the seats of customers, taverns, and the you read this to your worthy father, Alan—he loves me well enough, I know, of a Saturday night, but he thinks me but idle company for any other day of the week. And here, I suspect, lies your real objection to taking a ramble with me through the southern canals in this delicious weather. I know the good gentleman has had thoughts of me for being so unfit that as to leave Edinburgh before the Season runs, perhaps, too, he quarrels a little—I will not say, with my want of ancestry, but with my want of amusements. He reckons me a lone thing in this world, Alan, and so in good truth I am, and it seems a run-up to him why you should not attach yourself to me, that I can claim no interest in the general herd.

Do not suppose I forget what I owe him, for putting me to shelter for four years under his roof. My obligations to him are not the less, but the greater if he never heartily loved me. He is angry too, that I will not, or cannot, be a lawyer, and, with reference to you, considers me disinclination that way as passim example, as he might say.

But be not afraid that a lot of your steady ones will be influenced by such a road shaken by the winds as I am. You will go on doubting with Dantes, and resolving those doubts with Stewart,* upon the cramp speech? has been spoken more soles from the corner of the bench, and with covered head, until you have sworn to defend the liberties and privileges of the College of Justice—until the black gown is hung on your shoulders, and you are as free as any of the Faculty to sue or defend. Then will I step forth, Alan, and in a character which even your father will allow may be more useful to you than had I shared this splendid termination of your legal studies. In a word, if I cannot be a counsel, I am determined to be a client, a sort of person without whom a lawsuit would be as dull as a supported cane. Yes, I am determined to give you your first fee. One can easily, I am assured, get into a lawsuit—it is only the getting out that is sometimes found troublesome,—and, with your kind father for an agent and you for my counsel learned in the law, and the worshipful Master Samuel Griffiths to back me, a few sessions shall not tire my patience. In short, I will make my way into Court, even if it should cost me the continuing a debt, or at least a quasi debt.—You see all is not lost of what Leviathan wrote, and Wallace taught.

Thus far I have fooled it off well enough, and yet, Alan, all is not at ease within me. I am affected with a sense of loneliness, the more depressing, that it seems to me to be a solitude peculiarly my own. In a country where all the world have a circle of acquaintance, extending to sixth cousins at least, I am a solitary individual, having only one kind heart to throw in union with my own. If I were condemned to labour for my bread, nothink I should have regard the precious species of deprivation. The necessary communication of master and servant would be at least a tie which would attach me to the rest of my kind—as it is, my very independence seems to enhance the peculiarity of my situation. I am in the world as a stranger in the crowded coffee-house, where he enters, calls for what refreshments he wants, pays his bill, and is forgotten as soon as the waiter's mouth has pronounced his "Thank ye, sir."

As he is a modern lawyer. From the old play of the Plays (which is a comedy) was formerly the case with Westminster Hall. Men were now provided his courts in both cities from all parts, but his own.

* The John Stuart of Thoughts and Questions upon the Law, especially of Scotland, and the James Stewart of Thoughts and Questions upon the Law of Scotland, published and abridged. My works of authority in Scotch jurisprudence. As is generally the case the Scotch are held more in respect than the English.

† Full of late papers, some addressed upon returned at the Court, that has made a Latin address to the Court, faculty and judge, upon a set terms, and a few words upon a list of the it will have to show his learning and perseverance. He also wrote the last for a minute on judge in a minute has right of being entered before the court, which is said to have originated from the celebrated lawyer, the Thomas Munn, lawyer to the Duke of Devonshire, who he himself remained at the bar. It is said that documents have been deposited with the court, the copy of the court proceedings. The oldest lawyer never takes the pains to peruse them, and seems to mistake the aims and principles of his order.

I know your good father would turn the steady my marriage,* and ask how I should find it, instead of being able to throw down my reckoning. I was obliged to deprecate the resentment of the landlord for concerning that which I could not pay for. I cannot tell how it is; but, though this very miserable reflection comes across me, and though I confess that four hundred a year in pasture, eight hundred in near prospect, and the Lord knows how many hundreds more in the distance, are very pretty and comfortable things, yet I would freely give one half of them to call your father father, though he should scold me for my idleness every hour of the day, and to call you brother, though a brother whose name would throw my own in completely into the shade.

The fact, yet not improbable belief often has come across me, that your father knows something more about my birth and natural condition than he is willing to communicate, it is so unlikely that I should have been left in Edinburgh at six years old, without any other recommendation than the regular payment of my board to old M——? of the High School. Before that time, as I have often told you, I have had a recollection of unbounded indulgence on my mother's part, and the most tyrannical exertion of caprice on my own. I remember still how fairly she taught, how vainly she strove to soothe me, when in the full energy of despotism, I roared like an uncalves, for something which it was impossible to procure for me. She is dead, that kind, that ill-rewarded mother! I remember the long faces—the distant room—the harsh language—the mysterious imposture made upon my mind by the beams and moving shadows, and the difficulty which I had to surmount all this in the disappearance of my mother. I do not think I had before this event formed any idea of death, or that I had even heard of that final separation of a father from his son. The first acquaintance with I learned was, it deprived me of my only reliance.

A German of venerable appearance, an old man, was my guide and companion in a journey of considerable length; and in the charge of another elderly man, substituted in his place. I know not now why I completed my journey to Scotland—of this in all I recollect.

I repeat the little history now, as I have a hundred times done before, merely because I would come some way out of it. Turn, then, thy sharp withdrawing, lawyer like memory to the same task—make up my history as though thou wert shaping a blustering allegations of some blue-bustled, long-headed client, into a confederence of facts of circumstances, and thou shalt be, not my Apologus tibi non typo?—but my Lord Stair! No whole, I have written myself out of my memory, and blue devils, merely by pressing about them, will now converse half an hour with Ross Rennie his stall—the rascal knows me already, and smiles whenever I cross the threshold of the stable.

The black which you bestride yesterday morning promises to be an admirable reader, and united easily with Sam and the portmanteau, as with me and your land of law learning. Sam promises to be steady, and has hitherto been so. No long trial will say. He says the names of former masters of evil company—the people who were at the last stable were too seductive, I suppose—he dreamt over did the horse injustice—would rather have over his own dinner, he says. In this I believe him. Ross Rennie's ribs and coat show no marks of seduction. However, as he will move with no one in the inn we frequent, and as ours are somewhat speedily converted into one as John Barrow himself, I shall keep a look-out after Master his stupid fellow I had he not abused my good name, I might have chattered to him to keep my tongue in exercise; whereas now, I must keep him at a distance.

Do you remember what Mr. Fairford said to me?

* A popular Scottish phrase, signifying of ingratiate with friends of Power.

this subject,—it did not become my father's son to speak in that manner to Sam's father's son? I asked you what your father could possibly know of mine; and you answered, "As much, you supposed, as he knew of Sam's—it was a proverbial expression." This did not quite satisfy me, though I am sure I cannot tell why it should not. But I am returning to a fruitless and exhausted subject. Do not be afraid that I shall come back on this well-trodden yet pathless field of conjecture. I know nothing so useless, so utterly feeble and contemptible, as the groaning forth one's helpless lamentations into the ears of our friends.

I would fain promise you that my letters shall be as entertaining, as I am determined they shall be regular and well filled. We have an advantage over the dear friends of old, every pair of them. Neither David and Jonathan, nor Orestes and Pylades, nor Damon and Pythias—although, in the latter case particularly, a letter by post would have been very acceptable—ever corresponded together; for they probably could not write, and certainly had neither posts nor franks to speed their effusions to each other; whereas yours, which you had from the old peer, being handled gently, and opened with precaution, may be returned to me again, and serve to make us free of his Majesty's post-office, during the whole time of my proposed tour.* Mercy upon us, Alan! what letters I shall have to send you, with an account of all that I can collect, of pleasant or rare, in this wildgoose jaunt of mine! All I stipulate is, that you do not communicate them to the Scots Magazine; for though you used, in a left-handed way, to compliment me on my attainments in the lighter branches of literature, at the expense of my deficiency in the weightier matters of the law, I am not yet audacious enough to enter the portal which the learned Ruddiman so kindly opened for the acolytes of the Muses.—Vale, sis memor mei. D. L.

P. S.—Direct to the Post-Office here. I shall leave orders to forward your letters wherever I may travel.

LETTER II.

ALAN FAIRFORD TO DARSIE LATIMER.

Negatur, my dear Darsie—you have logic and law enough to understand the word of denial. I deny your conclusion. The premises I admit, namely, that when I mounted on that infernal hack, I might utter what seemed a sigh, although I deemed it lost amid the puffs and groans of the broken-winded brute, matchless in the complication of her complaints by any save she, the poor man's mare, renowned in song, that died

"A mile aboon Dundee."

But credit me, Darsie, the sigh which escaped me, concerned thee more than myself, and regarded neither the superior mettle of your cavalry, nor your greater command of the means of travelling. I could certainly have cheerfully have ridden on with you for a few days; and assure yourself I would not have hesitated to tax your better-filled purse for our joint expenses. But you know my father considers every moment taken from the law as a step down hill; and I owe much to his anxiety on my account, although its effects are sometimes troublesome. For example.

I found, on my arrival at the shop in Brown's Square, that the old gentleman had returned that very evening, impatient, it seems, of remaining a night out of the guardianship of the domestic Lares. Having this information from James, whose brow wore rather an anxious look on the occasion, I des-

* It is well known and remembered, that when Members of Parliament enjoyed the unlimited privilege of franking by the mere writing the name on the cover, it was extended to the most extraordinary occasions. One noble lord, to express his regard for a particular regiment, franked a letter for every rank and file. It was customary also to save the covers and return them, in order that the correspondence might be carried on as long as the envelopes could hold together.

† Alluding, as all Scotsmen know, to the humorous old song:—

"The auld man's mare's dead,
The puir man's mare's dead,
The auld man's mare's dead,

patched a Highland chairman to the livery stable with my Bucephalus, and slunk, with as little noise as might be, into my own den, where I began to mumble certain half-gnawed and not half-digested doctrines of our municipal code. I was not long seated, when my father's visage was thrust, in a peering sort of way, through the half-opened door; and withdrawn, on seeing my occupation, with a half-articulated humph! which seemed to convey a doubt of the seriousness of my application. If it were so, I cannot condemn him; for recollection of thee occupied me so entirely during an hour's reading, that although Stair lay before me, and notwithstanding that I turned over three or four pages, the sense of his lordship's clear and perspicuous style so far escaped me, that I had the mortification to find my labour was utterly in vain.

Ere I had brought up my lee-way, James appeared with his summons to our frugal supper—radishes, cheese, and a bottle of the old ale—only two plates though—and no chair set for Mr. Darsie, by the attentive James Wilkinson. Said James, with his long face, lank hair, and very long pigtail in its leathern strap, was placed, as usual, at the back of my father's chair, upright as a wooden sentinel at the door of a puppet-show. "You may go down, James," said my father; and exit Wilkinson.—What is to come next? thought I; for the weather, is not clear on the paternal brow.

My boots encountered his first glance of displeasure, and he asked me, with a sneer, which way I had been riding. He expected me to answer, "Nowhere," and would then have been at me with his usual sarcasm, touching the humour of walking in shoes at twenty shillings a pair. But I answered with composure, that I had ridden out to dinner as far as Noble-House. He started, (you know his way,) as if I had said that I had dined at Jericho; and as I did not choose to seem to observe his surprise, but continued munching my radishes in tranquillity, he broke forth in ire.

"To Noble-House, sir! and what had you to do at Noble-House, sir?—Do you remember you are studying law sir?—that your Scots law trials are coming on, sir?—that every moment of your time just now is worth hours at another time?—and have you leisure to go to Noble-House, sir?—and to throw your books behind you for so many hours?—Had it been a turn in the Meadows, or even a game at golf—but Noble-House, sir!"

"I went so far with Darsie Latimer, sir, to see him begin his journey."

"Darsie Latimer?" he replied in a softened tone—"Humph!—Well, I do not blame you for being kind to Darsie Latimer; but it would have done as much good if you had walked with him as far as the toll-bar, and then made your farewells—it would have saved horse-hire—and your reckoning, too, at dinner."

"Latimer paid that, sir," I replied, thinking to soften the matter; but I had much better have left it unspoken.

"The reckoning, sir?" replied my father. "And did you sponge upon any man for a reckoning? Sir, no man should enter the door of a public-house without paying his lawing."

"I admit the general rule, sir," I replied; "but this was a parting-cup between Darsie and me; and I should conceive it fell under the exception of Doch an dorroch."

"You think yourself a wit," said my father, with as near an approach to a smile as ever he permits to gild the solemnity of his features; "But I reckon you did not eat your dinner standing, like the Jews at their Passover? and it was decided in a case before the town-buillies of Cupar-Angus when Luckie Simpson's cow had drunk up Luckie Jameson's browst of ale, while it stood in the door to cool, that there was no damage to pay, because the crumnie drank without sitting down; such being the very circumstance constituting Doch an dorroch, which is a standing drink, for which no reckoning is paid. Ha, sir! what says your advocateship (feri) to that? Exceptio firmat regulam—But come, fill your glass, Alan; I am not sorry ye have shown this attention to Darsie Latimer, who is a good lad, as times go; and having now lived under my roof since he left the school, why, there is really no great matter in coming under this small obligation to him."

As I saw my father's scruples were much softened by the consciousness of his superiority in the legal argument, I took care to accept my pardon as a matter of grace, rather than of justice; and only replied, we should feel ourselves duller of an evening, now that you were absent. I will give you my father's exact words in reply, Darsie. You know him so well, that they will not offend you; and you are also aware, that there mingles with the good man's preciseness and formality, a fund of shrewd observation and practical good sense.

"It is very true," he said; "Darsie was a pleasant companion—but over waggish, over waggish, Alan, and somewhat scatter-brained.—By the way, Wilkinson must get our ale bottled in English pints now, for a quart bottle is too much, night after night, for you and me, without his assistance.—But Darsie, as I was saying, is an arch lad, and somewhat light in the upper story—I wish him well through the world; but he has little solidity, Alan, little solidity."

I scorn to desert an absent friend, Darsie, so I said for you a little more than my conscience warranted: but your defection from your legal studies had driven you far to leeward in my father's good opinion.

"Unstable as water, he shall not excel," said my father; "or, as the Septuagint hath it, Effusa est sicut aqua—non crescat. He goeth to dancing-houses, and readeth novels—sat est."

I endeavoured to parry these texts by observing, that the dancing-houses amounted only to one night at La Pique's ball—the novels (so far as matter of notoriety, Darsie) to an odd volume of Tom Jones.

"But he danced from night to morning," replied my father, "and he read the idle trash, which the author should have been scourged for, at least twenty times over. It was never out of his hand."

I then hinted, that in all probability your fortune was now so easy as to dispense with your prosecuting the law any farther than you had done; and therefore you might think you had some title to amuse yourself. This was the least palatable argument of all.

"If he cannot amuse himself with the law," said my father, snappishly, "it is the worse for him. If he needs not law to teach him to make a fortune, I am sure he needs it to teach him how to keep one; and it would better become him to be learning this, than to be scouring the country like a landloup, going he knows not where, to see he knows not what, and giving treats at Noble-House to fools like himself," (an angry glance at poor me.) "Noble-House, indeed!" he repeated, with elevated voice and sneering tone, as if there were something offensive to him in the very name, though I will venture to say that any place in which you had been extravagant enough to spend five shillings, would have stood as deep in his reprobation.

Mindful of your idea, that my father knows more of your real situation than he thinks proper to mention, I thought I would hazard a fishing observation. "I did not see," I said, "how the Scottish law would be useful to a young gentleman whose fortune would seem to be vested in England."—I really thought my father would have beat me.

"D'ye mean to come round me, sir, per ambages, as Counsellor Pest says? What is it to you where Darsie Latimer's fortune is vested, or whether he hath any fortune, ay or no?—And what ill would the Scottish law do to him, though he had as much of it as either Stair or Bankton, sir? Is not the foundation of our municipal law the ancient code of the Roman Empire, devised at a time when it was so much renowned for its civil polity, sir, and wisdom? Go to your bed, sir, after your expedition to Noble-House, and see that your lamp be burning, and your book before you, ere the sun peeps. Ars longa, vita brevis,—were it not a sin to call the divine science of the law by the inferior name of art?"

So my lamp did burn, dear Darsie, the next morning, though the owner took the risk of a domiciliary visitation, and lay snug in bed, trusting its glimmer might, without farther inquiry, be received as sufficient evidence of his vigilance. And now, upon this the third morning after your departure, things are but little better; for though the lamp burns in my den, and Voet on the Pandects hath his wisdom spread open before me, yet as I only use him as a reading-desk on which to scribble this sheet of nonsense to Darsie Latimer, it is probable the vicinity will be of little furtherance to my studies.

And now, methinks, I hear thee call me an affected hypocritical varlet, who, living under such a system of distrust and restraint as my father chooses to govern by, nevertheless pretends not to envy you your freedom and independence.

Latimer, I will tell you no lies. I wish my father would allow me a little more exercise of my free will, were it but that I might feel the pleasure of doing what would please him of my own accord. A little more spare time, and a little more money to enjoy it, would, besides, neither misbecome my age nor my condition; and it is, I own, provoking to see so many in the same situation winging the air at freedom, while I sit here, caged up like a cobbler's linnet, to chant the same unvaried lesson from sunrise to sunset, not to mention the listening to so many lectures against idleness, as if I enjoyed or was making use of the means of amusement! But then I cannot at heart blame either the motive or the object of this severity. For the motive, it is and can only be my father's anxious, devoted, and unremitting affection and zeal for my improvement, with a laudable sense of the honour of the profession to which he has trained me.

As we have no near relations, the tie betwixt us is of even unusual closeness, though in itself one of the strongest which nature can form. I am, and have all along been, the exclusive object of my father's anxious hopes, and his still more anxious and engrossing fears; so what title have I to complain, although now and then these fears and hopes lead him to take a troublesome and incessant charge of all my motions? Besides, I ought to recollect, and Darsie, I do recollect, that my father, upon various important occasions, has shown that he can be indulgent as well as strict. The leaving his old apartments in the Luckenbooths was to him like divorcing the soul from the body; yet Dr. R—— did but hint that the better air of this new district was more favourable to my health, as I was then suffering under the penalties of too rapid a growth, when he exchanged his old and beloved quarters, adjacent to the very Heart of Mid-Lothian, for one of those new tenements [entire within themselves] which modern taste has so lately introduced.—Instance also the inestimable favour which he conferred on me by receiving you into his house, when you had only the unpleasant alternative of remaining, though a grown-up lad, in the society of mere boys.* This was a thing so contrary to all my father's ideas of seclusion, of economy, and of the safety to my morals and industry, which he wished to attain, by preserving me from the society of other young people, that, upon my word, I am always rather astonished how I should have had the impudence to make the request, and that he should have complied with it.

Then for the object of his solicitude—Do not laugh, or hold up your hands, my good Darsie; but upon my word I like the profession to which I am in the course of being educated, and am serious in prosecuting the preliminary studies. The law is my vocation—in an especial, and, I may say, in a hereditary way, my vocation; for although I have not the honour to belong to any of the great families who form in Scotland, as in France, the noblesse of the robe, and with us, at least, carry their heads as high, or rather higher.

* The diminutive and obscure place called Brown's Square was hailed about the time of its erection as an extremely elegant improvement upon the style of designing and erecting Edinburgh residences. Each house was, in the phrase used by appraisers, "finished within itself," or, in the still newer phraseology, "self-contained." It was built about the year 1763-4; and the old part of the city being near and accessible, this square soon received many inhabitants, who ventured to remove to so moderate a distance from the High Street.

than the noblesse of the sword,—for the former consist more frequently of the “first-born of Egypt,”—yet my grandfather, who, I dare say, was a most excellent person, had the honour to sign a bitter protest against the Union, in the respectable character of town-clerk to the ancient Borough of Birlthegroat; and there is some reason—shall I say to hope, or to suspect?—that he may have been a natural son of a first cousin of the then Fairford of that ilk, who had been long numbered among the minor barons. Now my father mounted a step higher, on the ladder of legal promotion, being, as you know, as well as I do, an eminent and respected Writer to his Majesty’s Signet; and I myself am destined to mount a round higher still, and wear the honoured robe which is sometimes supposed, like Charity, to cover a multitude of sins. I have, therefore, no choice but to climb upwards, since we have mounted thus high, or else to fall down at the imminent risk of my neck. So that I reconcile myself to my destiny; and while you are looking from mountain peaks at distant lakes and friths, I am, deapicibus juris, consoling myself with visions of crimson and scarlet gowns—with the appendages of handsome cowls, well lined with salary.

You smile, Darsie, more tuo, and seem to say it is little worth while to cozen one’s self with such vulgar dreams: yours being, on the contrary, of a high and heroic character, bearing the same resemblance to mine, that a bench, covered with purple cloth, and plentifully loaded with session papers, does to some Gothic throne, rough with Barbaric pearl and gold. But what would you have?—Sua quemque trahit voluptas. And my visions of preferment, though they may be as unsubstantial at present, are nevertheless more capable of being realized, than your aspirations after the Lord knows what. What says my father’s proverb? “Look to a gown of gold, and you will at least get a sleeve of it.” Such is my pursuit; but what dost thou look to? The chance that the mystery, as you call it, which at present overclouds your birth and connexions, will clear up into something inexpressibly and inconceivably brilliant; and this without any effort or exertion of your own, but purely by the good will of Fortune. I know the pride and haughtiness of thy heart, and sincerely do I wish that thou hadst more beatings to thank me for, than those which thou dost acknowledge so gratefully. Then had I thumped these Quixotical expectations out of thee, and thou hadst not, as now, conceived thyself to be the hero of some romantic history, and converted in thy vain imagination, honest Griffiths, citizen and broker, who never bestows more than the needful upon his quarterly epistles, into some wise Alexander or sage Alquife, the mystical and magical protector of thy peerless destiny. But I know not how it was, thy skull got harder, I think, and my knuckles became softer; not to mention that at length thou didst begin to show about thee a spark of something dangerous, which I was bound to respect at least, if I did not fear it.

And while I speak of this, it is not much amiss to advise thee to correct a little this cock-a-heop courage of thine. I fear much that, like a hot metttled horse, it will carry the owner into some scrape, out of which he will find it difficult to extricate himself, especially if the daring spirit which bore thee thither should chance to fail thee at a pinch. Remember, Darsie, thou art not naturally courageous; on the contrary, we have long since agreed, that, quiet as I am, I have the advantage in this important particular. My courage consists, I think, in strength of nerves and constitutional indifference to danger; which, though it never pushes me on adventure, secures me in full use of my recollection, and tolerably complete self-possession, when danger actually arrives. Now, thine seems more what may be called intellectual courage; highness of spirit, and desire of distinction; impulses which render thee alive to the love of fame, and deaf to the apprehension of danger, until it forces itself suddenly upon thee. I own that whether it is from my having caught my father’s apprehensions, or that I have reason to entertain doubts of my own, I often think that this wildfire chase, of romantic situation and adventure, may lead thee into some mischief; and then what would become of Alan Fairford? They might make whom they pleased Lord-Advocate, or Solicitor-General, I should never have the heart to strive for it. All my exertions are intended to vindicate myself one day in your eyes; and I think I should not care a farthing for the embroidered silk gown, more than for an old woman’s apron, unless I had hopes that thou shouldst be walking the boards to admire, and perhaps to envy me.

That this may be the case, I prithee—beware! See not a Dulcinea in every slipshod girl, who, with blue eyes, fair hair, a tattered plaid, and a willow-wand in her gripe, drives out the village cows to the loaning. Do not think you will meet a gallant Valentine in every English rider, or an Orson in every Highland drover. View things as they are, and not as they may be magnified through thy teeming fancy. I have seen thee look at an old gravel pit, till thou madest out capes, and bays, and inlets, crags, and precipices, and the whole stupendous scenery of the isle of Feroe, in what was to all ordinary eyes a mere horsepond. Besides, did I not once find thee gazing with respect at a lizard, in the attitude of one who looks upon a crocodile? Now this is, doubtless, so far a harmless exercise of your imagination, for the puddle cannot drown you, nor the Tulliputian alligator eat you up. But it is different in society, where you cannot mistake the character of those you converse with, or suffer your fancy to exaggerate their qualities, good or bad, without exposing yourself not only to ridicule, but to great and serious inconveniences. Keep guard, therefore on your imagination, my dear Darsie; and let your old friend assure you, it is the point of your character most pregnant with peril to its good and generous owner. Adieu! let not the franks of the worthy peer remain unemployed; above all, Sis memor mei.

LETTER III.

DARSIE LATIMER TO ALAN FAIRFORD.

Shepherd’s Bush.

I HAVE received thine absurd and most conceited epistle. It is well for thee that, Lovelace and Belford like, we came under a convention to pardon every species of liberty which we may take with each other; since, upon my word, there are some reflections in your last, which would otherwise have obliged me to return forthwith to Edinburgh, merely to show you I was not what you took me for.

Why, what a pair of prigs hast thou made of us!—I plunging into scrapes, without having courage to get out of them—thy sagacious self, afraid to put one foot before the other, lest it should run away from its companion; and so standing still like a post, out of mere faintness and coldness of heart, while all the world were driving full speed past thee. Thou a portrait-painter!—I tell thee, Alan, I have seen a better seated on the fourth round of a ladder, and painting a bare-breeched Highlander, holding a pint-stoup as big as himself, and a booted Lowlander, in a bobwig, supporting a glass of like dimensions; the whole being designed to represent the sign of the Salutation.

How hadst thou the heart to represent thine own individual self, with all thy motions, like those of a great Dutch doll, depending on the pressure of certain springs, as duty, reflection, and the like; without the impulse of which, thou wouldst doubtless have me believe thou wouldst not budge an inch? But have I not seen Gravity out of his bed at midnight? and must I, in plain terms, remind thee of certain mad pranks? Thou hadst ever, with the gravest sentiments in thy mouth, and the most starched reserve in thy manner, a kind of lumbering proclivity towards mischief, although with more inclination to set it a-going, than address to carry it through; and I cannot but chuckle internally, when I think of having seen my most venerable monitor, the future President of some high Scottish Court, puffing, blowing, and floundering, like a clumsy cart-horse in a bog, where his efforts to extricate himself only plunge him deeper at every awkward struggle, till some one—I myself,

As for me, my portrait is, if possible, even more scandalously caricatured. I fail or quail in spirit at the upcome! Where canst thou show me the least symptom of the recreant temper with which thou hast invested me, (as I trust,) merely to set off the solid and impassable dignity of thine own stupid indifference? If you ever saw me tremble, be assured that my flesh, like that of the old Spanish general, only quaked at the dangers into which my spirit was about to lead it. Seriously, Alan, this imputed poverty of spirit is a shabby charge to bring against your friend. I have examined myself as closely as I can, being, in very truth, a little hurt at your having such hard thoughts of me, and on my life I can see no reason for them. I allow you have, perhaps, some advantage of me in the steadiness and indifference of your temper; but I should despise myself, if I were conscious of the deficiency in courage which you seem willing enough to impute to me. However, I suppose this ungracious hint proceeds from sincere anxiety for my safety; and so viewing it, I swallow it as I would do medicine from a friendly doctor, although I believed in my heart he had mistaken my complaint.

This offensive insinuation disposed of, I thank thee, Alan, for the rest of thy epistle. I thought I heard your good father pronouncing the word Noble-House, with a mixture of contempt and displeasure, as if the very name of the poor little hamlet were odious to him, or, as if you had selected, out of all Scotland, the very place at which you had no call to dine. But if he had had any particular aversion to that blameless village, and very sorry inn, is it not his own fault that I did not accept the invitation of the Laird of Glengallacher, to shoot a buck in what he emphatically calls his "country?" Truth is, I had a strong desire to have complied with his Lairdship's invitation. To shoot a buck! Think how magnificent an idea to one who never shot any thing but hedge-sparrows, and that with a horse-pistol, purchased at a broker's stand in the Cowgate!—You, who stand upon your courage, may remember that I took the risk of firing the said pistol for the first time, while you stood at twenty yards' distance; and that, when you were persuaded it would go off without bursting, forgetting all law but that of the biggest and strongest, you possessed yourself of it exclusively for the rest of the holidays. Such a day's sport was no complete introduction to the noble art of deer-stalking, as it is practised in the Highlands; but I should not have scrupled to accept honest Glengallacher's invitation, at the risk of firing a rifle for the first time, had it not been for the outcry which your father made at my proposal, in the full ardour of his zeal for King George, the Hanover succession, and the Presbyterian faith. I wish I had stood out, since I have gained so little upon his good opinion by submission. All his impressions concerning the Highlanders are taken from the recollections of the Forty-five, when he retreated from the West-Port with his brother volunteers, each to the fortalice of his own separate dwelling, so soon as they heard the Adventurer was arrived with his clans as near them as Kirkliston. The flight of Falkirk—parma non bene selecta—in which I think your sire had his share with the undaunted western regiment, does not seem to have improved his taste for the company of the Highlanders; (quære, Alan, dost thou derive the courage thou makest such boast of from a hereditary source?)—and stories of Rob Roy Macgregor, and Sergeant Alan Mhor Cameron,* have served to paint them in still more sable colours to his imagination.

Now, from all, I can understand, these ideas, as applied to the present state of the country, are absolutely chimerical. The Pretender is no more remembered in the Highlands, than if the poor gentleman were gathered to his hundred and eight fathers, whose portraits adorn the ancient walls of Holyrood; the broadswords have passed into other hands; the targets are used to cover the butter churns; and the race has sunk, or is fast sinking, from ruffling bullies into tame cheaters. Indeed, it was partly my conviction that there is little to be seen in the north, which, arriving at your father's conclusion, though from different premises, inclined my course in this direction, where perhaps I shall see us little.

One thing, however, I have seen; and it was with pleasure the more indescribable, that I was debarred from treading the land which my eyes were permitted to gaze upon, like those of the dying prophet from the top of Mount Pisgah,—I have seen, in a word, the fruitful shores of merry England; merry England! of which I boast myself a native, and on which I gaze, even while raging floods and unstable quicksands divide us, with the filial affection of a dutiful son.

Thou canst not have forgotten, Alan—for when didst thou ever forget what was interesting to thy friend?—that the same letter from my friend Griffiths, which doubled my income, and placed my motions at my own free disposal, contained a prohibitory clause, by which, reason none assigned, I was interdicted, as I respected my present safety and future fortunes, from visiting England; every other part of the British dominions, and a tour, if I pleased, on the continent, being left to my own choice.—Where is the tale, Alan, of a covered dish in the midst of a royal banquet, upon which the eyes of every guest were immediately fixed, neglecting all the dainties with which the table was loaded? This clause of banishment from England—from my native country—from the land of the brave, and the wise, and the free—affects me more than I am rejoiced by the freedom and independence assigned to me in all other respects. Thus in seeking this extreme boundary of the country which I am forbidden to tread, I resemble the poor tethered horse which, you may have observed, is always grazing on the very verge of the circle in which it is limited by its halter.

Do not accuse me of romance for obeying this impulse towards the South; nor suppose that, to gratify the imaginary longing of an idle curiosity, I am in any danger of risking the solid comforts of my present condition. Whoever has hitherto taken charge of my motions, has shown me, by convincing proofs, more weighty than the assurances which they have withheld, that my real advantage is their principal object. I should be, therefore, worse than a fool did I object to their authority, even when it seems somewhat capriciously exercised; for assuredly, at my age, I might—intrusted as I am with the care and management of myself in every other particular—expect that the cause of excluding me from England should be frankly and fairly stated for my own consideration and guidance. However, I will not grumble about the matter. I shall know the whole story one day, I suppose; and perhaps, as you sometimes surmise, I shall not find there is any mighty matter in it after all.

Yet one cannot help wondering—but, plague on it, if I wonder any longer, my letter will be as full of wonders as one of Katterfelto's advertisements. I have a month's mind, instead of this damnable iteration of guesses and forebodings, to give thee the history of a little adventure which befel me yesterday; though I am sure you will, as usual, turn the opposite end of the spy-glass on my poor narrative, and reduce, more tuo, to the most petty trivialities, the circumstances to which thou accusest me of giving undue consequence. Hang thee, Alan, thou art an unfit confidant for a youthful gallant with some spice of imagination, as the old taciturn secretary of Facardin of Trebizond. Nevertheless, we must each perform our separate destinies. I am doomed to act, and tell:—thou like a Dutchman, enclosed in the same Diligence with a Gascon, to hear, and shrug thy shoulders.

Of Dumfries, the capital town of this county, I have but little to say, and will not abuse your patience by reminding you, that it is built on the gallant river Nith, and that its churchyard, the highest place of the whole town, commands an extensive and fine prospect. Neither will I take the traveller's privilege of inflicting upon you the whole history of Bruce poniarding the Red Comyn in the Church of the

* Of Rob Roy we have had more than enough. Alan Cameron, commonly called Sergeant Mhor, a freebooter of the same period, was equally remarkable for strength, courage, and generosity.

Dominicans at this place, and becoming a king and patriot, because he had been a church-breaker and a murderer. The present Dumfriesers remember and justify the deed, observing, it was only a papist church—in evidence whereof, its walls have been so completely demolished, that no vestiges of them remain. They are a sturdy set of true-blue Presbyterians, these burghers of Dumfries; men after your father's own heart, zealous for the Protestant succession—the rather that many of the great families around are suspected to be of a different way of thinking, and shared, a great many of them, in the insurrection of the Fifteen, and some in the more recent business of the Forty-five. The town itself suffered in the latter era; for Lord Elcho, with a large party of the rebels, levied a severe contribution upon Dumfries, on account of the citizens having annoyed the rear of the Chevalier during his march into England.

Many of these particulars I learned from Provost C—, who, happening to see me in the market-place, remembered that I was an intimate of your father's, and very kindly asked me to dinner. Pray tell your father that the effects of his kindness to me follow me every where. I became tired, however, of this pretty town in the course of twenty-four hours, and rept along the coast eastwards, amusing myself with looking out for objects of antiquity, and sometimes making, or attempting to make, use of my new angling-rod. By the way, old Cotton's instructions, by which I hoped to qualify myself for one of the gentle society of anglers, are not worth a farthing in this meridian. I learned this by mere accident, after I had waited four mortal hours. I shall never forget an invidious urchin, a cowherd, about twelve years old, without either brogue or bonnet, barelegged, and with a very indifferent pair of breeches—how the villain grinned in scorn at my landing-net, my plummet, and the gorgeous jury of flies which I had assembled to destroy all the fish in the river. I was induced at last to lend the rod to the sneering scoundrel, to see what he would make of it; and he not only half filled my basket in an hour, but literally taught me to kill two trout with my own hand. This, and Sam having found the hay and oats, not forgetting the ale, very good at this small inn, first made me take the fancy of resting here for a day or two; and I have got my grinning blackguard of a Piscator leave to attend on me, by paying sixpence a-day for a herdboy in his stead.

A notably clean Englishwoman keeps this small house, and my bedroom is sweetened with lavender, has a clean sash-window, and the walls are, moreover, adorned with ballads of Fair Rosamond and Cruel Barbara Allan. The woman's accent, though uncouth enough, sounds yet kindly in my ear; for I have never yet forgotten the desolate effect produced on my infant organs, when I heard on all sides your slow and broad northern pronunciation, which was to me the tone of a foreign land. I am sensible I myself have since that time acquired Scotch in perfection, and many a Scotticism withal. Still the sound of the English accentuation comes to my ears as the tones of a friend; and even when heard from the mouth of some wandering beggar, it has seldom failed to charm forth my mite. You Scotch, who are so proud of your own nationality, must make due allowance for that of other folks.

On the next morning I was about to set forth to the stream where I had commenced angler the night before, but was prevented by a heavy shower of rain, from stirring abroad the whole forenoon; during all which time I heard my varlet of a guide as loud with his blackguard jokes in the kitchen, as a footman in the shilling gallery;—so little are modesty and innocence the inseparable companions of rusticity and seclusion.

When after dinner the day cleared, and we at length sallied out to the river side, I found myself subjected to a new trick on the part of my accomplished preceptor. Apparently, he liked fishing himself better than the trouble of instructing an awkward novice, such as I; and in hopes of exhausting my patience, and inducing me to resign the rod, as I had done on the preceding day, my friend contrived to keep me thrashing the water more than an hour with a point-lees hook. I detected this trick at last, by observing the rogue grinning with delight when he saw a large trout rise and dash harmless away from the angle. I gave him a sound cuff, Alan; but the next moment was sorry, and, to make amends, yielded possession of the fishing-rod for the rest of the evening, he undertaking to bring me home a dish of trout for my supper, in atonement for his offences.

Having thus got honourably rid of the trouble of amusing myself in a way I cared not for, I turned my steps towards the sea, or rather the Solway Frith, which here separates the two sister kingdoms, and which lay at about a mile's distance, by a pleasant walk over sandy knolls, covered with short herbage, which you call Links, and we English, Downs.

But the rest of my adventure would weary out my fingers, and must be deferred until to-morrow, when you shall hear from me by way of continuation; and, in the mean while, to prevent overhasty conclusions, I must just hint to you, we are but yet on the verge of the adventure which it is my purpose to communicate.

LETTER IV.

THE SAME TO THE SAME.

Shepherd's Bush.

I MENTIONED in my last, that having abandoned my fishing-rod as an unprofitable implement, I crossed over the open downs which divided me from the margin of the Solway. When I reached the banks of the great estuary, which are here very bare and exposed, the waters had receded from the large and level space of sand, through which a stream, now feeble and fordable, found its way to the ocean. The whole was illuminated by the beams of the low and setting sun, who showed his ruddy front like a warrior prepared for defence, over a huge battlemented and turreted wall of crimson and black clouds, which appeared like an immense Gothic fortress, into which the lord of day was descending. His setting rays glimmered bright upon the wet surface of the sands, and the numberless pools of water by which it was covered, where the inequality of the ground had occasioned their being left by the tide.

The scene was animated by the exertions of a number of horsemen, who were actually employed in hunting salmon. Ay, Alan, lift up your hands and eyes as you will, I can give their mode of fishing no name so appropriate; for they chased the fish at full gallop, and struck them with their barbed spears, as you see hunters spearing boars in the old tapestry. The salmon, to be sure, take the thing more quietly than the boars; but they are so swift in their own element, that to pursue and strike them is the task of a good horseman, with a quick eye, a determined hand, and full command both of his horse and weapon. The shouts of the fellows as they galloped up and down in the animating exercise—their loud bursts of laughter when any of their number caught a fall—and still louder acclamations when any of the party made a capital stroke with his lance—gave so much animation to the whole scene, that I caught the enthusiasm of the sport, and ventured forward a considerable space on the sands. The feats of one horseman, in particular, called forth so repeatedly the clamorous applause of his companions, that the very banks rang again with their shouts. He was a tall man, well mounted on a strong black horse, which he caused to turn and wind like a bird in the air, carried a longer spear than the others, and wore a sort of fur cap or bonnet, with a short feather in it, which gave him on the whole, rather a superior appearance to the other fishermen. He seemed to hold some sort of authority among them, and occasionally directed their motions both by voice and hand; at which times I thought his gestures were striking, and his voice uncommonly sonorous and commanding.

The riders began to make for the shore, and the interest of the scene was almost over, while I lingered on the sands, with my looks turned to the shores of England, still gilded by the sun's last rays, view of the cottage walls, which I had hitherto only seen dimly by the light of the fire. The bink,* with its usual arrangement of pewter and earthen-ware, which was most strictly and critically clean, glanced back the flame of the lamp merrily from one side of the apartment. In a recess, formed by the small bow of a latticed window, was a large writing-desk of walnut-tree wood, curiously carved, above which arose shelves of the same, which supported a few books and papers. The opposite side of the recess contained (as far as I could discern, for it lay in shadow, and I could at any rate have seen it but imperfectly from the place where I was seated) one or two guns, together with swords, pistols, and other arms—a collection which, in a poor cottage, and in a country so peaceful, appeared singular at least, if not even somewhat suspicious.

All these observations, you may suppose, were made much sooner than I have recorded, or you (if you have not skipped) have been able to read them. They were already finished, and I was considering how I should open some communication with the mute inhabitants of the mansion, when my conductor re-entered from the side-door by which he had made his exit.

He had now thrown off his rough riding-cap, and his coarse jockey-coat, and stood before me in a gray jerkin trimmed with black, which sat close to, and set off, his large and sinewy frame, and a pair of trowsers, of a lighter colour, cut as close to the body as they are used by Highlandmen. His whole dress was of finer cloth than that of the old man; and his linen, so minute was my observation, clean and unsullied. His shirt was without ruffles, and tied at the collar with a black riband, which showed his strong and muscular neck rising from it, like that of an ancient Hercules. His head was small, with a large forehead, and well-formed ears. He wore neither peruke nor hair-powder; and his chestnut locks curling close to his head, like those of an antique statue, showed not the least touch of time, though the owner must have been at least fifty. His features were high and prominent in such a degree, that one knew not whether to term them harsh or handsome. In either case, the sparkling gray eye, aquiline nose, and well-formed mouth, combined to render his physiognomy noble and expressive. An air of sadness, or severity, or of both, seemed to indicate a melancholy, and, at the same time, a haughty temper. I could not help running mentally over the ancient heroes, to whom I might assimilate the noble form and countenance before me. He was too young, and evinced too little resignation to his fate, to resemble Belisarius. Coriolanus, standing by the hearth of Tullus Aufidius, came nearer the mark; yet the gloomy and haughty look of the stranger had, perhaps, still more of Marius, seated among the ruins of Carthage.

While I was lost in these imaginations, my host stood by the fire, gazing on me with the same attention which I paid to him, until, embarrassed by his look, I was about to break silence at all hazards. But the supper, now placed upon the table, reminded me, by its appearance, of those wants which I had almost forgotten while I was gazing on the fine form of my conductor. He spoke at length, and I almost started at the deep rich tone of his voice, though what he said was but to invite me to sit down to the table. He himself assumed the seat of honour, beside which the silver flagon was placed, and beckoned to me to sit beside him.

Thou knowest thy father's strict and excellent domestic discipline has trained me to hear the invocation of a blessing before we break the daily bread, for which we are taught to pray—I paused a moment, and, without designing to do so, I suppose my manner made him sensible of what I expected. The two domestics, or inferiors, as I should have before observed, were already seated at the bottom of the table, when my host shot a glance of a very peculiar expression towards the old man, observing, with something approaching to a sneer, "Cristal Nixon, say grace—the gentleman expects one."

* The frame of wooden shelves placed in a Scottish kitchen for holding plates.

"The foul fiend shall be clerk, and say amen, when I turn chaplain," growled out the party addressed, in tones which might have become the condition of a dying bear; "if the gentleman is a whig, he may please himself with his own mummary. My faith is neither in word nor writ, but in barley bread and brown ale."

"Mabel Moffat," said my guide, looking at the old woman, and raising his sonorous voice, probably because she was hard of hearing, "canst thou ask a blessing upon our victuals?"

The old woman shook her head, kissed the cross which hung from her rosary, and was silent.

"Mabel will say grace for no heretic," said the master of the house, with the same latent sneer on his brow and in his accent.

At the same moment, the side-door already mentioned opened, and the young woman (so she proved) whom I had first seen at the door of the cottage, advanced a little way into the room, then stopped bashfully, as if she had observed that I was looking at her, and asked the master of the house, "if he had called?"

"Not louder than to make old Mabel hear me," he replied; "and yet," he added, as she turned to retire, "it is a shame a stranger should see a house where not one of the family can or will say a grace,—do thou be our chaplain."

The girl, who was really pretty, came forward with timid modesty, and apparently unconscious that she was doing any thing uncommon, pronounced the benediction in a silver-toned voice, and with affecting simplicity—her cheek colouring just so much as to show, that, on a less solemn occasion, she would have felt more embarrassed.

Now, if thou expectest a fine description of this young woman, Alan Fairford, in order to entitle thee to taunt me with having found a Dulcinea in the inhabitant of a fisherman's cottage on the Solway Firth, thou shalt be disappointed; for, having said she seemed very pretty, and that she was a sweet and gentle-speaking creature, I have said all concerning her that I can tell thee. She vanished when the benediction was spoken.

My host, with a muttered remark on the cold of our ride, and the keen air of the Solway Sands, to which he did not seem to wish an answer, loaded my plate from Mabel's grillade, which, with a large wooden bowl of potatoes, formed our whole meal. A sprinkling from the lemon gave a much higher zest than the usual condiment of vinegar; and I promise you that whatever I might hitherto have felt, either of curiosity or suspicion, did not prevent me from making a most excellent supper, during which but passed betwixt me and my entertainer, unless that he did the usual honours of the table with courtesy, indeed, but without even the affectation of hearty hospitality, which those in his (apparent) condition generally affect on such occasions, even when they do not actually feel it. On the contrary, his manner seemed that of a polished landlord towards an unexpected and unwelcome guest, whom for the sake of his own credit, he receives with civility, but without either good-will or cheerfulness.

If you ask how I learned all this, I cannot tell you; nor, were I to write down at length the insignificant intercourse which took place between us, would it perhaps serve to justify these observations. It is sufficient to say, that in helping his dogs, which he did from time to time with great liberality, he seemed to discharge a duty much more pleasing to himself, than when he paid the same attention to his guest. Upon the whole, the result on my mind was as I tell it you.

When supper was over, a small case-bottle of brandy, in a curious frame of silver filigree, circulated to the guests. I had already taken a small glass of the liquor, and, when it had passed to Mabel and to Cristal, and was again returned to the upper end of the table, I could not help taking the bottle in my hand, to look more at the armorial bearings, which were chased with considerable taste on the silver framework. Encountering the eye of my entertainer, I instantly saw that my curiosity was highly distasteful; he frowned, bit his lip, and showed such uncontrollable signs of impatience, that, setting the bottle immediately down, I attempted some apology. To this he did not deign either to reply, or even to listen; and Cristal, at a signal from his master, removed the object of my curiosity, as well as the cup, upon which the same arms were engraved.

There ensued an awkward pause, which I endeavoured to break by observing, that "I feared my intrusion upon his hospitality had put his family to some inconvenience."

"I hope you see no appearance of it, sir," he replied, with cold civility. "What inconvenience a family so retired as ours may suffer from receiving an unexpected guest, is like to be trifling, in comparison of what the visiter himself sustains from want of his accustomed comforts. So far, therefore, as our connexion stands, our accounts stand clear."

Notwithstanding this discouraging reply, I blundered on, as is usual in such cases, wishing to appear civil, and being, perhaps, in reality the very reverse. "I was afraid," I said, "that my presence had banished one of the family" (looking at the side-door) "from his table."

"If," he coldly replied, "I meant the young woman whom I had seen in the apartment, he bid me observe that there was room enough at the table for her to have seated herself, and meat enough, such as it was, for her supper. I might, therefore, be assured, if she had chosen it, she would have supped with us."

There was no dwelling on this or any other topic longer; for my entertainer, taking up the lamp, observed, that, "my wet clothes might reconcile me for the night to their custom of keeping early hours; that he was under the necessity of going abroad by peep of day to-morrow morning, and would call me up at the same time, to point out the way by which I was to return to the Shepherd's Bush."

This left no opening for farther explanation; nor was there room for it on the usual terms of civility; for, as he neither asked my name, nor expressed the least interest concerning my condition, I—the obliged person—had no pretence to trouble him with such inquiries on my part.

He took up the lamp, and led me through the side-door into a very small room, where a bed had been hastily arranged for my accommodation, and, putting down the lamp, directed me to leave my wet clothes on the outside of the door, that they might be exposed to the fire during the night. He then left me, having muttered something which was meant to pass for good-night.

I obeyed his directions with respect to my clothes, the rather that, in despite of the spirits which I had drunk, I felt my teeth begin to chatter, and received various hints from an anguish feeling, that a town-bred youth, like myself, could not at once rush into all the hardihood of country sports with impunity. But my bed, though coarse and hard, was dry and clean; and I soon was so little occupied with my heats and tremors, as to listen with interest to a heavy foot which seemed to be that of my landlord, traversing the boards (there was no ceiling, as you may believe) which roofed my apartment. Light glancing through these rude planks became visible as soon as my lamp was extinguished; and as the noise of the slow, solemn, and regular step continued, and I could distinguish that the person turned and returned as he reached the end of the apartment, it seemed clear to me that the walker was engaged in no domestic occupation, but merely pacing to and fro for his own pleasure. "An odd amusement this," I thought, "for one who had been engaged at least a part of the preceding day in violent exercise, and who talked of rising by the peep of dawn on the ensuing morning."

Mean time I heard the storm, which had been brewing during the evening, begin to descend with a vengeance; sounds, as of distant thunder, (the noise of the more distant waves, doubtless, on the shore,) mingled with the roaring of the neighbouring torrent, and with the crashing, groaning, and even screaming of the trees in the glen, whose boughs were tormented by the gale. Within the house, windows clattered, and doors clapped, and the walls, though sufficiently substantial for a building of the kind, seemed to me to totter in the tempest.

But still the heavy steps perambulating the apartment over my head, were distinctly heard amid the roar and fury of the elements. I thought more than once I even heard a groan; but I frankly own, that, placed in this unusual situation, my fancy may have misled me. I was tempted several times to call aloud, and ask whether the turmoil around us did not threaten danger to the building which we inhabited; but when I thought of the secluded and unsocial master of the dwelling, who seemed to avoid human society, and to remain unperturbed amid the elemental war, it seemed that to speak to him at that moment, would have been to address the spirit of the tempest himself, since no other being, I thought, could have remained calm and tranquil while winds and waters were thus raging around.

In process of time, fatigue prevailed over anxiety and curiosity. The storm abated, or my senses became deadened to its terrors, and I fell asleep ere yet the mysterious paces of my host had ceased to shake the flooring over my head.

It might have been expected that the novelty of my situation, although it did not prevent my slumbers, would have at least diminished their profoundness, and shortened their duration. It proved otherwise, however; for I never slept more soundly in my life, and only awoke when, at morning dawn, my landlord shook me by the shoulder, and dispelled some dream, of which, fortunately for you, I have no recollection, otherwise you would have been favoured with it, in hopes you might have proved a second Daniel upon the occasion.

"You sleep sound"—said his full deep voice; "ere five years have rolled over your head, your slumbers will be lighter—unless ere then you are wrapped in the sleep which is never broken."

"How!" said I, starting up in the bed; "do you know any thing of me—of my prospects—of my views in life?"

"Nothing," he answered, with a grim smile; "but it is evident you are entering upon the world young, inexperienced, and full of hopes, and I do but prophesy to you what I would to any one in your condition.—But come; there lie your clothes—a brown crust and a draught of milk wait you, if you choose to break your fast; but you must make haste."

"I must first," I said, "take the freedom to spend a few minutes alone, before beginning the ordinary works of the day."

"Oh!—humph!—I cry your devotions pardon," he replied, and left the apartment.

Alan, there is something terrible about this man.

I joined him, as I had promised, in the kitchen where we had supped over night, where I found the articles which he had offered me for breakfast, without butter or any other addition.

He walked up and down while I partook of the bread and milk; and the slow measured weighty step seemed identified with those which I had heard last night. His pace, from its funereal slowness, seemed to keep time with some current of internal passion, dark, slow, and unchanged.—"We run and leap by the side of a lively and bubbling brook," thought I, internally, "as if we would run a race with it; but beside waters deep, slow, and lonely, our pace is sullen and silent as their course. What thoughts may be now corresponding with that furrowed brow, and bearing time with that heavy step?"

"If you have finished," said he, looking up to me with a glance of impatience, as he observed that I ate no longer, but remained with my eyes fixed upon him, "I wait to show you the way."

We went out together, no individual of the family having been visible excepting my landlord. I was disappointed of the opportunity which I watched for of giving some gratuity to the domestics, as they seemed to be. As for offering any recompense to the Master of the Household, it seemed to me impossible to have attempted it.

What would I have given for a share in thy composure, who wouldst have thrust half-a-crown into a man's hand whose necessities seemed to crave it, conscious that you did right in making the proffer and not caring expenses whether you hurt the feelings of him whom you meant to serve! I saw thee once give a penny to a man with a long beard, who from the dignity of his exterior might have represented Solon. I had not thy courage, and therefore I made no tender to my mysterious host, although notwithstanding his display of silver vessels, and around the house bespoke narrow circumstances, I felt actual poverty.

We left the place together. But I hear thee over-hear thy very new and appropriate ejaculation, Ohe, jam outie! The rest for another time. Perhaps I may delay farther communication till I learn how my favours are valued.

LETTER V.

ALAN FAIRFORD TO DARRIE LATIMER.

I have thy two last epistles, my dear Darrin, and expecting the third, have been in no hurry to answer them. Do not think my silence ought to be ascribed to my failing to take interest in them, for, truly, they came (though the task was difficult) thy usual epistles. Since the moon call who earliest discovered the Pandemonium of Milton is an expiring wood-fire—since the first ingenious archer who blew bubbles out of soap and water, thou, my best of friends, has the highest knack at making histories out of nothing. Wert thou to plant the bean in the nursery tale, thou wouldest make out, so soon as it begins to germinate that the castle of the giant was about to elevate its battlements on the top of it. All that happens it thus give a touch of the wonderful and the sublime from thy own rich imagination. Darrin ever are what artists call a Claude Lorraine glass, which spreads its own particular hue over the whole landscape which you see through it?—thou beholdest ordinary events just through such a medium.

I have looked carefully at the facts of thy last long letter and they are just such as might have befallen any little truant of the High School, who had got down to Leith Sands, gone beyond the grove, and was his hope and shewn, and, finally had been carried home, in compassion, by some daylighted fishwife, crying all the while the trouble which the boat once signed her.

I admire the figure which thou must have made, sleeping for dead life behind the old fellow's back—thy jaws clattering with fear thy muscles cramped with anxiety. Thy execrable supper of broiled salmon, which was enough to insure the nightmare's regular visits for a twelvemonth, may be termed a real affliction; but as for the storm of Thursday last, (such, I observe, was the date,) it roared, whistled, howled, and bellowed, as fearfully amongst the old chimney-heads in the Candlemaker-row, as it could on the Solway shore, for the very wind of it—ante pro totum nortem vigilante. And then in the morning again, when—Lord help you!—in your sentimental delicacy you bid the poor man adieu, without even tendering him a half a crown for supper and lodging!

You laugh at me for giving a penny (to be accurate, though, thou shouldst have said supper) to an old fellow, whom thou, in thy high flight, wouldest have sent home supperless, because he was like Solon or Calistinus. But you forget that the affront descended like a benediction into the pouch of the old gaberlunna, who overflowed in blessings upon the generous donor—Long ere he would have thanked thee, Darrin, for thy barren veneration of his beard and his bearing. Then you laugh at my good father's retreat from Falkirk, just as if it were not time for a man to trudge when three or four mountain knaves, with naked claymores, and heads as light as their fingers, were clumping after him, crying Surinick. You remember what he said himself when the Laird of Buchlivet told him that Surinick signified "stay a while." "What the devil," he said, surprised out of his Presbyterian superstition by the unreasonableness of such a request under the circumstances, "would the rounds be have had me stop to have my head cut off?"

ask yourself whether you would not exert yourself so fast as you did in flying from the Solway. And yet you upbraid my father's courage! I tell you he has courage enough to do what is right, and to spare what is wrong—courage enough to defend a righteous cause with hand and sword, and to take the part of the poor man against his oppressor without fear of the consequences. Darrin! This is old courage, Darrin, and it is of little consequence to any man in this age and country, whether they ever possess military courage or no.

Do not think I am angry with you, though I too attempt to rectify your opinion on my father's account. I am well aware that, upon the whole, he was regarded with more respect by me than by thee. And while I am in a serene humour, which is difficult to preserve with one who is perpetually tempting me to laugh at him, pray dearest Darrin, not thy ardour for adventure carry thee into such scrapes as that of the Solway Sands. The end of the story is a more dingy nature; but the same evening might have proved, as the clown says to let a "naughty night to swim in."

As for the rest, if you can work my opinion and manner home out of old cross-grained notions, let I for one will reap some advantage by the manner phantoms. Yet hold! even there, there is danger and caution. This same female chaplain, has said a little of her, and so much of every one else, that it rises some doubt in my mind. I very rarely do a wrong—and that is all thy complaint infers. There are cases in which a man might be set up than content. Wert thou enamoured of a girl, Darrin, to trust thyself with the grace of the very great seer?—As I live, thou bristhest! What I do not know thee an inveterate admirer of Darrin, as have I not been in thy confidence? An elegant and displayed when the rest of the figure was within a cordal, or a neat well turned ankle and leg, as by chance as its owner tripped up the (the) Clown, turned thy back for eight days. Thou once caught, if I remember right, with a single glance of a single matchless eye, which was to her owner withdrew her eye, proved to be a girl, the literal sense of the word. And besides, even not another time enamoured of a man, a man who that mingled in the palmistry of the (the) Clown Church—and you discovered the presence of its dulcet organ to be Miss Dolly, Miss Dolly, who was "back and breast," as our saying goes!

All these things considered, and I confess of thy awful silence on the subject of this growing Nerd of thine, I must beg thee to be more right upon that subject in thy next, unless thou wilt have me form the conclusion that thou thinkest of her then thou carest to talk of.

You will not expect much news from the quarter, as you know the monotony of my life, and as ever I must at present be devoted to uninterrupted sleep. You have read a thousand times, that I am only glad to make my way by dint of plodding, and to have sleep I must.

My father seems to be more impatient of my service than he was after your first departure. I remember I believe that our military men's war is light which is not my humour, as was to be seen from and from his melancholy, as men do when the of the sun is no longer upon the landscape. I sit thus with him, thou mayest imagine it is as if I were with me, and cannot conceive how much I feel that thy Solie were ended, and that thou were my inmate.

I resume my pen, after a few hours' sleep, and that an accident has occurred, on which you will find he building a hundred castles in the air. I am even I jealous as I am of my father's health, I do not bet own, affords ground for singular views.

My father has of late taken the pleasure of walking with him when he attends to his work, as he used to me the property intended into the garden, and of business. I even I find something as he used to.

* Of old the glass pointed also toward the east, and came between the high street and the common street.

and my own from this over anxiety, which, I dare say, renders me both ridiculous. But what signifies my reverberance? my father drags me up to his counsel learned in the law—"Are you quite ready to come on to-day, Mr. Crossbute?—This is my son, designed for the bar—I take the liberty to bring him with me to-day to the consultation, merely that he may see how things are managed."

Mr. Crossbute bowed and down, as a lawyer smiles on the solicitor who employs him, and I dare say, thrust his tongue into his cheek, and whispers into the first great wig that passed him, "What the d—! does old Parford mean by letting loose his whip on me?"

As I stood beside them, too much vexed at the childish part I was made to play to derive much information from the valuable arguments of Mr. Crossbute, I observed a rather elderly man, who stood with his eyes firmly bent on my father as if he only waited on end of the business in which he was engaged, to address him. There was something, I thought, in the gentleman's appearance which commanded attention. Yet his dress was not in the present taste, and though it had once been magnificent, was now antiquated and unfashionable. His coat was of branched velvet, with a train being a waistcoat of violet-coloured silk, much embroidered, his breeches the same stuff as the coat. He wore square-tied shoes, with foretops, as they are called, and his silk stockings were rolled up over his knees, as you may have seen in pictures, and here and there on some of these originals who seem to prize themselves on dressing after the mode of Methusalem. A shagreen bree and sword necessarily completed his equipment, which, though out of date, showed that it belonged to a man of distinction.

The instant Mr. Crossbute had ended what he had to say, the gentleman walked up to my father, with, "Your servant, Mr. Parford—it is long since you and I met."

My father, whose politeness, you know, is exact and formal, bowed, and hummed, and was confused, and at length pronounced that the distance since they had met was so great, that though he remembered the face perfectly the name, he was sorry to say, had—namely—somehow—scraped his memory.

"Have you forgot Herbert of Burrowsworth?" said the gentleman, and my father bowed even more profoundly than before, though I think his reception of the old friend seemed to lose some of the respectful civility which he bestowed on him while his name was yet unknown. It now seemed to be something like the lip-courtesy which the heart would have denied had ceremony permitted.

My father, however, again bowed low, and hoped to see him well.

"So well, my good Mr. Parford, that I come hither determined to renew my acquaintance with one or two old friends, and with you in the first place—I met at my old nursing place—you must dine with me to-day at Paterson's, at the head of the Flower Wynd—it is near your new fashionable dwelling, and I have business with you."

My father excused himself respectfully, and not without embarrassment—"he was particularly engaged at home."

"Then I will dine with you, man," said Mr. Herbert of Burrowsworth, "the few minutes you can spare me this dinner will suffice for my business; and I will prevent you a moment from sending your own—no little man."

As he have often remarked that my father, though a zealous observer of the rules of hospitality, seems to regard them rather as a duty than as a pleasure, I should, but for a conscientious wish to feed the hungry, remove the stranger, his doors would open to much colder than is the case. I never saw among an example of this peculiarity, (which I could otherwise have said is catalogued in your dictionary,) as in his mode of homologating the self-revocation of Mr. Herbert. The embarrassed smile, and the attempt at a smile which accompanied the "We will expect the honour of seeing you in the King's Arms at three o'clock," could not drive me away, and did not impose upon the old Lord. It was with a look of anger that he replied, "I will relieve you then till that hour, Mr. Parford," and his whole manner seemed to say, "It is my pleasure to dine with you, and I care not whether I am welcome or no."

When he turned away I asked my father who he was.

"An unfortunate gentleman," was the reply.

"He looks pretty well on his misfortune," replied I. "I should not have supposed that so gay an outside was lacking a dinner."

"Who told you that he dined?" replied my father; "he is such a suspicious major, so far as worldly circumstances are concerned—it is to be hoped he makes a good use of them, though, if he does, it will be for the first time in his life."

He has then been an irregular liver?" inquired I.

My father replied by that famous bearded with which he adorned all unacceptable queries, turning to the slightest degree upon the feelings of our neighbours. "If we mend our own faults, Alan, we shall all of us have enough to do, without sitting in judgment upon other folks."

Here I was again at fault; but rallying once more, I observed, he had the air of a man of high rank and family.

"He is well entitled," said my father, "representing Herbert of Burrowsworth, a branch of that great and once powerful family of Herbert, the elder branch whose descent is in the house of Nubendale at the death of Lord Robert the Philosopher, Anno Domini sixteen hundred and eighty-seven."

"Has he still," said I, "his paternal estate of Burrowsworth?"

"No," replied my father, "so far back as his father's time, it was a mere designation—the property being forfeited by Herbert Herbert following his kinship the Earl of Derwentwater, to the Pretension affair in 1714. But they keep up the designation, thinking, doubtless, that their claims may be revived in some favourable names for Jacobites and for Popery; and folks who in no way partake of their fantastic capricious, do yet allow it to pass unchallenged, or, at least, if not as mischievous. But were he the Pope and the Pretender both, we must get some dinner ready for him, since he has thought fit to offer himself. So hasten home, my lad, and tell Hannah, Cook, Eggs, and James Williamson to do their best; and do then look out a pint or two of Maxwell's best—it is in the fifth bin—there are the keys of the wine-cellar—Do not leave them in the lock—you know poor James's failing, though he is an honest creature under all other temptations—and I have but two bottles of the old brandy left—we must keep it for medicine, Alan."

Away went I made my preparations—the hour of dinner came, and so did Mr. Herbert of Burrowsworth.

If I had the power of imagination and description, Darna, I could make out a long, dark, mysterious, Rembrandt-looking portrait of this same stranger, which should be as far superior to thy Sahrmann, as a shirt of chain-mail is to a herring net. I can assure you there is some matter for description about him; but knowing my own imperfections, I can only say, I thought him eminently disagreeable and ill-bred. No, ill-bred is not the proper word, on the contrary, he appeared to know the rules of good breeding perfectly and only to think that the rank of the company did not require that he should attend to them—a view of the matter infinitely more offensive than if his behaviour had been that of uneducated and proper rudeness. While my father said grace, the Lord did all but whistle aloud, and when I, at my father's desire, returned thanks, he used his toothpick, as if he had wasted that moment for its career.

So much for that—with King, matters went over worse. My father, thou knowest, is particularly full of deference to his guests, and in the present case, he seemed more than usually desirous to escape every room of dispute. He so far compromised his loyalty, as to announce merely "The King," as his first toast after dinner instead of the emphatic "King George," which is his usual formula. Our guest made a motion with his glass, as if to pass it over the water-dropper which stood beside him, and added, "Over the water."

beared that the rider who approached us quickly horse's pace from a slow trot to a walk, so as to suffer us to proceed, or at least to avoid ing us at a spot where the difficulty of doing so have brought us very close to each other. You my old sailing. Alas, and that I am always will-attend to any thing in preference to the individual him for the true possession of the conversation suddenly to this available propensity, I was inter-operating concerning the cause of the rider ing aloof from us when my companion, elevatin deep voice as suddenly and as sternly as at to recall my wandering thoughts, exclaimed, the name of the devil, young men, do you think others have no better use for their time than you , that you sit here to repeat the same thing to them times over? Do you see I any wonder at a mile's distance, that looks like a danger-or rather like a gallows? I would it had a ringed foot hanging upon it, as an example to all enjoy moon-calves!—You gibbet-looking pole guide you to the bridge where you must pass the brook, then proceed straight forward, till you reach the divide of a cairn. Plunge on then, then steering again?

It is indeed quite true, that at this moment the man approached us, and my attention was called to him as I made way to let him pass.
His countenance showed at once that he belonged to some of the Friends, or to the world and the law call them, Quakers. A strong and sun-grey galloway, shaven, by its sleek and good tune, that the powerful man was powerful to his
t. His countenance was in the usual position, but clean and uncreased order, which attest to some serious. His long surtout of grey superfine cloth descended down to the knee of his leg, and was buttoned up to his chin, and his hand against the morning air. An usual his of heavy being down without broken or loop, and ed a comely and placid countenance, the gravity and appeared to contain some something of his
, and had nothing in common with the parched countenance affected by deviance in general. The was open and free from wrinkles, whether of or hypocrisy. The eye was clear, calm, and contained yet appeared to be disturbed by apprehension as my hearer pronounced the usual saluta-tion. "I wish thee a good morrow, friend," he said, by turning his pale face close to one side of the of wish to glide past us with as little trouble as -able—just as a traveller would choose to pass a all of whose possible attentions he is by no as confident.

My friend, not meaning, perhaps, that he should to easily put his horse quite across the path, it, without plunging into the slough, or even up the bank, the Quaker could not have passed.
Neither of them was an experiment without ed greater than the passenger seemed willing to He halted, therefore, as if waiting till my com-rades should make way for him, and, as they did ing each other I could not help thinking that might have formed no bad emblem of Peace and for although my conduct was unarmad, yet
-hills of his manner, his stern look, and his ap-parent on horseback, were entirely those of a Quaker.
He accented the Quaker in three
-s. So he? friend Joshua—then art early to -God this morning. Has the spirit moved this -day righteous brethren to act with some honesty
-shall down yonder tale-note that keep the fish
-coming up the river?"

"Early friend, not so," answered Joshua, firmly
-doubtfully at the same time; "then can-not that our own hands should pull down what -own power established. These kelpies the fish
-open line and cable-art; and we, with arms
-with nets, which work by the ebb and the flow
-the tide. Each doth what seems best in his eye
-secure a share of the blessing which Providence
-has poured on the river, and that within his own
-quid. I prefer such no quarrel against us, for thou
-d have no wrong at our hand."

"So answered I will take none at the hand of my man, whether he be coked or broad-brimmed," answered the fisherman. "I tell you in this -noon, Joshua Gaddan, that you and your partners are -using unlawful craft to destroy the fish in the highway
-by stake-nets and weirs, and that we, who fish fair-ly, and like men, as our fathers did, have daily and -early loss sport and loss profit. Do not think gravity -or hypocrisy can carry it off as you have done. The -world knows you, and we know you. You will de-stroy the salmon which make the livelihood of fifty -poor families, and then wipe your mouth, and go to -make a speech at Meeting. But do not hope it will -not thus. I give you fair warning, we will be upon -you one morning soon, when we will not leave a -stake standing in the pools of the highway; and down
-the side they shall every one go, and well if we do not -send a league along with them."

"Friend," replied Joshua, with a constrained smile,
"but that I know thou dost not mean as thou say'st,
I would tell thee we are under the protection of the -country's laws; nor do we the less trust to obtain their -protection, that our principles permit us not, by any
-set of violent resistance, to protect ourselves."

"All villainous cant and cowardice," exclaimed the -fisherman, and assumed merely as a cloak to your -hypocritical avices."

"Nay, say not cowardice, my friend," answered the -Quaker, "since thou knowest thou may be as much
-wounded in enduring as in avenging, and I will be judged
-by this youth, or by any one else, whether there is not -more courage—even in the opinion of that world
-where thoughts are the breath in thy nostrils—in the -armed oppressor, who doth injury, than in the -lawless and patient sufferer, who endureth it with -constancy."

"I will exchange no more words with you on the -subject," said the fisherman, who, as if something -moved at the last argument which Mr. Gaddan had -made, now made room for him to pass forward on his -course. "Do not forget, however," he added, "that -you have had fair warning, nor suppose that we will -accept of fair words in apology for foul play. These -nets of yours are unlawful—they spoil our fishings—
-and we will have them down at all risks and ex-pense. I am a man of my word, friend Joshua."

"I trust thou art," said the Quaker; "but thou art
-the rather bound to be cautious in rashly affirming
-what thou wilt never execute. For I tell thee, friend,
-that though there is as great a difference between a dog
-and one of our people, as there is between a lion and -a sheep, yet I know and believe thou hast as much of -the lion in thee, that thou wouldst scarce employ thy -strength and thy rage upon that which profumeth no -means of resistance. Report says as much good of -thee, at least, if it says little more."

"Time will try," answered the fisherman; "and
-hark thee, Joshua, before we part, I will put thee in -the way of doing one good deed, which, credit me, is -better than twenty moral speeches. Here is a stran-ger youth, whom heaven has so graciously gifted with -brains, that he will be wiser himself in the hands, as -he did last night, unless thou wilt kindly show him
-the way to Shepherd's Bush, for I have been in -vain endeavouring to make him comprehend the road
-thither—Hast thou no much charity under thy am-
-plificity, Quaker, as to do this good turn?"

"Nay, it is thou, friend," answered Joshua, "that
-dost lack charity to suppose any one unwilling to do
-so simple a kindness."

"Thou art right. I should have remembered it can -cost thee nothing. Young gentlemen, this stout pat-tern of primitive simplicity will teach thee the right
-way to the Shepherd's Bush—ay, and will himself
-show thee like a sheep, if you come to buying and -selling with him."

He then abruptly asked me how long I intended to -remain at Shepherd's Bush.

I replied I was at present uncertain—as long, pro-bably, as I could amuse myself in the neighbourhood.

"You are fond of sport?" he asked, in the same -tone of brief inquiry.

I answered in the affirmative, but added, I was in-
-tally inexperienced.

"Perhaps if you reside here for some days," he said, "we may meet again, and I may have the chance of giving you a lesson."

Ere I could express either thanks or assent, he turned short round with a wave of his hand, by way of adieu, and rode back to the verge of the dell from which we had emerged together; and as he remained standing upon the banks, I could long hear his voice while he shouted down to those within its recesses.

Mean while the Quaker and I proceeded on our journey for some time in silence; he restraining his sober-minded stead to a pace which might have suited a much less active walker than myself, and looking on me from time to time with an expression of curiosity, mingled with benignity. For my part, I cared not to speak first. It happened I had never before been in company with one of this particular sect, and, afraid that in addressing him I might unwittingly infringe upon some of their prejudices or peculiarities, I patiently remained silent. At length he asked me, whether I had been long in the service of the Laird, as men called him.

I repeated the words "in his service?" with such an accent of surprise, as induced him to say, "Nay, but, friend, I mean no offence; perhaps I should have said in his society—an inmate, I mean, in his house?"

"I am totally unknown to the person from whom we have just parted," said I, "and our connexion is only temporary—He had the charity to give me his guidance from the Sands, and a night's harbourage from the tempest. So our acquaintance began, and there it is likely to end; for you may observe that our friend is by no means apt to encourage familiarity."

"So little so," answered my companion, "that thy case is, I think, the first in which I ever heard of his receiving any one into his house; that is, if thou hast really spent the night there."

"Why should you doubt it?" replied I; "there is no motive I can have to deceive you, nor is the object worth it."

"Be not angry with me," said the Quaker; "but thou knowest that thine own people do not, as we humbly endeavour to do, confine themselves within the simplicity of truth, but employ the language of falsehood, not only for profit, but for compliment, and sometimes for mere diversion. I have heard various stories of my neighbour; of most of which I only believe a small part, and even then they are difficult to reconcile with each other. But this being the first time I ever heard of his receiving a stranger within his dwelling, made me express some doubts. I pray thee let them not offend thee."

"He does not," said I, "appear to possess in much abundance the means of exercising hospitality, and so may be excused from offering it in ordinary cases."

"That is to say, friend," replied Joshua, "thou hast supped ill, and perhaps breakfasted worse. Now my small tenement, called Mount Sharon, is nearer to us by two miles than thine inn; and although going thither may prolong thy walk, as taking thee off the straighter road to Shepherd's Bush, yet methinks exercise will suit thy youthful limbs, as well as a good plain meal thy youthful appetite. What say'st thou, my young acquaintance?"

"If it puts you not to inconvenience," I replied; for the invitation was cordially given, and my bread and milk had been hastily swallowed, and in small quantity.

"Nay," said Joshua, "use not the language of compliment with those who renounce it. Had this poor courtesy been very inconvenient, perhaps I had not offered it."

"I accept the invitation then," said I, "in the same good spirit in which you give it."

The Quaker smiled, reached me his hand, I shook it, and we travelled on in great cordiality with each other. The fact is, I was much entertained by contrasting in my own mind, the open manner of the kind-hearted Joshua Geddes, with the abrupt, dark, and lofty demeanour of my entertainer on the preceding evening. Both were blunt and unceremonious; but the plainness of the Quaker had the character of devotional simplicity, and was mingled with the more real kindness, as if honest Joshua was desirous of atoning, by his sincerity, for the lack of external courtesy. On the contrary, the manners of the fisherman were those of one to whom the rules of good behaviour might be familiar, but who, either from pride or misanthropy, scorned to observe them. Still I thought of him with interest and curiosity, notwithstanding so much about him that was repulsive; and I promised myself, in the course of my conversation with the Quaker, to learn all that he knew on the subject. He turned the conversation, however, into a different channel, and inquired into my own condition in life, and views in visiting this remote frontier.

I only thought it necessary to mention my name, and add, that I had been educated to the law, but finding myself possessed of some independence, I had of late permitted myself some relaxation, and was residing at Shepherd's Bush to enjoy the pleasures of angling.

"I do thee no harm, young man," said my new friend, "in wishing thee a better employment for thy grave hours, and a more humane amusement (if amusement thou must have) for those of a lighter character."

"You are severe, sir," I replied. "I heard you but a moment since refer yourself to the protection of the laws of the country—if there be laws, there must be lawyers to explain, and judges to administer them."

Joshua smiled, and pointed to the sheep which were grazing on the downs over which we were travelling.

"Were a wolf," he said, "to come even now upon yonder flocks, they would crowd for protection, doubtless, around the shepherd and his dog; yet they are bitten and harassed daily by the one, shorn, and finally killed and eaten by the other. But I say not this to shock you; for, though laws and lawyers are evils, yet they are necessary evils in this probationary state of society, till man shall learn to render unto his fellows that which is their due, according to the light of his own conscience, and through no other compulsion. Mean while, I have known many righteous men who have followed thy intended profession in honesty and uprightness of walk. The greatest merit, who walk erect in a path which so many find slippery."

"And angling,"—said I, "you object to that also as an amusement, you who, if I understand right, what passed between you and my late landlord, are yourself a proprietor of fisheries?"

"Not a proprietor," he replied, "I am only, in partnership with others, a tackman or lessee of some valuable salmon-fisheries a little down the coast. But mistake me not. The evil of angling, with which I class all sports, as they are called, which have the sufferings of animals for their end and object, does not consist in the mere catching and killing those animals with which the bounty of Providence hath stocked the earth for the good of man, but in making their protracted agony a principle of delight and enjoyment. I do indeed cause these fisheries to be conducted for the necessary taking, killing, and selling the fish; and in the same way, were I a farmer, I should send my lambs to market. But I should as soon think of contriving myself a sport and amusement out of the trade of the butcher as out of that of the fisher."

We argued this point no further; for though I thought his arguments a little too high-strained, yet as my mind acquitted me of having taken delight in aught but the theory of field-sports, I did not think myself called upon stubbornly to advocate a practice which had afforded me so little pleasure.

We had by this time arrived at the remains of an old finger-post, which my host had formerly pointed out as a landmark. Here, a ruinous wooden bridge, supported by long posts resembling crutches, served me to get across the water, while my new friend sought a ford a good way higher up, for the stream was considerably swelled.

As I passed for his rejoining me, I observed an angler at a little distance pouching trout after trout, as fast almost as he could cast his line; and I own, in spite of Joshua's lecture on humanity, I could not but envy his adroitness and success,—so natural is the love of sport to our minds, or so easily are we taught to assimilate success in field-sports with ideas of pleasure, and with the praise due to address and agility. I soon recognised in the successful angler little Benjie, who had been my guide and tutor in that gentle art, as you have learned from my former letters. I called—I whistled—the rascal recognised me, and, starting like a guilty thing, seemed hesitating whether to approach or to run away; and when he determined on the former, it was to assail me with a loud clamorous, and exaggerated report of the anxiety of all at the Shepherd's Bush for my personal safety; how my landlady had wept, how Sam and the ostler had not the heart to go to bed, but sat up all night drinking—and how he himself had been up long before daybreak to go in quest of me.

"And you were switching the water, I suppose," said I, "to discover my dead body?"

This observation produced a long "Na—a—a" of acknowledged detection; but, with his natural impudence, and confidence in my good-nature, he immediately added, "that he thought I would like a fresh trout or two for breakfast, and the water being in such rare trim for the saumon raun,* he couldna help taking a cast."

While we were engaged in this discussion, the honest Quaker returned to the farther end of the wooden bridge to tell me he could not venture to cross the brook in its present state, but would be under the necessity to ride round by the stone bridge, which was a mile and a half higher up than his own house. He was about to give me directions how to proceed without him, and inquire for his sister, when I suggested to him, that if he pleased to trust his horse to little Benjie, the boy might carry him round by the bridge, while we walked the shorter and more pleasant road.

Joshua shook his head, for he was well acquainted with Benjie, who, he said, was the naughtiest varlet in the whole neighbourhood. Nevertheless, rather than part company, he agreed to put the pony under his charge for a short season, with many injunctions that he should not attempt to mount, but lead the pony (even Solomon) by the bridle, under the assurances of sixpence in case of proper demeanour, and penalty that if he transgressed the orders given him, "verily he should be scourged."

Promises cost Benjie nothing, and he showered them out wholesale; till the Quaker at length yielded up the bridle to him, repeating his charges, and enforcing them by holding up his forefinger. On my part, I called to Benjie to leave the fish he had taken at Mount Sharon, making, at the same time, an apologetic countenance to my new friend, not being quite aware whether the compliment would be agreeable to such a condemner of field-sports.

He understood me at once, and reminded me of the practical distinction betwixt catching the animals as an object of cruel and wanton sport, and eating them as lawful and gratifying articles of food after they were killed. On the latter point he had no scruples; but, on the contrary, assured me, that this brook contained the real red trout, so highly esteemed by all connoisseurs, and that, when eaten within an hour of their being caught, they had a peculiar firmness of substance and delicacy of flavour, which rendered them an agreeable addition to a morning meal, especially when earned, like ours, by early rising, and an hour or two's wholesome exercise.

But to thy alarm be it spoken, Alan, we did not come so far as the frying of our fish without farther adventure. So it is only to spare thy patience, and mine own eyes, that I pull up for the present, and send thee the rest of my story in a subsequent letter.

LETTER VII.

THE SAME TO THE SAME.

[In continuation.]

LITTLE BENJIE, with the pony, having been sent off on the left side of the brook, the Quaker and I sauntered on, like the cavalry and infantry of the same army occupying the opposite banks of a river, and observing the same line of march. But, while my worthy companion was assuring me of a pleasant greensward walk to his mansion, little Benjie, who had been charged to keep in sight, chose to deviate from the path assigned him, and, turning to the right, led his charge, Solomon, out of our vision.

"The villain means to mount him!" cried Joshua, with more vivacity than was consistent with his profession of passive endurance.

I endeavoured to appease his apprehensions, as he pushed on, wiping his brow with vexation, assuring him, that if the boy did mount, he would, for his own sake, ride gently.

"You do not know him," said Joshua rejecting all consolation; "he do any thing gently!—no, he will gallop Solomon—he will misuse the sober patience of the poor animal who has borne me so long! Yes, I was given over to my own devices when I ever let him touch the bridle, for such a little miscreant there never was before him in this country!"

He then proceeded to expatiate on every sort of rustic enormity of which he accused Benjie. He had been suspected of snaring partridges—was detected by Joshua himself in liming singing birds—stood fully charged with having worried several cats, by aid of a lurcher which attended him, and which was as lean, and ragged, and mischievous, as his master. Finally, Benjie stood accused of having stolen a duck, to hunt it with the said lurcher, which was as dexterous on water as on land. I chimed in with my friend, in order to avoid giving him farther irritation, and declared, I should be disposed, from my own experience, to give up Benjie as one of Satan's imps. Joshua Geddes began to censure the phrase as too much exaggerated, and otherwise unbecoming the mouth of a reflecting person; and, just as I was apologizing for it, as being a term of common parlance, we heard certain sounds on the opposite side of the brook, which seemed to indicate that Solomon and Benjie were at issue together. The sand-hills behind which Benjie seemed to take his course, had concealed from us, as doubtless he meant they should, his ascent into the forbidden saddle, and putting Solomon to his mettle, which he was seldom called upon to exert, they had cantered away together in great amity, till they came near to the ford from which the palfrey's legitimate owner had already turned back.

Here a contest of opinions took place between the horse and his rider. The latter, according to his instructions, attempted to direct Solomon towards the distant bridge of stone; but Solomon opined that the ford was the shortest way to his own stable. The point was sharply contested, and we heard Benjie gee-hupping, tchek-tcheking, and, above all, flogging in great style; while Solomon, who, docile in his general habits, was now stirred beyond his patience, made a great trampling and recalcitration; and it was their joint noise which we heard, without being able to see, though Joshua might too well guess, the cause of it.

Alarmed at these indications, the Quaker began to shout out, "Benjie—thou varlet!—Solomon—thou fool!" when the couple presented themselves in full drive, Solomon having now decidedly obtained the better of the conflict, and bringing his unwilling rider in high career down to the ford. Never was there anger changed so fast into humane fear, as that of my good companion. "The varlet will be drowned!" he exclaimed—"a widow's son!—her only son!—and drowned!—let me go!"—And he struggled with me stoutly as I hung upon him, to prevent him from plunging into the ford.

I had no fear whatever for Benjie; for the black-guard vermin, though he could not manage the refractory horse, stuck on his seat like a monk. So-this vexed country; and so much were they famed for successful freebooting, robbery, and bloodshed, that they are said to have been called Geddes, as likening them to the fish called a Jack, Pike, or Luce, and in our country tongue, a Ged—a goodly distinction truly for Christian men! Yet did they paint this shark of the fresh waters upon their shields, and these profane priests of a wicked idolatry, the empty boasters called heralds, who make engraven images of fishes, fowls, and fourfooted beasts, that men may fall down and worship them, assigned the Ged for the device and escutcheon of my fathers, and hewn it over their chimneys, and placed it above their tombs; and the men were elated in mind, and became yet more Ged-like, slaying, leading into captivity, and dividing the spoil, until the place where they dwelt obtained the name of Sharing-Knowe, from the booty which was there divided amongst them and their accomplices. But a better judgment was given to my father's father, Philip Geddes, who, after trying to light his candle at some of the vain wildfires then held aloft at different meetings and steeple-houses, at length obtained a spark from the lamp of the blessed George Fox, who came into Scotland spreading light among darkness, as he himself hath written, as plentifully as fly the sparkles from the hoof of the horse which gallops swiftly along the stony road." Here the good Quaker interrupted himself with, "And that is very true, I must go speedily to see after the condition of Solomon."

A Quaker servant here entered the room with a tray, and inclining his head towards his master, but not after the manner of one who bows, said composedly, "Thou art welcome home, friend Joshua, we expected thee not so early; but what hath befallen Solomon thy horse?"

"What hath befallen him, indeed?" said my friend; "hath he not been returned hither by the child whom they call Benjie?"

"He hath," said his domestic, "but it was after a strange fashion; for he came hither at a swift and furious pace, and flung the child Benjie from his back, upon the heap of dung which is in the stable-yard."

"I am glad of it," said Joshua, hastily,— "glad of it, with all my heart and spirit!—But stay, he is the child of the widow—hath the boy any hurt?"

"Not so," answered the servant, "for he rose and fled swiftly."

Joshua muttered something about a scourge, and then inquired after Solomon's present condition.

"He seetheth like a steaming caldron," answered the servant; "and Bauldie, the lad, walketh him about the yard with a halter, lest he take cold."

Mr. Geddes hastened to the stable-yard to view personally the condition of his favourite, and I followed, to offer my counsel as a jockey—Don't laugh, Alan; sure I have jockeyship enough to assist a Quaker—in this unpleasing predicament.

The lad who was leading the horse seemed to be no Quaker, though his intercourse with the family had given him a touch of their prim sobriety of look and manner. He assured Joshua that his horse had received no injury, and I even hinted that the exercise would be of service to him. Solomon himself neighed towards his master, and rubbed his head against the good Quaker's shoulder, as if to assure him of his being quite well, so that Joshua returned in comfort to his parlour, where breakfast was now about to be displayed.

I have since learned that the affection of Joshua for his pony is considered as inordinate by some of his own sect; and that he has been much blamed for permitting it to be called by the name of Solomon, or any other name whatever; but he has gained so much respect and influence among them that they overlook these foibles.

I learned from him (whilst the old servant, Jehoiachim, entering and re-entering, seemed to make no end of the materials which he brought in for breakfast) that his grandfather Philip, the convert of George Fox, had suffered much from the persecution to which these harmless devotees were subjected on all sides during that intolerant period, and much of their family estate had been dilapidated. But better days dawned on Joshua's father, who, connecting himself by marriage with a wealthy family of Quakers in Lancashire, engaged successfully in various branches of commerce, and redeemed the remnants of the property, changing its name in sense, without much alteration of sound, from the Border appellation of Sharing-Knowe, to the evangelical appellation of Mount Sharon.

This Philip Geddes, as I before hinted, had imbibed the taste for horticulture and the pursuits of the florist, which are not uncommon among the peaceful sect he belongs to. He had destroyed the remnants of the old peel-house, substituting the modern mansion in its place; and while he reserved the hearth of his ancestors, in memory of their hospitality, as also the pious motto which they had chanced to assume, he failed not to obliterate the worldly and military emblems displayed upon the shield and helmet, together with all their blazonry.

In a few minutes after Mr. Geddes had concluded the account of himself and his family, his sister Rachel, the only surviving member of it, entered the room. Her appearance is remarkably pleasing, and although her age is certainly thirty at least, she still retains the shape and motion of an earlier period. The absence of every thing like fashion or ornament was, as usual, atoned for by the most perfect neatness and cleanliness of her dress; and her simple close cap was particularly suited to eyes which had the softness and simplicity of the dove's. Her features were also extremely agreeable, but had suffered a little through the ravages of that professed enemy to beauty, the small-pox; a disadvantage which was in part counterbalanced by a well-formed mouth, teeth like pearls, and a pleasing sobriety of smile, that seemed to wish good here and hereafter to every one she spoke to. You cannot make any of your vile inferences here, Alan, for I have given a full-length picture of Rachael Geddes; so that you cannot say in this case, as in the letter I have just received, that she was passed over as a subject on which I feared to dilate. More of this anon.

Well, we settled to our breakfast after a blessing, or rather an extempore prayer, which Joshua made upon the occasion, and which the spirit moved him to prolong rather more than I felt altogether agreeable. Then, Alan, there was such a despatching of the good things of the morning, as you have not witnessed since you have seen Darsie Latimer at breakfast. Tea and chocolate, eggs, ham, and pastry, not forgetting the broiled fish, disappeared with a celerity which seemed to astonish the good-humoured Quakers, who kept loading my plate with supplies, as if desirous of seeing whether they could by any possibility tire me out. One hint, however, I received, which put me in mind where I was. Miss Geddes had offered me some sweet-cake, which at the moment, I declined; but presently afterwards, seeing it within my reach, I naturally enough helped myself to a slice, and had just deposited it beside my plate, when Joshua, mine host, not with the authoritative air of Sancho's doctor, Tirtea Fuera, but in a very calm and quiet manner, lifted it away and replaced it on the dish, observing only, "Thou didst refuse it before, friend Latimer."

These good folks, Alan, make no allowance for what your father calls the Aberdeen-man's privilege of "taking his word again;" or what the wise call second thoughts.

Bating this slight hint, that I was among a precise generation, there was nothing in my reception that was peculiar—unless, indeed, I were to notice the solicitous and uniform kindness with which all the attentions of my new friends were seasoned, as if they were anxious to assure me that the neglect of worldly compliments interdicted by their sect, only served to render their hospitality more sincere. At length my hunger was satisfied, and the worthy Quaker, who, with looks of great good-nature, had watched my progress, thus addressed his sister:—

"This young man, Rachel, hath last night sojourned in the tents of our neighbour, whom men call the Laird. I am sorry I had not met him the evening before, for our neighbour's hospitality is too unfrequently exercised to be well prepared with the means of welcome."

"Nay, but, Joshua," said Rachel, "if our neighbour hath done a kindness, thou shouldst not grudge him the opportunity; and if our young friend hath fared ill for a night, he will the better relish what Providence may send him of better provisions."

"And that he may do so at leisure," said Joshua, "we will pray him, Rachel, to tarry a day or twain with us: he is young, and is now but entering upon the world, and our habitation may, if he will, be like a resting-place, from which he may look abroad upon the pilgrimage which he must make, and the path which he has to travel.—What sayst thou, friend Latimer? We constrain not our friends to our ways, and thou art, I think, too wise to quarrel with us for following our own fashions; and if we should even give thee a word of advice, thou wilt not, I think be angry, so that it is spoken in season."

You know, Alan, how easily I am determined by any thing resembling cordiality—and so, though a little afraid of the formality of my host and hostess, I accepted their invitation, provided I could get some messenger to send to Shepherd's Bush for my servant and portmanteau.

"Why, truly, friend," said Joshua, "thine outward frame would be improved by cleaner garments; but I will do thine errand myself to the Widow Gregson's house of reception, and send thy lad hither with thy clothes. Mean while Rachel will show thee these little gardens, and then will put thee in some way of spending thy time usefully, till our meal calls us together at the second hour afternoon. I bid thee farewell for the present, having some space to walk, seeing I must leave the animal Solomon to his refreshing rest."

With these words, Mr. Joshua Geddes withdrew. Some ladies we have known would have felt, or at least affected, reserve or embarrassment, at being left to do the honours of the grounds to—(it will be out, Alan)—a smart young fellow—an entire stranger. She went out for a few minutes, and returned in her plain cloak and bonnet, with her beaver-gloves, prepared to act as my guide, with as much simplicity as if she had been to wait upon thy father. So forth I sallied with my fair Quaker.

If the house at Mount Sharon be merely a plain and convenient dwelling, of moderate size, and small pretensions, the gardens and offices, though not extensive, might rival an earl's in point of care and expense. Rachel carried me first to her own favourite resort, a poultry-yard, stocked with a variety of domestic fowls, of the more rare as well as the more ordinary kinds furnished with every accommodation which may suit their various habits. A rivulet which spread into a pond for the convenience of the aquatic birds, trickled over gravel as it passed through the yards dedicated to the land poultry, which were thus amply supplied with the means they use for digestion.

All these creatures seemed to recognise the presence of their mistress, and some especial favourites hastened to her feet, and continued to follow her as far as their limits permitted. She pointed out their peculiarities and qualities, with the discrimination of one who had made natural history her study; and I own I never looked on barn-door fowls with so much interest before—at least until they were boiled or roasted. I could not help asking the trying question, how she could order the execution of any of the creatures of which she seemed so careful.

"It was painful," she said, "but it was according to the law of their being. They must die; but they knew not when death was approaching; and in making them comfortable while they lived, we contributed to their happiness as much as the conditions of their existence permitted to us."

I am not quite of her mind, Alan. I do not believe either pigs or poultry would admit that the chief end of their being was to be killed and eaten. However, I did not press the argument, from which my Quaker seemed rather desirous to escape; for, conducting me to the greenhouse, which was extensive, and filled with the choicest plants, she pointed out an aviary which occupied the farther end, where, she said, she employed herself with attending the inhabitants,

I will not trouble you with any account of the various hothouses and gardens, and their contents. No small sum of money must have been expended in erecting and maintaining them in the exquisite degree of good order which they exhibited. The family, I understood, were connected with that of the celebrated Millar, and had imbibed his taste for flowers and for horticulture. But instead of murdering botanical names, I will rather conduct you to the potager, or pleasure-garden, which the taste of Joshua or his father had extended on the banks betwixt the house and river. This also, in contradistinction to the prevailing simplicity, was ornamented in an unusual degree. There were various compartments, the connexion of which was well managed, and although the whole ground did not exceed five or six acres, it was so much varied as to seem four times larger. The space contained close alleys and open walks; a very pretty artificial waterfall; a fountain also, consisting of a considerable jet-d'eau, whose streams glittered in the sunbeams, and exhibited a continual rainbow. There was a cabinet of verdure, as the French call it, to cool the summer heat, and there was a terrace sheltered from the north-east by a noble holly hedge, with all its glittering spears, where you might have the full advantage of the sun in the clear frosty days of winter.

I know that you, Alan, will condemn all this as bad and antiquated; for, ever since Dodsley has described the Leasowes, and talked of Brown's imitations of nature, and Horace Walpole's late Essay on Gardening, you are all for simple nature—condemn walking up and down stairs in the open air, and declare for wood and wilderness. But ne quid nimis. I would not deface a scene of natural grandeur or beauty, by the introduction of crowded artificial decorations; yet such may, I think, be very interesting, where the situation, in its natural state, otherwise has no particular charms.

So that when I have a country-house, (who can say how soon?) you may look for grottoes, and cascades and fountains; nay, if you vex me by contradiction, perhaps I may go the length of a temple—so promise me not, for you see of what enormities I am capable.

At any rate, Alan, had you condemned as artificial the rest of Friend Geddes's grounds, there is a willow walk by the very verge of the stream, so sad, so solemn, and so silent, that it must have commanded your admiration. The brook, restrained at the ultimate boundary of the grounds by a natural dam-dyke or ledge of rocks, seemed, even in its present swollen state, scarcely to glide along; and the pale willow-trees, dropping their long branches into the stream, gathered around them little coronals of the foam that floated down from the more rapid stream above. The high rock, which formed the opposite bank of the brook, was seen dimly through the branches, and its pale and splintered front, garlanded with long streamers of briars and other creeping plants, seemed a barrier between the quiet path which we trode, and the toiling and hustling world beyond. The path itself, following the sweep of the stream, made a very gentle curve; enough, however, served by its inflection completely to hide the end of the walk, until you arrived at it. A deep and sullen sound, which increased as you proceeded, prepared you for this termination, which was indeed only a plain root-ree; from which you looked on a fall of about six or seven feet, where the brook flung itself over the ledge of natural rock I have already mentioned, which there crossed its course.

The quiet and twilight seclusion of this walk rendered it a fit scene for confidential communing; and having nothing more interesting to say to my fair Quaker, I took the liberty of questioning her about the Laird; for you are, or ought to be, aware, that next to discussing the affairs of the heart, the fair sex are most interested in those of their neighbours.

I did not conceal either my curiosity, or the check which it had received from Joshua, and I saw that my companion answered with embarrassment. "I must not speak otherwise than truly," she said; "and

"I tell thee, that my brother Joshua and thou, the men of whom they have asked me—perhaps we are both wrong—but he is a man of great influence over many who follow the trade of sailors and fishermen, become so much so the elements with which they contend. He hath no certain name among them, which is not unusual; their rude fashion being to distinguish each other by nicknames, and they have called him the Lord, and the Lakes, (not remembering there should be no one called Lord, save one only) in allusion; the pools of salt water left by the tide among the sands being called the Lakes of Salween."

"Has he no other revenue than he derives from these sands?" I asked.

"That I cannot answer," replied Rachel, "may say that he wants not money though he lives like an ordinary fisherman, and that he reports freely of his gains to the poor around him. They attribute this to a man of consequence, more deeply engaged in the unhappy affair of the rebellion, and even still in much in danger from the government to assume his own name. He is often absent from his cottage at Highon-burn-side, for weeks and months."

"I should have thought," said I, "that the government would scarce at this time of day, be likely to persecute against any one even of the most obnoxious rebels. Many were have passed away."

"It is true," she replied, "yet such persons may understand that their being convicted at depends on their living in obscurity. But indeed there can nothing certain be known among these rude people. The truth is not in their midst of them participate in the unlawful trade between these parts and the neighbouring shore of England, and they are familiar with every species of falsehood and deceit."

"It is a pity," I remarked, "that your brother should have neighbours of such a description, especially as I understand he is at some variance with them."

"Where when, and about what matter?" answered Miss Giddens, with an eager and impatient anxiety, which made me regret having touched on the subject.

I told her, in a way as much alarming as I could devise, the purport of what had passed between the Lord of the Lakes and her brother at their morning's interview.

"You affright me much," answered she, "it is this very circumstance which has scared me in the watches of the night. When my brother Joshua withdrew from an active share in the commercial concerns of my father, being satisfied with the portion of worldly substance which he already possessed, there were one or two undertakings in which he retained an interest, either because his withdrawing might have been prejudicial to friends, or because he wished to retain some mode of occupying his time. Amongst the more important of these is a fishing station on the coast, where, by certain improved modes of erecting enclosures, opening at the advance of the tide, and shutting at the reflux, many more fish are taken than can be destroyed by those who, like the men of Broken-burn, use only the boat net and spear or fishing-rod. They complain of these tide-nets, as men call them, as an innovation, and pretend to a right to remove and destroy them by the strong hand. I fear me, that men of violence whom they call the Lord, will execute these his threats, which cannot be without both loss and danger to my brother."

"Mr. Giddens," said I, "ought to apply to the civil magistrate, there are soldiers at Dunsinno who would be detached for his protection."

"Thou speakest, friend Leanne," answered the lady, "as one who is still in the gall of bitterness and bond of iniquity. God forbid that we should endure year to preserve nets of flax and stakes of wood, or the Marmion of gain which they procure for us, by the hands of men of war and at the risk of spilling human blood!"

"I respect your scruples," I replied, "but since such is your way of thinking, your brother ought to avert the danger by compromise or submission."

"Perhaps it would be best," answered Rachel; "but what can I say? Even in the best-trained temper here may remain some taint of the old Adam; and I know not whether it is this or a better spirit that maketh my brother Joshua determine, that though he will not raise force by force, neither will he yield up his right to mere threats, or encourage wrong to others by yielding to menaces. His partners, he says, confide in his sanctimony, and that he must not disappoint them by yielding up their right for the fear of the threats of men, whose breath is in his nostrils."

This observation convinced me that the spirit of the old shavers of the spoil was not utterly departed even from the bosom of the peaceful Quaker, and I could not help confessing internally that Joshua had the right, when he asserted that there was as much courage in endurance as in exertion.

As we approached the further end of the willow walk, the silent and continuous sound of the dashing waters became still more and more audible, and at length rendered it difficult for us to converse with each other. The conversation dropped, but apparently my companion continued to dwell upon the apprehensions which it had excited. At the bottom of the walk we obtained a view of the coast, where the ocean broke flying south in foam and tumult over the natural barrier of rock which stood in view to attempt to bar its course. I gazed with delight, and feeling to express my sentiments to my companion, I observed that she had folded her hands in an attitude of sorrowful resignation, which showed her thoughts were far from the event which lay before her. When she saw that her abstraction was observed, she resumed her former placid state of mind; and having given me sufficient time to admire the termination of our walk and watched walk, proposed that we should return to the house through her brother's farm. "Even we Quakers, as we are called, have our little pride," she said, "and my brother Joshua would not forgive me, were I not to show that the fields which he taketh delight to cultivate, after the narrow and best fashion, for which I promise him, he hath received much praise from good judges, as well as some ridicule from those who think it folly to improve on the customs of our ancestors."

As she spoke she opened a low door leading through a moss and reed covered wall, the boundary of the pleasure-ground, into the open fields; through which we moved by a convenient path, leading, with good taste and simplicity, by stile and hedge-row, through pasturage and arable and woodland; so that, in all ordinary weather, the good men might, without expending his shore, perform his perambulation round the estate. There were more also, on which to rest, and though not adorned with inscriptions, nor quite so frequent in occurrence as those mentioned in the account of the Leamova, these situations were always chosen with respect to some distant prospect to be commanded, or some home view to be enjoyed.

But what struck me most in Joshua's domain, was the quantity and the tameness of the game. The long marriage arrow abandoned the moat at the foot of the hedge where she had assembled her covey, though the path went clear beside her, and she here, remaining on her farm, gazed at us as we passed with her all dark eye, or, rising lamely and hopping to a little distance, stood erect to look at us with more calmly than apprehension. I observed to Miss Giddens the extreme tameness of these land and sky animals, and she informed me that their confidence arose from protection in the summer and relief during the winter.

"They are pets," she said, "of my brother, who considers them as the better entitled to this kindness than they are a race persecuted by the world in general. He dreads himself," she said, "even the company of a dog, that these creatures may have at least enjoy undisturbed security. Yet this tameness of human proximity, or human help given often," she added, "to our dangerous neighbours."

She explained this, by telling me that my host of the preceding night was remarkable for his attachment to bird sports, which he pursued without much regard to the wishes of the individuals over whose property he followed them. The undefined mixture of respect and fear with which he was generally regarded, induced most of the neighbouring landholdings to connive at what they would perhaps in another have punished as a trespass; but Joshua Godden would not permit the intrusion of any one upon his premises, and so he had before offended several country neighbours, who, because he would neither shoot himself nor permit others to do so, compared him to the dog in the manger, so he now aggravated the displeasure which the Lord of the Lakes had already conceived against him, by persistently deterring him from pursuing his sport over his grounds—"So that," said Rachel Godden, "I sometimes wish our lot had been cast elsewhere than in these pleasant borders, where if we had less of beauty around us, we might have had a neighbour-land of peace and good will."

We at length returned to the house, where Miss Godden showed me a small study, containing a little collection of books, in two separate presses.

"Them," said she, pointing to the smaller press, "will, if thou bestowest thy leisure upon them, do thee good; and them," pointing to the other and larger cabinet, "can, I believe, do thee little harm. Some of our people do indeed hold, that every writer who is not with us is against us, but brother Joshua is mitigated in his opinions, and corresponds with our friend John Scot of Aswell, who both himself unbiassed voices well approved of even in the world—I wish thee many good thoughts till our family meet at the hour of dinner."

Left alone, I tried both collections; the first contained entirely of religious and controversial tracts, and the latter formed a small selection of history, and of moral writers, both in prose and verse.

Neither collection promising much amusement, thou hast, in these close pages, the fruits of my tediousness; and truly I think, writing history (one's self being the subject) is as amusing as reading that of foreign countries at any time.

Sam, still more drunk than sober, arrived in due time with my portmanteau, and enabled me to put my dress into order, better befitting this temple of cleanliness and decorum, where (to conclude) I believe I shall be a sojourner for more days than one.*

P. S.—I have noted your adventure, as you home-land youths may perhaps term it, concerning the visit of your daughter's Lord. We travellers hold such an accident of no great consequence, though it may serve to embellish the uniform life of Brown's Square. But art thou not ashamed to attempt to interest one who is seeing the world at large, and studying human nature on a large scale, by so bald a narrative? Why, what does it amount to, after all, but that a Tory Lord dined with a Whig Lawyer? no very uncommon matter, especially as you state Mr. Herries to have lost the retort, though retaining this designation. The Lord behaved with laughableness and impudence—nothing out of the nature in that. Is not kicked down stairs, as he ought to have been were Alan Fairford half the man that he would wish his friends to think him. Ay, but then, as the young lawyer instead of showing his friend the door, chose to make use of it himself, he overheard the Lord aforesaid ask the old lawyer concerning Dorcas Layton—no doubt earnestly inquiring after the handsome, accomplished inmate of his family, who has so lately made Thomas his son, and declared the honour of following her side. You laugh at me for my austere castles; but alas, have they not sure footing, in general, the two words spoken by such a man as Herries? And yet—I would rally the matter off, Alan, but in dark nights, even the glow-worm becomes as dim as lustre, and so one plunged in my uncertainty and ignorance, the slightest gleam that promises intelligence, is interesting. My life is like the eddying river in the Peak of Derby, visible only where it crosses the celebrated cavern. I am here, and so much I know; but where I have sprung from, or whether my course of life is like to end, who shall tell me? Your father, too, seemed interested and alarmed, and talked of writing; would to heaven he may!—I send daily to the post-town for letters.

LETTER VIII.

ALAN FAIRFORD TO DORCAS LAYTON.

THOU mayst clap thy wings and crow as the planet. You go in search of adventure, but adventure comes to me unthought for, and oh! a pleasing shape came mine, since it arrived in the form of a client—and a fair client to boot! What think you of that, Dorcas, you who are such a sworn enemy of dainties? Will this not match my adventure with that hunt salmon on horseback, and without hounds, escapes the history of a whole tribe of fairies? But I must proceed methodically.

When I returned to-day from the college, I was surprised to see a broad grin distending the countenance of the faithful James Wilkinson, who, as the circumstance seldom happens above once a year, was matter of some surprise. Moreover, he had a knowing glance with his eye, which I should have as soon expected from a dumb-waiter—or a pile of furniture to which James, in his usual way, may be happily assimilated. "What the devil's matter, James?"

The devil may be in the matter, for aught I know, and James, with another provoking grin, "he has been a woman calling for you, Master Alan."

A woman calling for me? said I in surprise, as you know well, that excepting old Aunt Peggy, she comes to dinner of a Sunday, and the still older Lady Redrocker, who calls ten times a year for the quarterly payment of her jointure of four hundred marks, make scarce approaches our threshold, as my lady visits all his female clients at their own lodgings. James protested, however, that there had been a calling, and for me. "As bonny a lass as I have ever added James," since I was in the Fens, and her company with Peg Hester." Then, knowing of James's gay recollections go back to the period of his military service, the years he has spent in our army, possibly been dull enough.

Did the lady leave no name nor place of address?

"No," replied James; "but she asked when we would be at home, and I appointed her for twelve o'clock, when the house would be quiet, and you be there at the Bank."

"For shame, James! how can you think my being at home or abroad could be of any consequence?" The lady is of course a decent person?

I am indeed her that, sir—she is name of your sister. (Here James supplied a blank with a low whistle)—but I dares her—my master might as well work if a woman comes here."

I passed into my own room, not all pleased that my father was absent, notwithstanding I had thought proper to rebuke James for having so contrived it. I disarranged my books, to give them the appearance of a graceful confusion on the table, and by my side (unless since your departure) serves the master-piece, that the lady might see I was some Admiral's Miscellany—I endeavoured to dispose my dress so as to resemble an elegant morning dishabille—gave my hair the general shade of powder which marks the gentleman—laid my watch and chain on the table, to hint that I understood the value of time; and when I

* In explanation of this circumstance I cannot help adding a note not very necessary for the reader, which yet I record with pleasure from recollection of the kindness which it evokes. In early youth I resided for a considerable time in the vicinity of the beautiful village of Evesham, where my life passed in a very solitary manner. I had few acquaintances, even the commoners and monks which were at the time almost extinct in my neighbourhood were difficult to come by. It was that that I was particularly indebted to the liberality and friendliness of an old lady of the Society of Friends, renowned for her benevolence and charity. Her dearest husband had been a medical man of reputation and left her with some valuable property, a small and well-stocked library. This the kind old lady permitted me to peruse at pleasure, and every time that I was so situated, so conscious that I should take at the same time some of the books printed for encouragement and in building the doctrine of her own sect. She did not even exact the courtesy that I would read these performances, being too fully aware of my own as a learner of progress, but she deeply desired that I should have the chance of instruction which my work, in some written, authority, or example might induce me to have recourse to it.

had made all these arrangements—of which I am a little ashamed when I think of them—I had nothing better to do than to watch the dial-plate till the index pointed to noon. Five minutes elapsed, which I allowed for variation of clocks—five minutes more rendered me anxious and doubtful—and five minutes more would have made me impatient.

Laugh as thou wilt; but remember, Darsie, I was a lawyer, expecting his first client—a young man, how strictly bred up I need not remind you, expecting a private interview with a young and beautiful woman. But ere the third term of five minutes had elapsed, the door-bell was heard to tinkle low and modestly, as if touched by some timid hand.

James Wilkinson, swift in nothing, is, as thou knowest, peculiarly slow in answering the door-bell; and I reckoned on five minutes good, ere his solemn step should have ascended the stair. Time enough, thought I, for a peep through the blinds, and was hastening to the window accordingly. But I reckoned without my host; for James, who had his own curiosity as well as I, was lying perdu in the lobby, ready to open at the first tinkle; and there was, "This way, ma'am—Yes, ma'am—The lady, Mr. Alan," before I could get to the chair in which I proposed to be discovered, seated in all legal dignity. The consciousness of being half caught in the act of peeping, joined to that native air of awkward bashfulness of which I am told the law will soon free me, kept me standing on the floor in some confusion; while the lady, disconcerted on her part, remained on the threshold of the room. James Wilkinson, who had his senses most about him, and was perhaps willing to prolong his stay in the apartment, busied himself in setting a chair for the lady, and recalled me to my good breeding by the hint. I invited her to take possession of it, and bid James withdraw.

My visiter was undeniably a lady, and probably considerably above the ordinary rank—very modest, too, judging from the mixture of grace and timidity with which she moved, and at my entreaty sat down. Her dress was, I should suppose, both handsome and fashionable; but it was much concealed by a walking-cloak of green silk, fancifully embroidered; in which, though heavy for the season, her person was enveloped, and which, moreover, was furnished with a hood.

The devil take that hood, Darsie! for I was just able to distinguish that, pulled as it was over the face, it concealed from me, as I was convinced, one of the prettiest countenances I have seen, and which, from a sense of embarrassment, seemed to be crimsoned with a deep blush. I could see her complexion was beautiful—her chin finely turned—her lips coral—and her teeth rivals to ivory. But further the deponent sayeth not; for a clasp of gold, ornamented with a sapphire, closed the envious mantle under the incognita's throat, and the cursed hood concealed entirely the upper part of the face.

I ought to have spoke first, that is certain; but ere I could get my phrases well arranged, the young lady, rendered desperate, I suppose, by my hesitation, opened the conversation herself.

"I fear I am an intruder, sir—I expected to meet an elderly gentleman."

This brought me to myself. "My father, madam, perhaps. But you inquired for Alan Fairford—my father's name is Alexander."

"It is Mr. Alan Fairford, undoubtedly, with whom I wished to speak," she said, with greater confusion; "but I was told that he was advanced in life."

"Some mistake, madam, I presume, betwixt my father and myself—our Christian names have the same initials, though the terminations are different.—I—I—I would esteem it a most fortunate mistake if I could have the honour of supplying my father's place in any thing that could be of service to you."

"You are very obliging, sir." A pause, during which she seemed undetermined whether to rise or sit still.

"I am just about to be called to the bar, madam," said I, in hopes to remove her scruples to open her ears to me; "and if my advice or opinion could be of the slightest use, although I cannot presume to say that they are much to be depended upon, yet"—

The lady arose. "I am truly sensible of your kindness, sir; and I have no doubt of your talents. I will be very plain with you—it is you whom I came to visit; although, now that we have met, I find it will be much better that I should commit my communication to writing."

"I hope, madam, you will not be so cruel—so tantalizing, I would say. Consider, you are my first client—your business my first consultation—do not do me the displeasure of withdrawing your confidence because I am a few years younger than you seem to have expected—My attention shall make amends for my want of experience."

"I have no doubt of either," said the lady, in a grave tone, calculated to restrain the air of gallantry with which I had endeavoured to address her. "But when you have received my letter, you will find good reasons assigned why a written communication will best suit my purpose. I wish you, sir, a good morning." And she left the apartment, her poor baffled counsel scraping, and bowing, and apologizing for any thing that might have been disagreeable to her, although the front of my offence seems to be my having been discovered to be younger than my father.

The door was opened—out she went—walked along the pavement, turned down the close, and put the sun, I believe, into her pocket when she disappeared, so suddenly did dulness and darkness sink down on the square, when she was no longer visible. I stood for a moment as if I had been senseless, not recollecting what a fund of entertainment I must have supplied to our watchful friends on the other side of the green. Then it darted on my mind that I might dog her, and ascertain at least who or what she was. Off I set—ran down the close where she was no longer to be seen, and demanded of one of the dyer's lads whether he had seen a lady go down the close, or had observed which way she turned.

"A leddy!"—said the dyer, staring at me with his rainbow countenance. "Mr. Alan, what takes you out, rinning like daft, without your hat?"

"The devil take my hat!" answered I, running back, however, in quest of it; snatched it up, and again sallied forth. But as I reached the head of the close once more, I had sense enough to recollect that all pursuit would be now in vain. Besides, I saw my friend, the journeyman dyer, in close confabulation with a pea-green personage of his own profession, and was conscious, like Scrub, that they talked of me, because they laughed consumedly. I had no mind, by a second sudden appearance, to confirm the report that Advocate Fairford was "gaen daft," which had probably spread from Campbell's close-foot to the Meal-market Stairs; and so slunk back within my own hole again.

My first employment was to remove all traces of that elegant and fanciful disposition of my effects, from which I had hoped for so much credit; for I was now ashamed and angry at having thought an instant upon the mode of receiving a visit which had commenced so agreeably, but terminated in a manner so unsatisfactory. I put my folios in their places—threw the foils into the dressing-closet—tormenting myself all the while with the fruitless doubt, whether I had missed an opportunity or escaped a stratagem, or whether the young person had been really startled, as she seemed to intimate, by the extreme youth of her intended legal adviser. The mirror was not unnaturally called in to aid; and that cabinet-counselor pronounced me rather short, thick-set, with a cast of features fitter, I trust, for the bar than the ball—not handsome enough for blushing virgins to pine for my sake, or even to invent sham cases to bring them to my chambers—yet not ugly enough, either, to scare those away who came on real business—dark, to be sure, but nigri sunt hyacinthi—there are pretty things to be said in favour of that complexion.

At length—as common sense will get the better in all cases, when a man will but give it fair play—I began to stand convicted in my own mind, as an ass before the interview, for having expected too much—an ass during the interview, for having failed to extract the lady's real purpose—and an especial ass, now that it was over, for thinking so much about it. But I can think of nothing else, and therefore I am determined to think of this to some good purpose.

You remember Murtough O'Hara's defence of the Catholic doctrine of confession; because, "by his soul, his sins were always a great burden to his mind, till he had told them to the priest; and once confessed, he never thought more about them." I have tried his receipt, therefore; and having poured my secret mortification into thy trusty ear, I will think no more about this maid of the mist,

Who, with no face, as 'twere, outfaced me."

— Four o'clock.

Plague on her green mantle, she can be nothing better than a fairy; she keeps possession of my head yet! All during dinner-time I was terribly absent; but, luckily, my father gave the whole credit of my reverie to the abstract nature of the doctrine, Vincor vincentem, ergo vinco te; upon which brocard of law the Professor this morning lectured. So I got an early dismissal to my own crib, and here am I studying, in one sense, vincera vincentem, to get the better of the silly passion of curiosity—I think—I think it amounts to nothing else—which has taken such possession of my imagination, and is perpetually worrying me with the question—will she write or no? She will not—she will not! So says Reason, and adds, Why should she take the trouble to enter into correspondence with one, who, instead of a bold, alert, prompt gallant, proved a chickenhearted boy, and left her the whole awkwardness of explanation, which he should have met half-way? But then, says Fancy, she will write, for she was not a bit that sort of person whom you, Mr. Reason, in your wisdom, take her to be. She was disconcerted enough, without my adding to her distress by any impudent conduct on my part. And she will write, for—

By Heaven, she has written, Darsie, and with a vengeance!—Here is her letter, thrown into the kitchen by a cadie, too faithful to be bribed, either by money or whisky, to say more than that he received it, with sixpence, from an ordinary-looking woman, as he was plying on his station near the Cross.

"FOR ALAN FAIRFORD, ESQUIRE, BARRISTER.

"SIR,

"Excuse my mistake of to-day. I had accidentally learned that Mr. Darsie Latimer had an intimate friend and associate in a Mr. A. Fairford. When I inquired for such a person, he was pointed out to me at the Cross, (as I think the Exchange of your city is called,) in the character of a respectable elderly man—your father, as I now understand. On inquiry at Brown's Square, where I understood he resided, I used the full name of Alan, which naturally occasioned you the trouble of this day's visit. Upon further inquiry, I am led to believe that you are likely to be the person most active in the matter to which I am now about to direct your attention; and I regret much that circumstances, arising out of my own particular situation, prevent my communicating to you personally what I now apprise you of in this manner.

"Your friend, Mr. Darsie Latimer, is in a situation of considerable danger. You are doubtless aware, that he has been cautioned not to trust himself in England—Now, if he has not absolutely transgressed this friendly injunction, he has at least approached as nearly to the menaced danger as he could do consistently with the letter of the prohibition. He has chosen his abode in a neighbourhood very perilous to him; and it is only by a speedy return to Edinburgh, or at least by a removal to some more remote part of Scotland, that he can escape the machinations of those whose enmity he has to fear. I must speak in mystery, but my words are not the less certain; and, I believe, you know enough of your friend's fortunes to be aware, that I could not write this much without being even more intimate with them than you are.

"If he cannot, or will not, take the advice here given, it is my opinion that you should join him, if possible, without delay, and urge, by your personal presence and entreaty, the arguments which may prove ineffectual in writing. One word more, and I implore of your candour to take it as it is meant. No one supposes that Mr. Fairford's zeal in his friend's service, needs to be quickened by mercenary motives. But report says that Mr. Alan Fairford not having yet entered on his professional career, may, in such a case as this, want the means, though he cannot want the inclination, to act with promptitude. The enclosed note, Mr. Alan Fairford must be pleased to consider as his first professional emolument; and she who sends it hopes it will be the omen of unbounded success, though the fee come from a hand so unknown as that of

A bank note of 20*l.* was the enclosure, and the whole incident left me speechless with astonishment. I am not able to read over the beginning of my own letter, which forms the introduction to this extraordinary communication. I only know that, though mixed with a quantity of foolery, (God knows, very much different from my present feelings,) it gives an account sufficiently accurate, of the mysterious person from whom this letter comes, and that I have neither time nor patience to separate the absurd commentary from the text, which it is so necessary you should know.

Combine this warning, so strangely conveyed, with the caution impressed on you by your London correspondent, Griffiths, against your visiting England—with the character of your Laird of the Solway Lake—with the lawless habits of the people on that frontier country, where warrants are not easily executed, owing to the jealousy entertained by either country of the legal interference of the other; remember, that even Sir John Fielding said to my father, that he could never trace a rogue beyond the Brig o' Dumfries—think that the distinctions of Whig and Tory, Papist and Protestant, still keep that country in a loose and comparatively lawless state—think of all this, my dearest Darsie, and remember that, were at this Mount Sharon of yours, you are residing with a family actually menaced with forcible interference, and who, while their obstinacy provokes violence, are by principle bound to abstain from resistance.

Nay, let me tell you professionally, that the legality of the mode of fishing practised by your friend Joshua, is greatly doubted by our best lawyers; and that, if the stake-nets be considered as actually an unlawful obstruction raised in the channel of the estuary, an assembly of persons who shall proceed rius facti, to pull down and destroy them, would not, in the eye of the law, be esteemed guilty of a riot. So, by remaining where you are, you are likely to be engaged in a quarrel with which you have nothing to do, and thus to enable your enemies, whoever they may be, to execute, amid the confusion of a general hubbub, whatever designs they may have against your personal safety. Black-fishers, poachers, and smugglers, are a sort of gentry that will not be much checked, either by your Quaker's texts, or by your chivalry. If you are Don Quixote enough to lay bare in rest, in defence of those of the stake-net, and of the sad-coloured garment, I pronounce you but a poor knight; for, as I said before, I doubt if these potent redressers of wrongs, the justices and constables, will hold themselves warranted to interfere. In a word, return, my dear Amadis; the adventure of the Solway-nets is not reserved for your worship. Come back, and I will be your faithful Sancho Panza upon a more hopeful quest. We will beat about together, in search of this Urganda, the Unknown She of the Green Mantle, who can read this, the riddle of thy fate, better than wise Eppie of Buckhaven,* or Cassandra herself.

I would fain trifle, Darsie; for in debating with you, jests will sometimes go farther than arguments; but I am sick at heart, and cannot keep the ball up. If you have a moment's regard for the friendship we have so often vowed to each other, let my wishes for once prevail over your own venturous and romantic temper. I am quite serious in thinking, that the information communicated to my father by this Mr. Herries, and the admonitory letter of the young lady, bear upon each other; and that, were you here, you might learn something from one or other, or from both, that might throw light on your birth and parentage. You will not, surely, prefer an idle whim to the prospect which is thus held out to you?

I would, agreeably to the hint I have received in the young lady's letter, (for I am confident that such is her condition,) have ere now been with you to urge these things, instead of pouring them out upon paper. But you know that the day for my trial is appointed; I have already gone through the form of being introduced to the examiners, and have gotten my titles assigned me. All this should not keep me at home, but my father would view any irregularity upon this occasion as a mortal blow to the hopes which he has cherished most fondly during his life; viz. my being called to the bar with some credit. For my own part, I know there is no great difficulty in passing these formal examinations, else how have some of our acquaintance got through them? But, to my father, these formalities compose an august and serious solemnity, to which he has long looked forward, and my absenting myself at this moment would well nigh drive him distracted. Yet I shall go altogether distracted myself, if I have not an instant assurance from you that you are hastening hither—Mean while I have desired Hannah to get your little crib into the best order possible. I cannot learn that my father has yet written to you; nor has he spoken more of his communication with Birrensworke; but when I let him have some inkling of the dangers you are at present incurring, I know my request that you will return immediately, will have his cordial support.

Another reason yet—I must give a dinner, as usual, upon my admission, to our friends; and my father, laying aside all his usual considerations of economy, has desired it may be in the best style possible. Come hither then, dear Darsie! or, I protest to you, I shall send examination, admission-dinner, and guests, to the devil, and come, in person, to fetch you with a vengeance. Thine, in much anxiety, A. F.

LETTER IX.

ALEXANDER FAIRFORD, W. S., TO MR. DARSIE LATIMER.

DEAR MR. DARSIE,

HAVING been your factor loco tutorie, or rather, I ought to say, in correctness, (since I acted without warrant from the Court,) your negotiorum gestor; that connexion occasions my present writing. And although having rendered an account of my intrusions, which have been regularly approved of, not only by yourself, (whom I could not prevail upon to look at more than the docket and sum total,) but also by the worthy Mr. Samuel Griffiths of London, being the hand through whom the remittances were made, I may, in some sense, be considered as to you functus officio; yet, to speak facetiously, I trust you will not hold me accountable as a vicious intruder, should I still consider myself as occasionally interested in your welfare. My motives for writing, at this time, are twofold.

I have met with a Mr. Herries of Birrensworke, a gentleman of very ancient descent, but who hath in time past been in difficulties, nor do I know if his affairs are yet well redd. Birrensworke says, that he believes he was very familiar with your father, whom he states to have been called Ralph Latimer of Langcote-Hall, in Westmoreland; and he mentioned family affairs, which it may be of the highest importance to you to be acquainted with; but as he seemed to decline communicating them to me, I could not civilly urge him thereanent. Thus much I know, that Mr. Herries had his own share in the late desperate and unhappy matter of 1745, and was in trouble about it, although that is probably now over. Moreover, although he did not profess the Popish religion openly, he had an eye that way. And both of these are reasons why I have hesitated to recommend him to a youth who maybe hath not altogether so well founded his opinion concerning Kirk and State, that they might not be changed by some sudden wind of doctrine. For I have observed ye, Master Darsie, to be rather tinctured with the old leaven of prelacy—this under your leave; and although God forbid that you should be in any manner disaffected to the Protestant Hanoverian line, yet ye have ever loved to hear the blawing, bleezing stories which the Hieland gentlemen tell of those troublesome times, which, if it were their will, they had better pretermitt, as tending rather to shame than to honour. It is come to me also by a side wind, as I may say, that you have been neighbouring more than was needful among some of the pestilent sect of Quakers—a people who own neither priest, nor king, nor civil magistrate, nor the fabric of our law, and will not depone either in civilibus or criminalibus, be the loss to the lieges what it may. Anent which heresies, it were good ye read “the Snake in the Grass,” or “the Foot out of the Snare,” being both well-approved tracts touching these doctrines.

Now, Mr. Darsie, ye are to judge for yourself whether ye can safely to your soul's weal remain longer among these Papists and Quakers,—these defections on the right hand, and fallings away on the left; and truly if you can confidently resist these evil examples of doctrine, I think ye may as well tarry in the bounds where ye are, until you see Mr. Herries of Birrensworke, who does assuredly know more of your matters than I thought had been communicated to any man in Scotland. I would fain have precognosed him myself on these affairs, but found him unwilling to speak out, as I have partly intimated before.

To call a new cause—I have the pleasure to tell you, that Alan has passed his private Scots Law examinations with good approbation—a great relief to my mind; especially as worthy Mr. Pest told me in my ear there was no fear of the “callant,” as he familiarly called him, which gives me great heart. His public trials, which are nothing in comparison save a mere form, are to take place, by order of the Honourable Dean of Faculty, on Wednesday first; and on Friday he puts on the gown, and gives a bit chack of dinner to his friends and acquaintances, as is, you know, the custom. Your company will be wished for there, Master Darsie, by more than him, which I regret to think is impossible to have, as well by your engagements, as that our cousin, Peter Fairford, comes from the west on purpose, and we have no place to offer him but your chamber in the wall. And, to be plain with you, after my use and wont, Master Darsie, it may be as well that Alan and you do not meet till he is hefted as it were to his new calling. You are a pleasant gentleman, and full of daffing, which may well become you, as you have enough (as I understand) to uphold your merry humour. If you regard the matter wisely, you would perchance consider that a man of substance should have a douce and stead demeanour; yet you are so far from growing grave and considerate with the increase of your annual income, that the richer you become, the merrier I think you grow. But this must be at your own pleasure, so far as you are concerned. Alan, however, (overpassing my small savings,) has the world to win; and louping and laughing, as you and he were wont to do, would soon make the powder flee out of his wig, and the pence out of his pocket. Nevertheless, I trust you will meet when you return from your rambles; for there is a time, as the wise man sayeth, for gathering, and a time for casting away; it is always the part of a man of sense to take the gathering time first. I remain, dear sir, your well-wishing friend, and obedient to command,

ALEXANDER FAIRFORD.

P. S.—Alan's Thesis is upon the title De periculo et commodo rei venditæ, and is a very pretty piece of Latinity.—Rose-House, in our neighbourhood, is nearly finished, and is thought to excel Duff-House in ornature.

LETTER X.

DARIE LATIMER TO ALAN FAIRFORD.

THE plot thickens, Alan. I have your letter, and also one from your father. The last makes it impossible for me to comply with the kind request which the former urges. No—I cannot be with you, Alan; and that, for the best of all reasons—I cannot and ought not to counteract your father's anxious wishes. I do not take it unkind of him that he desires my absence. It is natural that he should wish for his son, what his son so well deserves—the advantage of a wiser and steadier companion than I seem to him. And yet I am sure I have often laboured hard enough to acquire that dacency of demeanour which can no more be suspected of breaking bounds, than an owl of catching a butterfly.

But it was in vain that I have knitted my brows till I had the headache, in order to acquire the reputation of a grave, solid, and well-judging youth. Your father always has discovered, or thought that he discovered, a harebrained eccentricity lying folded among the wrinkles of my forehead, which rendered me a perilous associate for the future counsellor and ultimate judge. Well, Corporal Nym's philosophy must be my comfort—"Things must be as they may."—I cannot come to your father's house, where he wishes not to see me; and as to your coming hither,—by all that is dear to me, I vow that if you are guilty of such a piece of reckless folly—not to say undutiful cruelty, considering your father's thoughts and wishes—I will never speak to you again as long as I live! I am perfectly serious. And besides, your father, while he in a manner prohibits me from returning to Edinburgh, gives me the strongest reasons for continuing a little while longer in this country, by holding out the hope that I may receive from your old friend, Mr. Herries of Birrenswark, some particulars concerning my origin, with which that ancient recusant seems to be acquainted.

That gentleman mentioned the name of a family in Westmoreland, with which he supposes me connected. My inquiries here after such a family have been ineffectual, for the borderers, on either side, know little of each other. But I shall doubtless find some English person of whom to make inquiries, since the confounded fetterlock clapped on my movements by old Griffiths, prevents me repairing to England in person. At least, the prospect of obtaining some information is greater here than elsewhere; it will be an apology for my making a longer stay in this neighbourhood, a line of conduct which seems to have your father's sanction, whose opinion must be sounder than that of your wandering damoiselle.

If the road were paved with dangers which leads to such a discovery, I cannot for a moment hesitate to tread it. But in fact there is no peril in the case. If the Tritons of the Solway shall proceed to pull down honest Joshua's tide-nets, I am neither Quixote enough in disposition, nor Goliath enough in person, to attempt their protection. I have no idea of attempting to prop a falling house, by putting my shoulders against it. And indeed Joshua gave me a hint, that the company which he belongs to, injured in the way threatened, (some of them being men who thought after the fashion of the world,) would pursue the noters at law, and recover damages, in which probably his own ideas of non-resistance will not prevent his participating. Therefore the whole affair will take its course as law will, as I only mean to interfere when it may be necessary to direct the course of the plaintiffs to thy chambers; and I request they may find thee intimate with all the Scottish statutes concerning salmon-fisheries, from the Lex Aquarum, downward.

As for the Lady of the Mantle, I will lay a wager that the sun so bedazzled thine eyes on that memorable morning, that every thing thou didst look upon seemed green; and notwithstanding James Wilkinson's experience in the Fusileers, as well as his negative whistle, I will venture to hold a crown that she is but a what-shall-call-'um after all. Let not even the gold persuade you to the contrary. She may make a shift to cause you to disgorge that, and (immense spoil!) a session's fees to boot, if you look not all the sharper about you. Or if it should be otherwise, and if indeed there lurk some mystery under this visitation, credit me, it is one which thou canst not penetrate, nor can I as yet even attempt to explain it; since, if I prove mistaken, and mistaken I may easily be, I would be fain to creep into Phalaris's bull, were it standing before me ready heated, rather than be roasted with thy raillery. Do not tax me with want of confidence; for the instant I can throw any light on the matter thou shalt have it; but while I am only blundering about in the dark, I do not choose to call wise folks to see me, perchance, break my nose against a post. So if you marvel at this,

"E'en marvel on till time makes all things plain."

On the third or fourth day after my arrival at Mount Sharon, Time, that bald sexton to whom I have just referred you, did certainly limp more heavily along with me than he had done at first. The quaint morality of Joshua, and Huguenot simplicity of his sister, began to lose much of their raciness with their novelty, and my mode of life, by dint of being very quiet, began to feel abominably dull. It was, as thou say'st, as if the Quakers had put the sun in their pockets—all around was soft and mild, and even pleasant; but there was, in the whole routine, a uniformity, a want of interest, a helpless and hopeless languor, which rendered life insipid. No doubt my worthy host and hostess felt none of this void, this want of excitement, which was becoming oppressive to their guest. They had their little round of occupations, charities, and pleasures; Rachel had her poultry-yard and conservatory, and Joshua his garden. Besides this, they enjoyed, doubtless, their devotional meditations; and, on the whole, time glided softly and imperceptibly on with them, though to me who long for stream and cataract, it seemed absolutely to stand still. I meditated returning to Shepherd's Bush, and began to think, with some hankering, after little Benjie and the rod. The imp ventured hither, and hovers about to catch a peep of me now and then; I suppose the little sharper is angling for a few more sixpences. But this would have been, in Joshua's eyes, a return of the wasted sow to wallowing in the mire, and I resolved while I remained his guest, to spare him so violent a shock to his prejudices. The next point was, to shorten the time of my proposed stay; but, alas! that I felt to be equally impossible. I had named a week; and however rashly my promise had been pledged, it must be held sacred, even according to the letter, from which the Friends permit no deviation.

All these considerations wrought me up to a kind of impatience yesterday evening; so that I snatched up my hat, and prepared for a sally beyond the cultivated farm and ornamented grounds of Mount Sharon, just as if I were desirous to escape from the realms of art, into those of free and unconstrained nature.

I was scarcely more delighted when I first entered this peaceful demesne, than I now was—such is the instability and inconsistency of human nature!—when I escaped from it to the open downs, which had formerly seemed so waste and dreary. The air I breathed felt purer and more bracing. The clouds riding high upon a summer breeze, drove, in gay succession, over my head, now obscuring the sun, now letting its rays stream in transient flashes upon various parts of the landscape, and especially upon the broad mirror of the distant Frith of Solway.

I advanced on the scene with the light step of a liberated captive; and, like John Bunyan's Pilgrim, could have found in my heart to sing as I went on my way. It seemed as if my gnyety had accumulated while suppressed, and that I was, in my present joyous mood, entitled to expend the savings of the previous week. But just as I was about to uplift a merry stave, I heard, to my joyful surprise, the voices of three or more choristers, singing, with considerable success, the lively old catch,

our men were very very merry,
 our men were drinking;
 ere two men of mine,
 in of thine,
 e that belong'd to old Sir Thom o' Lyne;
 went to the ferry, they were very very merry,
 our men were drinking."

chorus ended, there followed a loud and igh by way of cheers. Attracted by sounds ere so congenial to my present feelings, I ards the spot from which they came,—cu-iver, for the downs, as had been repeated-to me, had no good name: and the attrace music, without rivalling that of the Syrens , might have been followed by similarly init consequences to an incautious amateur.

on, therefore, trusting that the sinuosities und, broken as it was into knolls and sandld permit me to obtain a sight of the musi-ore I should be observed by them. As I ad-he old ditty was again raised. The voices hose of a man and two boys; they were t kept good time, and were managed with a skill to belong to the ordinary country look'd at the sun, and cried, Fire, fire, fire;

 ible his kessel in Birkendale mire;
 artled a calf, and halloo'd for a stag;
 ounted a gate-post instead of his nag;
 our men were very very merry,
 all our men were drinking;
 ere two men of mine,
 nen of thine,
 nee that belong'd to old Sir Thom o' Lyne r went to the ferry they were very very merry, ll our men were drinking."

ices, as they mixed in their several parts, hrough them, untwisting and again entwinhe links of the merry old catch, seemed to le touch of the bacchanalian spirit which brated, and showed plainly that the musi-re engaged in the same joyous revel as the f old Sir Thom o' Lyne. At length I came ght of them, three in number, where they sat shed into what you might call a bunker, a d-pit, dry and snug, and surrounded by its nd a screen of whins in full bloom.

ly one of the trio whom I recognised as a acquaintance was the notorious little Benjie, ing just finished his stave, was cramming a cheon of pie-crust into his mouth with one ile in the other he held a foaming tankard, dancing with all the glee of a forbidden revel;
 eatures, which have at all times a mischievousness of expression, confessing the full sweet-stolen waters, and bread eaten in secret.
 was no mistaking the profession of the male ale, who were partners with Benjie in these ings. The man's long loose-bodied great-up-rascal as the vulgar term it,) the fiddle-th its straps, which lay beside him, and a apsack which might contain his few neces-clear gray eye; features which, in contend-many a storm, had not lost a wild and careession of glee, animated at present, when he eising for his own pleasure the arts which ly practised for bread,—all announced one of ipatetic followers of Orpheus, whom the vul-original of this catch is to be found in Cowley's witty

 And all our men were drinking.

gar call a strolling fiddler. Glazing more attentively,
 I easily discovered that though the poor musician's eyes were open, their sense was shut, and that the ecstasy with which he turned them up to Heaven, only derived its apparent expression from his own internal emotions, but received no assistance from the visible objects around. Beside him sat his female companion, in a man's hat, a blue coat, which seemed also to have been an article of male apparel, and a red petticoat. She was cleaner, in person and in clothes, than such itinerants generally are; and, having been in her day a strapping bona roba, she did not even yet neglect some attention to her appearance; wore a large amber necklace, and silver ear-rings, and had her plaid fastened across her breast with a brooch of the same metal.

The man also looked clean, notwithstanding the meanness of his attire, and had a decent silk handkerchief well knotted about his throat, under which peeped a clean owrelay. His beard, also, instead of displaying a grizzly stubble, unmowed for several days, flowed in thick and comely abundance over the breast, to the length of six inches, and mingled with his hair, with was but beginning to exhibit a touch of age. To sum up his appearance, the loose garment which I have described, was secured around him by a large old-fashioned belt, with brass studs, in which hung a dirk, with a knife and fork, its usual accompaniments. Altogether, there was something more wild and adventurous-looking about the man, than I could have expected to see in an ordinary modern crowder; and the bow which he now and then drew across the violin, to direct his little choir, was decidedly that of no ordinary performer.

You must understand that many of these observations were the fruits of after remark; for I had scarce approached so near as to get a distinct view of the party, when my friend Benjie's lurching attendant, which he calls by the appropriate name of Hemp, began to cock his tail and ears, and, sensible of my presence, flew, barking like a fury, to the place where I had meant to lie concealed till I heard another song.
 I was obliged, however, to jump on my feet, and intimidate Hemp, who would otherwise have bit me, by two sound kicks on the ribs, which sent him howling back to his master.

Little Benjie seemed somewhat dismayed at my appearance; but, calculating on my placability, and remembering, perhaps, that the ill-used Solomon was no palfrey of mine, he speedily affected great glee, and almost in one breath assured the itinerants that I was "a grand gentleman, and had plenty of money, and was very kind to poor folk;" and informed me that this was "Willie Steenson—Wandering Willie—the best fiddler that ever kittled thairm with horsehair."

The woman rose and curtsied; and Wandering Willie sanctioned his own praises with a nod, and the ejaculation, "All is true that the little boy says."

I asked him if he was of this country.

"This country?" replied the blind man—"I am of every country in broad Scotland, and a wee bit of England to the boot. But yet I am, in some sense, of this country; for I was born within hearing of the roar of Solway. Will I give your honour a touch of the auld bread-winner?"

He preluded as he spoke, in a manner which really excited my curiosity; and then taking the old tune of Galashiels for his theme, he graced it with a number of wild, complicated, and beautiful variations; during which, it was wonderful to observe how his sightless face was lighted up under the conscious pride and heartfelt delight in the exercise of his own very considerable powers.

"What think you of that, now, for threescore and twa?"

I expressed my surprise and pleasure.

"A rant, man—an auld rant," said Willie; "naething like the music ye hae in your ball-houses and your playhouses in Edinbro'; but it's weel aneugh anes in a way at a dike-side.—Here's another—it's no a Scots tune, but it passes for ane—Oswald made it himsell, I reckon—he has cheated mony ane, but he canna cheat Wandering Willie."

He then played your favourite air of Roshin Castle, with a number of beautiful variations, some of which I am certain were almost extempore.

"You have another fiddle there, my friend," said I—"Have you a comrade?" But Willie's ears were deaf, or his attention was still bound with the tune.

The female replied in his stead, "O ay, we—er—roth we have a partner—a gangrel body like ourselves. No but my henny might have been better if he had liked; for many a bein' nook in mony a braw house has been offered to my henny Willie, if he wad but just bide still and play to the gentles."

"Whisht, woman! whisht!" said the blind man, angrily, shaking his locks, "donna deave the gentleman wi' your havers. Stay in a house and play to the gentles!—strike up when my leddy pleases, and lay down the bow when my lord bids! Na, na, that's nae life for Willie—Look out Maggie—port out, woman, and see if ye can see Robin coming—Dad be in him! he has got to the lee-side of some smugger's punch-bowl, and he wonna budge the night, I doubt."

"That is your consort's instrument," said I—"Will you give me leave to try my skill?" I slipped at the same time a shilling into the woman's hand.

"I donna ken whether I dare trust Robin's fiddle to ye," said Willie, bluntly. His wife gave him a twitch. "Hout awa, Maggie," he said, in contempt of the hint; "though the gentleman may see ye sell, he may have nae bow head for a' that, and I'll no trust Robin's fiddle wi' an ignorantie. But that's nae muckle amiss," he added, as I began to touch the instrument; "I am thinking ye have some skill o' the craft."

To confirm him in this favourable opinion, I began to execute such a complicated flourish as I thought must have turned Crowdero into a pillar of stone with envy and wonder. I scaled the top of the finger board, to dive at once to the bottom—skipped with flying fingers, like Timotheus, from shift to shift—struck expressive and harmonic tones, but without exciting any of the astonishment which I had expected.

Willie indeed listened to me with considerable attention, but I was no sooner finished, than he immediately nuzzled on his own instrument the fantastic complication of tones which I had produced, and made so whistling a parody of my performance, that although somewhat angry I could not help laughing heartily in which I was joined by Benjie, whose reverence for me held him under no restraint; while the poor dame, fearful, doubtless, of my taking offence at this familiarity, seemed divided between her conjugal reverence for her Willie, and her desire to give him a hint for his guidance.

At length the old man stopped of his own accord, and, as if he had sufficiently rebuked me by his innuendo, he said, "But for a' that, ye will play very weel wi' a little practice and some gude teaching. But ye maun learn to put the heart into it, man—to put the heart into it."

I played an air in simpler taste, and received more decided approbation.

"That's something like it, mon. Od, ye are a clew-ey dirlie!"

The woman touched his coat again. "The gentleman is a gentleman, Willie—ye maunna speak that gude to him, henny."

"The devil I maunna?" said Willie; "and what for maunna I?—If he was ten gentles, he canna draw a bow like me, can he?"

"Indeed I cannot, my honest friend," said I; "and if you will go with me to a lounge hard by, I would be glad to have a night with you."

Here I looked round, and observe! Benjie smothering a laugh, which I was sure had mortified in it. I turned him suddenly by the ear and made him confess that he was laughing at the thoughts of the reception which a fiddle was likely to get from the Quakers at Mount Sharon. I chuckled him from my, not sorry that his mirth had reminded me in time of what I had for the moment forgotten, and invited the ignorant to go with me to Shepherd's Bush, from which I proposed to send word to Mr. Geddes that I should not return home that evening. But the man-nerel declined this invitation also. He was engaged for the night, he said, to a dance in the neighbourhood, and vented a round exclamation on the leanness or drunkenness of his comrade, who had not appeared at the place of rendezvous.

"I will go with you instead of him," said I, in a sudden whim; "and I will give you a crown to introduce me as your comrade."

"You gang instead of Rob the Rambler! My own friend, ye are no biate!" answered Wandering Willie, in a tone which announced death to my fun.

But Maggie, whom the offer of the crown had not escaped, began to open on that scent with a most daring sort of lecture. "O Willie! henny Wad, when will ye learn to be wise? There's a crown to be won for naething but saying an man's name instead of another. And, wae's me! I hae just a shilling of this gentleman's spring, and a bridle of my ain, and I wonna bend your will one muckle as to take up the siller that's flung at your feet! Ye will do the work of a cadger's pawney in a wreath of drift! and wae can I do better than be down and die wi' you! I wana let me win siller to keep either you or mysel' from."

"Haud your nonsense tongue, woman," said Willie, but less absolutely than before. "Is he a real gentleman, or one of the pleyer men?"

"I'm uphand him a real gentleman," said the woman.

"I'm uphand ye ken little of the matter," said Willie; "let us see head of your hand, neebor, ga' like."

I gave him my hand. He said to himself, "I ay, here are fingers that have seen canny work." Then running his hand over my hair, my face, my dress, he went on with his oracles. "A' your mounted hair, broad cloth o' the best, and wae's the hundred linen on his back, at the least o' it—ah how do ye think, my braw bairn, that ye are to get for a transying fiddler?"

"My dress is plain," said I,—indeed I had chosen my most ordinary suit, out of compliment to my other friends,—and I can easily pass for a young farmer out upon a frolic. Come, I will double the crown I promised you."

"Damin your crown!" said the disinterested man of music. "I would like to have a round o' it, that's certain; but a fatterer, and with a hand that never held plough and or pettle, that will never do. Ye may pass for a trades-lad from Dumfries, a student upon the ramble, or the like o' that. But hark ye, lad, if ye expect to be ranting among the gentry, lassies where ye are goun, ye will come by the way I can tell ye, for the fishers are wild chaps, and will bide nae taunts."

I promised to be civil and cautious; and, to smooth the good woman, I slipped the promised piece into her hand. The acute organs of the blind man detected this little manoeuvre.

"Are ye at it again wi' the siller, ye joad? Tis sworn ye wad rather hae a twalpenny clink than another than have a spring from Rory Dell. I'm was coming alive again, some errand. Gang can ye gae to Lucky Grogan's, and get the things ye want, and bide there till eleven hours in the morn, and it's are Robin, and him on to me."

"An' I na goun to the ploy, then?" said Maggie in a disappointed tone.

"And what for should ye?" said her lord and master; "to dance a' night, I'm warran, and nae to sit to walk your toe's-length the morn, and wae's the ten Scots miles afore us! Na, na. Bide the morn, and put your wife to bed, when there's a night wad do."

"Aweel, aweel, Willie henny, ye ken best; be it take an unco care o' yoursel, and mind ye hae the leaseng o' right."

"Your tongue gars me whiles tye of the bloud of bracing, woman," replied Willie, in answer to the tender exhortation.

But I now put in for my interest. "Hold ye folk, remember that I am to send the boy to Mount Sharon, and if you go to the Shepherd's Bush, hand nally as well pleased that my companion was to give me this last proof of his skill, I wrote with a pencil, drawing Samuel to bring my at midnight, when I thought my frolic would ough over to the place to which the beaver direct him, and I sent little Benja with an to the worthy Quakers.

are now to converse as proceeding in our di- directions across the bare downs. Yonder flae- up to the northward, with Kemp scamper his hoofs, both running as if for dear life, on the roque is within sight of his employer, and to take the walk very easy, so soon as he is ken. Stepping westward, you are Mag- ll form and high-crowned hat, relieved by the of her plaid upon the left shoulder, darken- the distance diminishes her size, and as the shadows begin to sink upon the moor. She is her quiet journey to the Shepherd's Bush.

, slowly standing over the sea, you have a full Dorne Latimer, with his new acquaintance, ring Walter who, bating that he touched the now and then with his staff, not in a doubtful manner, but with the confident air of an ex- ced pilot, heaving the lead when he has the eye by heart, walks as firmly and boldly as if he ed the eyes of Argus. There they go, each a violin slung at his back, but one of them at tally ignorant whether their course is directed, wherefore did you enter so keenly into such a dic? says my wise counsellor—Whe, I think, is whole, that as a name of knothorns, and a ; for that kindness which is interchanged in led me to take up my temporary residence at Sharon, the monotony of my life there, the simplicity of the conversation of the Geddeses, uniformity of their amusements and employ, wearied out my impatient temper, and pre- as for the first carapade which chance might in my way.

to consider whether I could, with propriety, or even perfect safety, intrude myself again upon the hos- pitality of my former host. I therefore asked Willie whether we were bound for the Laird's, as folk called him.

"Do ye ken the Laird?" said Willie, interrupting a sonata of Corelli, of which he had whistled several bars with great precision.

"I know the Laird a little," said I; "and there- fore, I was doubting whether I ought to go to his town in disguise."

"And I should doubt, not a little only but a great deal, before I took ye there, my chap," said Wandering Willie, "for I am thinking it wad be worth bide less than broken bones bairn to ye and me. Na, na, -hap, we are no ganging to the Laird's, but to a blithe burling at the Brokenburn foot, where there will be many a brawl lod and less, and maybe there may be some of the Laird's folk, for he never comes to my spleens himself. He is all for fowling-pieces and salmon spear, now that pike and musket are out of the question."

"He has been a soldier, then?" said I.

"I'll warrant him a sager," answered Willie; "but take my advice and sport as little about him as he does about you. Best to let sleeping dogs lie. Better say naething about the Laird, my man, and tell me instead, what sort of a chap ye are, that are so ready to clink in with an auld gaberlunzie fiddler? Maggie says ye're gentle, but a shilling maks a' the difference that Maggie kens, between a gentle and a simple, and your crown wad mak ye a prince of the blood in her een. But I am one that kens full weel that ye may wear good claes, and have a cast hand, and yet that may come of idleness as weel as gentleness."

I told him my name, with the same addition I had formerly given to Mr. Joshua Geddes; that I was a law-student, tired of my studies, and rambling about for exercise and amusement.

"And are ye in the want of drawing up wi' a' the gangrel bodies that ye meet on the high-road, or fling covering in a sand-bush upon the links?" demanded Willie.

"Oh no; only with honest folks like yourself, Willie," was my reply.

"Honest folks like me!—How do ye ken whether I am honest, or what I am?—I may be the devil himself for what ye ken, for he has power to come disguised like an angel of light; and besides, he is a prime fiddler. He played a sonata to Corelli, ye ken."

There was something odd in this speech, and the tone in which it was said. It seemed as if my com- panion was not always in his constant mind, or that he was willing to try if he could frighten me. I laughed at the extravagance of his language, how- ever, and asked him in reply, if he was fool enough to believe that the foul fiend would play as silly a masquerade.

"Ye ken little about it—little about it," said the old man, shaking his head and beard, and knitting his brows—"I could tell ye something about that."

What his wife mentioned of his being a tale-teller, as well as a musician, now occurred to me, and as you know I like tales of superstition, I begged to have a specimen of his talent as we went along.

"It is very true," said the blind man, "that when I am tired of scraping thairn or singing ballads, I whistles make a tale serve the turn among the country bodies; and I have some forsome awns, that mak the auld carlines shake on the settle, and the bits o' barns shirk on the a' mounes out frae their beds. But this that I am gae to tell ye was a thing that befell in our ain house in my father's time—that is, my father was then a bawling callant; and I tell it to you, that it may be a lesson to you, that are but a young, thoughtless chap, who ye draw up wi' on a lonely road, for much it was the doul and care that came o' t to my guidance."

He commenced his tale accordingly, in a dour, narrative tone of voice, which he raised and depressed with considerable skill, at times sinking almost into a whisper, and turning his clear but night-dim eyeballs upon my face, as if it had been possible for him to witness the impression which his narrative made upon my features. I will not spare you a syllable of it, although it be of the longest; so I make a dash—and begin

WANDERING WILLIE'S TALE.

Ye maun have heard of Sir Robert Redgauntlet of that ilk, who lived in these parts before the dear years. The country will lang mind him; and our fathers used to draw breath thick if ever they heard him named. He was out wi' the Hielandmen in Montrose's time; and again he was in the hills wi' Glencairn in the sixteen hundred and fifty-twa; and sae when King Charles the Second came in, wha was in sic favour as the Laird of Redgauntlet? He was knighted at Lonon court, wi' the King's ain sword; and being a redhot prelatist, he came down here, rampaging like a lion, with commissions of lieutenancy, (and of lunacy, for what I ken,) to put down a' the Whigs and Covenanters in the country. Wild wark they made of it; for the Whigs were as dour as the Cavaliers were fierce, and it was which should first tire the other. Redgauntlet was aye for the strong hand; and his name is kend as wide in the country as Claverhouse's or Tam Dalyell's. Glen, nor dargle, nor mountain, nor cave, could hide the puir hill-folk when Redgauntlet was out with bugle and blood-hound after them, as if they had been sae mony deer. And troth when they fand them, they didna mak muckle mair ceremony than a Hielandman wi' a roebuck—It was just, "Will ye tak the test?"—if not, "Make ready—present—fire!"—and there lay the recusant.

Far and wide was Sir Robert hated and feared. Men thought he had a direct compact with Satan—that he was proof against steel—and that bullets happed aff his buff-coat like hailstones from a hearth—that he had a mear that would turn a hare on the side of Carrifra-gawns*—and muckle to the same purpose, of whilk mair anon. The best blessing they wared on him was, "Deil scowp wi' Redgauntlet!" He wasna a bad maister to his ain folk though, and was weel aneugh liked by his tenants; and as for the lackies and troopers that raid out wi' him to the persecutions, as the Whigs ca'd those killing times, they wad hae drunken themsells blind to his health at ony time.

Now you are to ken that my gudesire lived on Redgauntlet's grund—they ca' the place Primrose-Knowe. We had lived on the grund, and under the Redgauntlets, since the riding days, and lang before. It was a pleasant bit; and I think the air is callerer and fresher there than ony where else in the country. It's a' deserted now; and I sat on the broken door-cheek three days since, and was glad I couldna see the plight the place was in; but that's a' wide o' the mark. There dwelt my gudesire Steenie Steenson, a rambling, rattling chiel he had been in his young days, and could play weel on the pipes; he was famous at "Hoopers and Girders"—a' Cumberland couldna touch him at "Jockie Lattin"—and he had the finest finger for the back-lilt between Berwick and Carlisle. The like o' Steenie wasna the sort that they made Whigs o'. And so he became a Tory, as they ca' it, which we now ca' Jacobites, just out of a kind of needcessity, that he might belang to some side or other. He had nae ill-will to the Whig bodies, and liked little to see the blude rin, though, being obliged to follow Sir Robert in hunting and hosting, watching and warding, he saw muckle mischief, and maybe did some, that he couldna avoid.

Now Steenie was a kind of favourite with his master, and kend a' the folks about the castle, and was often sent for to play the pipes when they were at their merriment. Auld Dougal MacCullum, the butler, that had followed Sir Robert through gude and ill, thick and thin, pool and stream, was specially fond of the pipes, and aye gae my gudesire his gude word wi' the Laird; for Dougal could turn his master round his finger.

Weel, round came the Revolution, and it had like to have broken the hearts baith of Dougal and his master. But the change was not a'thegither sae great as they feared, and other folk thought for. The Whigs made an unco crawling what they wad do with their auld enemies, and in special wi' Sir Robert Redgauntlet. But there were ower mony great folks dipped in the same doings, to mak a spick and span new world. So parliament passed it a' ower easy; and Sir Robert, bating that he was held to hunting foxes instead of Covenanters, remained just the man he was. His revel was as loud, and his hall as well lighted, as ever it had been, though maybe he lacked the fines of the non-conformists, that used to come to stock his larder and cellar; for it is certain he began to be keener about the rents than his tenants used to find him before, and they behoved to be prompt to the rent-day, or else the Laird wasna pleased. And he was sic an awsome body, that naebody cared to anger him; for the oaths he swore, and the rage that he used to get into, and the looks that he put on, made men sometimes think him a devil incarnate.

Weel, my gudesire was nae manager—no that he was a very great misguilder—but he hadna the saving gift, and he got twa terms' rent in arrear. He got the first brush at Whitsunday put ower wi' fair word and piping; but when Martinmas came, there was a summons from the grund-officer to come wi' the rent on a day preceese, or else Steenie behoved to flit. Sae wark he had to get the siller; but he was waefreended, and at last he got the haill scraped thegither—a thousand merks—the maist of it was from a neighbour they ca'd Laurie Lapraik—a sly wi. Laurie had walth o' gear—could hunt wi' the boud and rin wi' the hare—and be Whig or Tory, saunt or sinner, as the wind stood. He was a professor in the Revolution world, but he liked an orra sough of the world; and a tune on the pipes weel aneugh at a by-time, and abune a', he thought he had gude security for the siller he lent my gudesire ower the stocking: Primrose-Knowe.

Away trots my gudesire to Redgauntlet Castle, wi' a heavy purse and a light heart, glad to be out of the Laird's danger. Weel, the first thing he learned at the Castle was, that Sir Robert had fretted himself into a fit of the gout, because he did not appear before twelve o'clock. It wasna a'thegither for sake of the money, Dougal thought; but because he didna like to part wi' my gudesire aff the grund. Dougal was glad to see Steenie, and brought him into the great oak parlour, and there sat the Laird his kesome lane, excepting that he had beside him a great, unfavoured jackanape, that was a special pet of his: a cankered beast it was, and mony an ill-natured trick it played—ill to please it was, and easily angered—ran about the haill castle, chattering and yowling, and pinching and biting folk, especially before ill weather, or disturbances in the state. Sir Robert ca'd it Major Weir, after the warlock that was burnt;† and few folk liked either the name or the conditions of the creature—they thought there was something in it by ordinar—and my gudesire was not just easy in his mind when the door shut on him, sae he saw himself in the room wi' naebody but the Laird, Dougal MacCallum, and the Major, a thing that hadna chanced to him before.

Sir Robert sat, or, I should say, lay, in a great armed chair, wi' his grand velvet gown, and his feet on a cradle; for he had baith gout and gravel, and his face looked as gash and ghastly as Satan's. Major Weir sat opposite to him, in a red laced coat, and the Laird's wig on his head; and aye as Sir Robert girmed wi' pain, the jackanape girmed too, like a sheep's-head between a pair of tangs—an ill-favoured, fearsome couple they were. The Laird's buff-coat was hung on a pin behind him, and his broadsword and his pistols within reach; for he keepit up the auld fashion of having the weapons ready, and a horse and night, just as he used to do when he lay on his back, and away after any of his could get speerings of. Some said it was of the Whigs taking vengeance, but I am just his old custom: he was no given to me. The rental book, with its black cover lamp, was lying beside him, and a book lay open was put before the head, to be at the place where it lay, and not Guideron of Primrose knew, as behind with his hands and feet. He Robert gave a look, as if he would have withered his bones. He moun him he had a way of brown, that men saw the visible mark of it in his forehead, deep-dimmed, as if it had not there.

* The caution and moderation of King William III. and his principles of unlimited toleration, deprived the Cameronians of the opportunity they ardently desired, to retaliate the injuries which they had received during the reign of prelate, and purify the land, as they called it, from the pollution of blood. They esteemed the Revolution, therefore, only a half measure, which neither comprehended the rebuilding the Kirk in its full splendour, nor the revenge of the death of the Saints on their persecutors.

—some light-headed, ye son of a toom and Sir Robert. "Zantula! if you are"—sure, with no grade a countenance as he made a leg, and placed the bag of money by his side, like a man that does some-thing. The Lord drew it to him hastily—re, Sir Robert, man! "I am sure you will find it right," said my guide—Dougal, and the Lord, "Sir Robert's last down stage, till I count the silver and write."

wetens weel out of the room, when Sir John, a jelluch that garr'd the Castle rock, Dougal in the livery men, yill on a land, as any man as far as the other knew not whether to stand or sit, but I back into the park, where a man was grown—actually to my count, or go out. The Lord asked for a cold water to his feet, a cold his throat, and he, he, he, he, and was eye the word in his mouth. They n water, and when they plunged his nose in tub, he cried out it was burning, and it it did bubble and sparkle like a nothing. He flung the cup at Dougal's head, and it given him blood instead of longness. enough, the face washed, blood off the next day. The jackanape they said it, it pldred and cried as if it was something. My guide was a head was like to turn. In his side and receipt, and down stairs he at as he ran, the shrike came faint and it was a deep-drawn shrike, as if it had gone through the Castle, that the Lord my came my guide, with his finger in his hand, his last hope was, that Dougal had no long, and heard the Lord's word of writing. The young Lord, now Sir John, came burch, to see things put to rights. No as father never agreed with Sir John, but on miserate, and afterwards sat in the Parliament and voted for the Union, but it was thought, a rug of the company, a father could have come out of his grave, and found him for it on his own heart, but thought it was more counting with the Knight than the last spoken young one—that anon.

Maet allum, poor body, neither got nor it garr'd about the house looking like a directing, as was his duty, at the order of funeral. Now, Dougal looked eye weat when night was coming, and was eye the to his bed, which was in a little round to the chamber of death, which his master had he was living, and where he now lay as they said it was a day. The night funeral, Dougal could keep his own count, but came down with his proud spirit, and I could Hutcherson to sit in his room with a hour. When they were in the round, as in case of brandy to himself, and gave Hutcherson, wished him all health and long, and that, for himself, he was no long for, for that, every night since Sir Robert's silver call had sounded from the state, and as it used to do at nights in his lifetime.

a call Dougal to help to turn him in his bed. Dougal said, that being alone with the dead on that floor of the tower, (for nobody cared to wake Sir Robert Redgauntlet like another corpse,) he had never dared to answer the call, but that now his conscience checked him for neglecting his duty; for, "though I am a broken service," said Maet allum, "it shall never break my service to Sir Robert, and I will answer his next whistle, so be you will stand by me, Hutcherson."

Hutcherson had no will to the work, but he had stood by Dougal in battle and brail, and he had not fail him at his pinch; so down the earles sat over a soup of brandy, and Hutcherson, who was something of a clerk, would have had a chapter of the Bible; but Dougal would hear nothing but a blind of David Lindsay, which was the usual persuasion.

When midnight came, and the house was quiet as the grave, sure enough the silver whistle sounded as sharp and shrill as if Sir Robert was blowing it, and up got the two subservient men, and tottered into the room where the dead man lay. Hutcherson saw enough at the first glance, for there were torches in the room, which showed him the soul bend in his one shape sitting on the Lord's coffin. Over he crept as if he had been dead. He could not tell how long he lay in a trance at the door, but when he gathered himself, he crept in his neighbour, and putting near answer round the house, when Dougal was found lying dead within two steps of the bed where his master's coffin was placed. As for the whistle, it was gone once and for ever, but more a time was it heard at the top of the house on the horizon, and among the odd chimneys and turrets, where the howlers have their nests. Sir John banded the matter up, and the funeral passed over without more long-work.

But when it was over, and the Lord was beginning to settle his affairs, every man was called up for his services, and my guide for the full sum that stood against him in the rental book. Weel, away he went to the Castle to tell his story, and there he is introduced to Sir John, sitting in his father's chair, in deep mourning with weepers and hankieps crept, and a small walking paper to his side, instead of the usual broadsword that had a hundred weight of steel about it, with black chape and basket hilt. I have heard their communings so often since, that I almost think I was there myself, though I could not be there at the time. (In fact Alan my companion remarked with a good deal of humour, the flattering, complimentary way of the tenant's address, and the hypocritical melancholy of the Lord's reply. His grand father he said had, while he spoke, his eye fixed on the rental book as if it were a mastiff-dog that he was afraid would spring up and bite him.)

"I was ye son of the head seat and the white hat, and the head carver. Your father was a kind man to friends and followers, much grace to you, Sir John, to fill his shoes. His lents, I could say, for he seldom wore shoes, unless it were made when he had the seat."

"As Steven," quoth the Lord, sighing deeply and putting his napkin to his eye, "he was a sudden call, and he was missed in the country; no time to set his house in order—well-prepared Godward, no doubt, which is the root of the matter—but left us behind a tangled heap of wind, Steven—Hem! hem! We must go to business, Steven; much to do, and little time to do it in."

Here he opened the fatal volume. I have heard of a thing they call Doomsday book—I am clear it has been a rental of back-gangling tenants.

"Stephen," said Sir John, still in the same soft, sleek tone of voice. "Stephen Stephenson, or Steven, ye are down here for a year's rent behind the hand—due at last term."

Stephen. "Please your honour, Sir John, I paid it to your father."

Sir John. "Ye took a receipt then, doubtless, Stephen; and can produce it?"

Stephen. "Indeed I hadna time, as it like your honour; for our money had I set down the silver, as I just as his honour Sir Robert, that's gone, drew it all him to mount, and write out the receipt, he was taken with the pangs that removed him."

"That was unlucky," said Sir John, after a pause. "But ye maybe paid it in the presence of somebody I want but a false gualie evidence, Stephen. I would go over strictly to work with no poor man."

Stephen. "Truth, Sir John, there was nobody in the room but Dougal MacCallum, the butler. But, on your honour here, he has e'en followed me and master."

"Very unlucky again, Stephen," said Sir John, without altering his voice a single note. "The man to whom ye paid the money is dead—and the man who witnessed the payment is dead too—and the miller, which should have been to the fore, is neither man nor heard tell of in the repositories. How am I to believe a this?"

Stephen. "I diana ken, your honour; but there is a bit memorandum note of the very coins; but, God help me! I had to borrow out of twenty purses; and I am sure that like man there set down will take his grit oath for what purpose I borrowed the money."

Sir John. "I have little doubt ye borrowed the money Steenie. It is the payment to my father that I want to have some proof of."

Stephen. "The miller mean be about the house, Sir John. And since your honour never got it, and his honour that was come have taken it with him, may be some of the family may have seen it."

Sir John. "We will examine the servants, Stephen, that is but reasonable."

But lackey and laun, and page and groom, all denied stoutly that they had ever seen such a bag of money as my gudewife described. What was worse he had particularly not mentioned to any living soul of them his purpose of paying his rent. As queen had noticed something under his arm, but she took it for the pipes.

Sir John Redgauntlet ordered the servants out of the room, and then said to my gudewife. "Now Steenie, ye see ye have fair play, and as I have little doubt ye ken better where to find the rider than any other body, I beg, in fair terms, and for your own sake, that ye will end this fastening, for, Stephen, ye must pay or sit."

"The Lord forgo your opinion," said Stephen, driven almost to his wit's end—"I am an honest man."

"So am I, Stephen," said his honour, "and so are all the folk in the house I hope. But if there be a knave amongst us, it must be he that tells the story he cannot prove." He paused, and then added, more sternly, "If I understand your trick, as ye want to take advantage of some malicious reports concerning things in this family, and particularly respecting my father's sudden death, thereby to cheat me out of the money and perhaps take away my character by insinuating that I have received the rent I am demanding. Where do you suppose this money to be? I must upon knowing."

My gudewife saw every thing look so much against him that he grew nearly desperate—however, he shifted from one foot to another, looked to every corner of the room, and made no answer.

"Speak out, sirrah," said the Lord, assuming a look of his father's, a very particular one, which he had when he was angry—it seemed as if the wrinkles of his brow made that evil-smelling fearful shape of a horse's nose in the middle of his brow;—"Speak out, sir! I will know your thoughts;—do you suppose that I have the money?"

"Far be it from me to say so," said Stephen.

"Do you charge any of my people with having taken it?"

"I wad be lath to charge them that may be innocent," said my gudewife, "and if there be any one that is guilty I have no proof."

"Somewhere the money must be, if there is a word of truth in your story," said Sir John; "I ask where you think it is—and demand a correct answer?"

"In hell, if you will have my thoughts of it," said my gudewife, driven to extremity—"in hell, with your father, his jackanape, and his silver whistle!"

Down the stairs he ran, (for the parlour was no place for him after such a word,) and he heard the Lord swearing blood and wounds behind him, as fast as ever did Sir Robert, and roaring for the butler and the baron-officer.

Away rode my gudewife to his chief creditor (him they call'd Laurie Lapsark,) to try if he could make any thing out of him, but when he could see any, he got but the worst word in his name—thief, knave, and dyvour, were the saddest terms, and to the loss of these hard terms, Laurie brought up the cold story of his dipping his hand in the blood of God's anointed, as if a traitor could have helped riding with the Lord; and that a laird like Sir Robert Redgauntlet, his gudewife was, by this time, far beyond the bounds of patience, and while he and Laurie were at disputation, he was warchance enough to show Laurie a—truth as well as the man, and end things in a gaird folk's flesh grace that heard them.

He was not at himself, and he had lived with a will out of the day.

As they parted, and my gudewife was to no home through the wood of Patmarkie, that is a bad black tree, as they say. I ken the wood, but the tree may be black or white for what I can tell. At the entry of the wood there is a wild common, and at the edge of the common, a little lonely change-house that was kept then by an outler wife, they call her ca' her Tibbie Faw, and there poor Steenie chaff'd a matchkin of brandy, for he had had no refreshment the half day. Tibbie was earnest with him to take a bit of meat, but he couldn't think o't, nor would he take his foot out of the stirrup, and took off the horse wholly at two draughts, and named a town as well: the first was the memory of Sir Robert Redgauntlet and might he never be quiet in his grave till he had righted his poor bond tenant, and the second was a health to Man o' Kinnery, if he would but get him out the pack of ather or tell him what come o't, for he saw the half world was like to regard him as a thief and a cheat, and he took that worse than ever the ruin of his house and hauld.

On he rode, little caring where. It was a dark night, morned, and the trees made it yet darker, and he by the forest took its own road through the wood, and all of a sudden from trees and weeds that rose before the nag began to spring, and flew, and said, that my gudewife could hardly keep the saddle—then the whole, a horseman, suddenly riding up behind him, said, "Thou's a wicket beast of yours, Steenie, as ye sell him?" So saying, he touched the horse's neck with his riding word, and it felt some work though he of a stumbling trot. "But his speech got out of him, I think," continued the stranger, "and that is like many a man's courage, that thinks he wad do great things till he come to the point."

My gudewife scarce listened to this, but spent his horse, with "Gude e'en to you, friend."

But it's like the stranger was one that doesn't lightly yield his point, for, rode as Steenie that he was aye beside him at the evil-smelling pace. At his my gudewife, Steenie Steenie, grew half angry, and to say the truth, half scared.

"What is it that ye want with me, friend?" he said. "If ye be a robber, I have no money, if ye be a bad man, wanting company, I have no heart to mirth or speaking, and if ye want to be a thief and I scarce ken it myself."

"If you will tell me your grief," said the stranger, "I am sure that, though I have been our master in the world, am the only hand for helping my friend."

So my gudewife, to ease his ain heart, and that from any hope of help, told him the story from beginning to end.

"It's a hard pinch," said the stranger; "but I shall I can help you."

"If you could lend the money, sir, and take a bit day—I ken no other help on earth," said my gudewife.

"But there may be some under the earth," said the stranger. "Come, I'll be frank with you; I could lend you the money on bond, but ye would maybe accept my terms. Now, I can tell you, that your old Lord is disturbed in his grave by your curse, and the winking of your family, and if ye dur venture to go to see him, he will give you the sumpt."

My gude's hair stood on end at this proposal, but he thought his companion might be some hypocritical child that was trying to frighten him and might end with lending him the money. Besides, he was hould wi' brandy, and desperate wi' distress, and he said, he had courage to go to the gate of hell, and a step farther for that receipt. — The stranger laughed.

Well, they rode on through the thickets of the wood, when, all of a sudden, the horse stopped at the door of a great house; and, but that he knew the place was ten miles off, my father would have thought he was at Redgauntlet Castle. They rode into the outer court-yard, through the wicket folding yett and on into the auld portico, and the whole front of the house was lighted, and there were pipes and fiddles, and as much dancing and derry wicking as used to be in Sir Robert's house at Pace and Yair and such high seasons. They lap off, and my gude, as seemed to him, fastened his horse to the very ring he had tied him to that morning, when he paid to wait on the young Sir John.

"God!" said my gude, "if Sir Robert's death be but a dream!"

He knocked at the ha' door just as he was went and his auld acquaintance, Dougal MacCallum, — just after his wont, — came to open the door, and said, "Piper Stenno are ye there, lad? Sir Robert has been crying for you."

My gude was like a man in a dream — he looked for the stranger but he was gone for the time. At last he just tried to say, "Ho! Dougal Driveover, are ye living? I thought ye had been dead."

"Never fash yoursel' at me," said Dougal, "but look to yoursel', and see ye tak' naething frae anybody here, neither meat, drink, or silver, except just the receipt that is your ain."

So saying, he led the way out through halls and transees that were well kempt to my gude, and into the auld oak parlour, and there was as much singing of profane songs, and burling of red wine, and speaking of blasphemy and sculduggery, as had ever been in Redgauntlet Castle when it was at the blithro.

But, Lord take us in keeping! what a set of ghastly revellers they were that sat round that table! My gude's head ached with that had long before gone to their place, far often had he piped to the most part in the hall of Redgauntlet. There was the ferre Mad Saton and the demented Rothen, and the crafty Lau-lundale, and Delpoll, with his bald head and a beard in his girdle, and Earlsdale, with Cameron's blade in his hand, and widd Bonshaw that had blasted Sir Corbally's limbs till the blade sprung, and Dum-barton Douglas, the twice-turned traitor back to country and king. There was the Bludy Advocate MacKeenye, who, for his wordly wit and wisdom, had been to the rest as a god. And there was Clever young, as beautiful as when he lived, with his long, lock, curled locks, streaming down over his laced waistcoat, and his left hand always on his right spulshide, to hide the wound that the silver bullet had made.* He sat apart from them all, and looked at them with a melancholy, haughty countenance; while the rest hallowed, and sang, and laughed, that the room rang. But their smiles were fearfully contorted from time to time, and their laughter passed into such wild sounds, as made my gude's a very malle grow thin, and chilled the marrow in his bones.

They that waited at the table were just the wicked serving-men and troopers, that had done their work and cruel bidding on earth. There was the Long Leg of the Netherdown, that helped to take Argyll; and the Bishop's summer, that they called the Devil's Rattle-bag; and the wicked guardmen, in their laced coats, and the savage Highland Amos, that shed blood like water, and many a proud serving-man, haughty of heart and bloody of hand, cringing to the rich, and making them wretched when they would be, grinding the poor to powder, when the rich had broken them to fragments. And many, many more were coming and going, as busy in their vocation as if they had been alive.

Sir Robert Redgauntlet, in the midst of a' this fearful riot, cried, wi' a voice like thunder, on Stenno Piper, to come to the board head where he was sitting; his legs stretched out before him and swathed up with flannel with his holster pistols aside him, while the great broadsword rested against his chair just as my gude's had seen him the last time upon earth — the very cushion for the jackanape was close to him, but the creature itself was not there — it seemed to him, it's likely, for he heard them say as he came forward, "Is not the Major come yet?" And another answered, "The jackanape will be here betimes the morn." And when my gude came forward, Sir Robert, or his ghost, or the devil in his likeness, said, "Well, piper, hae ye settled wi' my son for the pair's rent?"

With much ado my father got breath to say, that Sir John would not settle without his honour's receipt.

"Ye shall hae that for a tune of the pipes, Stenno," said the appearance of Sir Robert — "Play us up, Wreel-baird, Luckie!"

Now this was a tone my gude learned frae a warlock, that heard it when they were worshipping Satan at their meetings, and my gude had sometimes played it at the raving suppers in Redgauntlet Castle, but never very willingly, and now he grew cold at the very name of it, and said, for excuse, he had no pipes wi' him.

"MacCallum, ye limb of Belzebub," said the fearful Sir Robert, "bring Stenno the pipes that I am keeping for him."

MacCallum brought a pair of pipes which might have served the pipe of Donald of the Isles. But he gave my gude a nudge as he offered them, and looking secretly and closely, Stenno saw that the chanter was of steel, and heated to a white heat; so he had fair warning not to trust his fingers with it. So he excused himself again, and said, he was faint and frightened, and had not wind enough to fill the bag.

"Then ye maun eat and drink, Stenno," said the figure; "for we do little else here; and it's ill speaking between a fou man and a fasting."

Now these were the very words that the bloody Earl of Douglas said to keep the King's messenger's hand while he cut the head off MacLellan of Bombie, at the Threave Castle; and that put Stenno's hair and man on his guard. So he spoke up like a man, and said he came neither to eat, or drink, or make conversation; but simply for his ain — to ken what was come o' the money he had paid, and to get a discharge for it, and he was so stout hearted by the time, that he charged Sir Robert for conscience-sake — (he had no power to say the holy name) — and as he hoped for peace and rest, to spread no snare for him, but just to give him his ain.

The appearance smacked its teeth and laughed, but it took from a large pocket book the receipt, and handed it to Stenno. "There is your receipt, ye gillie cur, and for the money my dog whelp o' a son may no lack for it in the Cat's Cuddle."

* The reader is referred for particulars to Pitt-Rivers's History of Scotland.

* The passages here criticised are some of them characters of Scotland from — but these long known and recommended may be found in the tract entitled "The Judgment and Justice of God Exemplified in a Brief Historical Account of some of the Chief Lives and Memorable Deaths of some of the most remarkable Apostates and Devote Persecutors from the Reformation till after the Revolution." This constitutes a part of another of our appendices to John Mordaunt of Larchmont's "Account of the Lives of the most eminent Scots Worthies." The author has, with considerable ingenuity, covered his poisoning upon the subject to be drawn from the prosperity or misfortune which befall individuals in this world, either in the power of their lives or in the hour of death. In the account of the various sufferings such infirmities are mentioned only as being suggested by Providence for the better and brighter display of the faith and piety of the subjects. But when a man of the highest talents, the acquirements, they are suggested to the direct purposes of Heaven upon their misery. If indeed the life of any person abundant in the happiness of a virtuous life, should be ended in a sudden prosperity, the time of its being thus terminated by death is suggested as an undoubted token of the judgment of Heaven, and to render the punishment more effectual, he has been in private furnished with some singular circumstances. Thus the Duke of Lauderdale is said, through the agency of some malignant spirits, to have become so much in debt, that he has been ever out the business of a soldier.

My gudesire uttered mony thanks, and was about to retire, when Sir Robert roared aloud, "Stop, though, thou sack-doubling son of a whore! I ain not done with thee. HERE we do nothing for nothing; and you must return on this very day twelvemonth, to pay your master the homage that you owe me for my protection."

My father's tongue was loosed of a sudden, and he said aloud, "I refer myself to God's pleasure, and not to yours."

He had no sooner uttered the word than all was dark around him; and he sunk on the earth with such a sudden shock, that he lost both breath and sense.

How lang Steenie lay there, he could not tell; but when he came to himself, he was lying in the auld kirkyard of Redgauntlet parochine, just at the door of the family aisle, and the scutcheon of the auld knight, Sir Robert, hanging over his head. There was a deep morning fog on grass and gravestone around him, and his horse was feeding quietly beside the minister's twa cows. Steenie would have thought the whole was a dream, but he had the receipt in his hand, fairly written and signed by the auld Laird; only the last letters of his name were a little disorderly, written like one seized with sudden pain.

Sorely troubled in his mind, he left that dreary place, rode through the mist to Redgauntlet Castle, and with much ado he got speech of the Laird.

"Well, you dyvour bankrupt," was the first word, "have you brought me my rent?"

"No," answered my gudesire, "I have not; but I have brought your honour Sir Robert's receipt for it."

"How, sirrah?—Sir Robert's receipt!—You told me he had not given you one."

"Will your honour please to see if that bit line is right?"

Sir John looked at every line, and at every letter, with much attention; and at last, at the date, which my gudesire had not observed.—"From my appointed place," he read, "this twenty-fifth of November."—"What!—That is yesterday!—Villain, thou must have gone to hell for this!"

"I got it from your honour's father—whether he be in heaven or hell, I know not," said Steenie.

"I will delate you for a warlock to the Privy Council!" said Sir John. "I will send you to your master, the devil, with the help of a tar-barrel and a torch!"

"I intend to delate myself to the Presbytery," said Steenie, "and tell them all I have seen last night, whilk are things fitter for them to judge of than a borrel man like me."

Sir John paused, composed himself, and desired to hear the full history; and my gudesire told it him from point to point, as I have told it you—word for word, neither more nor less.

Sir John was silent again for a long time, and at last he said, very composedly, "Steenie, this story of yours concerns the honour of many a noble family besides mine; and if it be a leasing-making, to keep yourself out of my danger, the least you can expect is to have a red-hot iron driven through your tongue, and that will be as bad as scolding your fingers with a red-hot chanter. But yet it may be true, Steenie; and if the money cast up, I shall not know what to think of it.—But where shall we find the Cat's Cradle? There are cats enough about the old house, but I think they kitten without the ceremony of bed or cradle."

"We were best ask Hutcheon," said my gudesire; "he kens a' the odd corners about as weel as—another serving-man that is now gane, and that I wad not like to name."

Aweel, Hutcheon, when he was asked, told them, that a ruinous turret, lang disused, next to the clock-house, only accessible by a ladder, for the opening was on the outside, and far above the battlements, was called of old the Cat's Cradle.

"There will I go immediately," said Sir John; and he took (with what purpose, Heaven kens) one of his father's pistols from the hall-table, where they had lain since the night he died, and hastened to the battlements.

It was a dangerous place to climb, for the ladder was auld and frail, and wanted ane or twa rounds. However, up got Sir John, and entered at the turret door, where his body stopped the only little light that was in the bit turret. Something flees at him wi' a vengeance, maist dang him back ower—bang gaid the knight's pistol, and Hutcheon, that held the ladder, and my gudesire that stood beside him, bears a loud skelloch. A minute after, Sir John flings the body of the jackanape down to them, and cries that the siller is fund, and that they should come up and help him. And there was the bag of siller sure enough, and mony orra things besides, that had been missing for mony a day. And Sir John, when he had rped the turret weel, led my gudesire into the dining-parlour, and took him by the hand, and spoke kindly to him, and said he was sorry he should have doubted his word, and that he would hereafter be a good master to him to make amends.

"And now, Steenie," said Sir John, "although this vision of yours tends, on the whole, to my father's credit, as an honest man, that he should, even after his death, desire to see justice done to a poor man like you, yet you are sensible that ill-dispositioned men might make bad constructions upon it, concerning his soul's health. So, I think, we had best let the haill dirdum on that ill-deedie creature, Max Weir, and say naething about your dream in the wood of Pitmurkie. You had taken ower muckle brandy to be very certain about ony thing; and, Steenie, this receipt," (his hand shook while he held it out.)—"its but a queer kind of document, and I will do best, I think, to put it quietly in the fire."

"Och, but for as queer as it is, it's a' the voucher I have for my rent," said my gudesire, who was afraid it may be, of losing the benefit of Sir Robert's discharge.

"I will bear the contents to your credit in the rental-book, and give you a discharge under my own hand," said Sir John, "and that on the spot. And Steenie, if you can hold your tongue about this matter, you shall sit, from this term downward, at an easier rent."

"Many thanks to your honour," said Steenie, who saw easily in what corner the wind was; "doubtless I will be conformable to all your honour's commands; only I would willingly speak wi' some powerful minister on the subject, for I do not like the sort of summons of appointment whilk your honour's father"—

"Do not call the phantom my father!" said Sir John, interrupting him.

"Weel, then, the thing that was so like him," said my gudesire; "he spoke of my coming back to him this time twelvemonth, and it's a weight on my conscience."

"Aweel, then," said Sir John, "if you be so much distressed in mind, you may speak to our minister of the parish; he is a douce man, regards the honour of our family, and the mair that he may look for some patronage from me."

Wi' that my gudesire readily agreed that the receipt should be burnt, and the Laird threw it into the chimney with his ain hand. Burn it would not for them, though; but away it flew up the lum, wi' a lang train of sparks at its tail, and a hissing noise like a squib.

My gudesire gaed down to the manse, and the minister, when he had heard the story, said, it was his real opinion, that though my gudesire had gane very far in tampering with dangerous matters, yet, as he had refused the devil's arles, (for such was the offer of meat and drink,) and had refused to do homage by piping at his bidding, he hoped, that if he held a circumpect walk hereafter, Satan could take little advantage by what was come and gane. And, indeed, my gudesire, of his ain accord, lang forswore both the pipes and the brandy—it was not even till the year was out, and the fatal day passed, that he would so much as take the fiddle, or drink usquebaugh or upenny.

Sir John made up his story about the jackanape as he liked himself; and some believe till this day there was no more in the matter than the filching name.

But of was general throughout Scotland, that the excessive tion over the loss of friends disturbed the repose of the id broke even the rest of the grave. There are several s of this in tradition, but one struck me particularly, as it from the lips of one who professed receiving it from a ghost-seeer. This was a Highland lady, named Mrs. B—, who probably believed firmly in the truth of an on, which seems to have originated in the weakness of es and strength of her imagination. She had been lately dow by her husband, with the office of guardian to their ild. The young man added to the difficulties of his by an extreme propensity for a military life, which his was unwilling to give way to, while she found it impos-

The Independent Company into which was to enter had a skirmish with a party of catherans in some act of spoil, and her friend the Captain being d and out of the reach of medical assistance, died in ence. This news was a thunderbolt to the poor mother at once deprived of her kinsman's advice and assist- id instructed by his fate of the unexpected danger to her son's new calling exposed him. "I should not have made that inference," said I. "Your grandfather's adventure was fortunate for himself, whom it saved from ruin and distress: and fortunate for his landlord also, whom it prevented from committing a gross act of injustice."

KING JAMES I.

I CONTINUE to scribble at length, though the subject may seem somewhat deficient in interest. Let the grace of the narrative, therefore, and the concern we take in each other's matters, make amends for its tenuity. We fools of fancy, who suffer ourselves, like Malvolio, to be cheated with our own visions, have, nevertheless, this advantage over the wise ones of the earth, that we have our whole stock of enjoyments under our own command, and can dish for ourselves an intellectual banquet with most moderate assistance from external objects. It is, to be sure, something like the feast which the Barmecide served up to Alnaschar; and we cannot be expected to get fat upon such diet. But then, neither is there repletion nor nausea, which often succeed the grosser and more material revel. On the whole, I still pray, with the Ode to Castle Building—

"Give me thy hope which sickens not the heart;
Give me thy wealth which has no wings to fly;
Give me the bliss thy visions can impart;
Thy friendship give me, warm in poverty!"

And so, despite thy solemn smile and sapient shake of the head, I will go on picking such interest as I can out of my trivial adventures, even though that interest should be the creation of my own fancy; nor will I cease to inflict on thy devoted eyes the labour of perusing the scrolls in which I shall record my narrative.

My last broke off as we were on the point of descending into the glen at Brokenburn, by the dangerous track which I had first travelled en croupe, behind a furious horseman, and was now again to brave under the precarious guidance of a blind man.

It was now getting dark; but this was no inconvenience to my guide, who moved on, as formerly, with instinctive security of step, so that we soon reached the bottom, and I could see lights twinkling in the cottage which had been my place of refuge on a former occasion. It was not thither, however, that our course was directed. We left the habitation of the Laird to the left, and turning down the brook, soon approached the small hamlet which had been erected at the mouth of the stream, probably on account of the convenience which it afforded as a harbour to the fishing-boats. A large low cottage, full in our front, seemed highly illuminated; for the light not only glanced from every window and aperture in its frail walls, but was even visible from rents and fractures in the roof, composed of tarred shingles, repaired in part by thatch and dicot.

While these appearances engaged my attention, that of my companion was attracted by a regular succession of sounds, like a bouncing on the floor, mixed with a very faint noise of music, which Willie's acute organs at once recognised and accounted for, while to me it was almost inaudible. The old man struck the earth with his staff in a violent passion. "The whoreson fisher rabble! They have brought another violer upon my walk! They are such smuggling blackguards, that they must run in their very music; but I'll sort them waur than ony gauger in the country.—Stay—hark—it's no a fiddle neither—it's the pipe and tabor bastard, Simon of Sowport, frae the Nicol Forest; but I'll pipe and tabor him!—Let me hae ance my left hand on his cravat, and ye shall see what my right will do. Come away, chap—come away, gentle chap—nae time to be picking and wailing your steps." And on he passed with long and determined strides, dragging me along with him.

I was not quite easy in his company; for, now that his minstrel pride was hurt, the man had changed from the quiet, decorous, I might almost say respectable person, which he seemed while he told his tale, into the appearance of a fierce brawling, dissolute stroller. So that when he entered the large hut, where a great number of fishers, with their wives and daughters, were engaged in eating, drinking, and dancing, I was somewhat afraid that the impatient violence of my companion might procure us an indifferent reception.

But the universal shout of welcome with which Wandering Willie was received—the hearty congratulation—the repeated "Here's t'ye, Willie!"—"Whare hae ye been, ye blind deevil?" and the call upon him to pledge them—above all, the speed with which the obnoxious pipe and tabor were put to silence, gave the old man such effectual assurance of undiminished popularity and importance, as at once put his jealousy to rest, and changed his tone of offended dignity, into one better fitted to receive such cordial greetings. Young men and women crowded round, to tell how much they were afraid some mischance had detained him, and how two or three young fellows had set out in quest of him.

"It was nae mischance, praised be Heaven," said Willie, "but the absence of the lazy loon Rob the Rambler, my comrade, that didna come to meet me on the Links; but I hae gotten a braw consort in his stead, worth a dozen of him, the unhang'd black-guard."

"And wha is't tou's gotten, Wullie, lad?" said half a score of voices, while all eyes were turned on your humble servant, who kept the best countenance he could, though not quite easy at becoming the centre to which all eyes were pointed.

"I ken him by his hemmed cravat," said one fellow; "it's Gil Hobson, the souple tailor frae Burgh.—Ye are welcome to Scotland, ye prick-the-clout loon," he said, thrusting forth a paw much the colour of a badger's back, and of most portentous dimensions.

"Gil Hobson? Gil whoreson!" exclaimed Wandering Willie; "it's a gentle chap that I judge to be an apprentice wi' auld Joshua Geddes, to the quaker-trade."

"What trade be's that, man?" said he of the badger-coloured fist.

"Canting and lying,"—said Willie, which produced a thundering laugh; "but I am teaching the callant a better trade, and that is feasting and fiddling."

Willie's conduct in thus announcing something like my real character, was contrary to compact; and yet I was rather glad he did so, for the consequence of putting a trick upon these rude and ferocious men, might, in case of discovery, have been dangerous to us both, and I was at the same time delivered from the painful effort to support a fictitious character. The good company, except perhaps one or two of the young women, whose looks expressed some desire for better acquaintance, gave themselves no farther trouble about me; but, while the seniors resumed their places near an immense bowl, or rather reeking caldron of brandy-punch, the younger arranged themselves on the floor, and called loudly on Willie to strike up.

With a brief caution to me, to "mind my credit for fishers have ears, though fish have none," Willie led off in capital style, and I followed, certainly not so as to disgrace my companion, who, every now and then, gave me a nod of approbation. The dances were, of course, the Scottish jigs, and reels, and "twosome dances," with a strathspey or hornpipe for interlude; and the want of grace, on the part of the performers, was amply supplied by truth of ear, vigour and decision of step, and the agility proper to the northern performers. My own spirits rose with the mirth around me, and with old Willie's admirable execution, and frequent "weel dune, gentle chap, yet!"—and, to confess the truth, I felt a great deal more pleasure in this rustic revel, than I have done at the more formal balls and concerts in your famed city, to which I have sometimes made my way. Perhaps this was because I was a person of more importance to the presiding matron of Brokenburn-foot, than I had the means of rendering myself to the far-famed Miss Nickie Murray, the patroness of your Edinburgh assemblies. The person I mean was a buxom dame of about thirty, her fingers loaded with many a silver ring, and three or four of gold; her ankles liberally displayed from under her numerous blue, white, and scarlet short petticoats, and attired in hose of the finest and whitest lamb's-wool, which arose from shoes of Spanish cordwain, fastened with silver buckles. She took the lead in my favour, and declared, "that the brave young gentleman should not weary himself to death wi' playing, but take the floor for a dance or twa."

"And what's to come of me, Dame Martin?" said Willie.

"Come o' thee?" said the dame; "mischance on the auld beard o' ye! ye could play for twenty hours on end, and tire out the hail country-side wi' dancing before you laid down your bow, saving for a by-drink or the like o' that."

"In troth, dame," answered Willie, "ye are nae me far wrang; sae if my comrade is to take his dance, ye maun gie me my drink, and then bob it away like Madge of Middlebie."

The drink was soon brought; but while Willie was partaking of it, a party entered the hut, which arrested my attention at once, and intercepted the intended gallantry with which I had proposed to present my hand to the fresh-coloured, well-made, white-ankled Thetis, who had obtained me manumission from my musical task.

This was nothing less than the sudden appearance of the old woman whom the Laird had termed Mabel; Cristal Nixon, his male attendant; and the young person who had said grace to us when I supped with him.

This young person—Alan, thou art in thy way a bit of a conjurer—this young person whom I did not describe, and whom you, for that very reason, suspected was not an indifferent object to me—is, I am sorry to say it, in very fact not so much so as in prudence she ought. I will not use the name of love on this occasion; for I have applied it too often to transient whims and fancies to escape your satire, should I venture to apply it now. For it is a phrase, I must confess, which I have used—a romancer would say, profaned—a little too often, considering how few years have passed over my head. But seriously, the fair chaplain of Brokenburn has been often in my head when she had no business there; and if this can give thee any clew for explaining my motives in lingering about the country, and assuming the character of Willie's companion, why, hang thee, thou art welcome to make use of it—a permission for which thou need'st not thank me much, as thou wouldst not have failed to assume it, whether it were given or no.

Such being my feelings, conceive how they must have been excited, when, like a beam upon a cloud, I saw this uncommonly beautiful girl enter the apartment in which they were dancing; not, however, with the air of an equal, but that of a superior, come to grace with her presence the festival of her dependants. The old man and woman attended, with looks as sinister as hers were lovely, like two of the worst winter months waiting upon the bright-eyed May.

When she entered—wonder if thou wilt—she wore a green mantle, such as thou hast described as the garb of thy fair client, and confirmed what I had partly guessed from thy personal description, that my chaplain and thy visiter were the same person. There was an alteration on her brow the instant she recognised me. She gave her cloak to her female attendant, and, after a momentary hesitation, as if uncertain whether to advance or retire, she walked into the room with dignity and composure, all making way, the men unbonneting, and the women curtseying respectfully, as she assumed a chair which was reverently placed for her accommodation, apart from others.

There was then a pause, until the bustling mistress of the ceremonies, with awkward, but kindly courtesy, offered the young lady a glass of wine, which was at first declined, and at length only thus far accepted, that, bowing round to the festive company, the fair visiter wished them all health and mirth, and, just touching the brim with her lip, replaced it on the salver. There was another pause; and I did not immediately recollect, confused as I was by this unexpected apparition, that it belonged to me to break it. At length a murmur was heard around me, being expected to exhibit,—nay, to lead down the dance,—in consequence of the previous conversation.

"Deil's in the fiddler lad," was muttered from more quarters than one—"saw folk ever sic a thing as a shamefaced fiddler before?"

At length a venerable Triton, seconding his remonstrances with a hearty thump on my shoulder, cried out, "To the floor—to the floor, and let us see how ye can fling—the lasses are a' waiting."

Up I jumped, sprung from the elevated station which constituted our orchestra, and, arranging my ideas as rapidly as I could, advanced to the head of the room, and, instead of offering my hand to the white-footed Thetis aforesaid, I venturously made the same proposal to her of the Green Mantle.

The nymph's lovely eyes seemed to open with astonishment at the audacity of this offer; and, from the murmurs I heard around me, I also understood that it surprised, and perhaps offended, the bystanders. But after the first moment's emotion, she wreathed her neck, and drawing herself hastily up, like one who was willing to show that she was sensible of the full extent of her own condescension, extended her hand towards me, like a princess gracing a squire of low degree.

There is affectation in all this, thought I to myself, if the Green Mantle has borne true evidence—for young ladies do not make visits, or write letters to counsel learned in the law, to interfere in the motions of those whom they hold as cheap as this nymph seems to do me; and if am cheated by a resemblance of cloaks, still I am interested to show myself, in some degree, worthy of the favour she has granted with so much state and reserve. The dance to be performed was the old Scots Jigg, in which you are aware I used to play no sorry figure at La Pique's, when thy clumsy movements used to be rebuked by raps over the knuckles with that great professor's fiddlestick. The choice of the tune was left to my comrade Willie, who, having finished his drink, feloniously struck up to the well-known and popular measure,

"Merrily danced the Quaker's wife,
And merrily danced the Quaker."

A astounding laugh arose at my expense, and I should have been annihilated, but that the smile which mantled on the lip of my partner, had a different expression from that of ridicule, and seemed to say, "Do not take this to heart." And I did not, Alan. My partner danced admirably, and I, like one who was determined, if outshone, which I could not help, not to be altogether thrown into the shade.

I assure you, our performance, as well as Willie's music, deserved more polished spectators and auditors; but we could not then have been greeted with such enthusiastic shouts of applause as attended while I handed my partner to her seat, and took my place by her side, as one who had a right to offer the attentions usual on such an occasion. She was visibly embarrassed, but I was determined not to observe her confusion, and to avail myself of the opportunity of learning whether this beautiful creature's mind was worthy of the casket in which Nature had lodged it.

Nevertheless, however courageously I formed this resolution, you cannot but too well guess the difficulties which I must needs have felt in carrying it into execution; since want of habitual intercourse with the charmers of the other sex has rendered me a sheepish cur, only one grain less awkward than thyself. Then she was so very beautiful, and assumed an air of so much dignity, that I was like to fall under the fatal error of supposing she should only be addressed with something very clever; and in the hasty racking which my brains underwent in this persuasion, not a single idea occurred that common sense did not reject as foolish on the one hand, or weary, flat, and stale triticism on the other. I felt as if my understanding were no longer my own, but was alternately under the dominion of Aldiborontiphoscophornio, and that of his facetious friend Rigdum-Funnidos. How did I envy at that moment our friend Jack Oliver, who produces with such happy complacence his fardel of small talk, and who, as he never doubts his own powers of affording amusement, passes them current with every pretty woman he approaches, and fills up the intervals of chat by his complete acquaintance with the exercise of the fan, the flacon, and the other duties of the Cavalier Serriente. Some of these I attempted, but I suppose it was awkwardly; at least the Lady Greenmantle received them as a princess accepts the homage of a clown.

Mean time the floor remained empty, and as the mirth of the good meeting was somewhat checked, I ventured, as a dernier resort, to propose a minuet. She thanked me, and told me haughtily enough, "she was here to encourage the harmless pleasures of these good folks, but was not disposed to make an exhibition of her own indifferent dancing for their amusement."

She paused a moment, as if she expected me to suggest something; and as I remained silent and rebuked, she bowed her head more graciously, and said, "Not to affront you, however, a country-dance, if you please."

What an ass was I, Alan, not to have anticipated her wishes! Should I not have observed that the ill-favoured couple, Mabel and Cristal had placed themselves on each side of her seat, like the supporters of the royal arms? the man, thick, short, shaggy, and hirsute, as the lion; the female, skin-dried tight-laced, long, lean, and hungry-faced, like the unicorn. I ought to have recollected, that under the close inspection of two such watchful salvages, our communication, while in repose, could not have been easy; that the period of dancing a minuet was not the very choicest time for conversation; but that the noise, the exercise, and the mazy confusion of a country-dance, where the inexperienced performers were every now and then running against each other, and compelling the other couples to stand still for a minute at a time, besides the more regular repose afforded by the intervals of the dance itself, gave the best possible openings for a word or two spoken in season, and without being liable to observation.

We had but just led down when an opportunity of the kind occurred, and my partner said, with great gentleness and modesty, "It is not perhaps very proper in me to acknowledge an acquaintance that is not claimed; but I believe I speak to Mr. Darsie Latimer?"

"Doris Latimer was indeed the person that had now the honour and happiness."

I would have gone on in the false gallop of compliment, but she cut me short. "And why," she said, "is Mr. Latimer here, and in disguise, or at least assuming an office unworthy of a man of education?—I beg pardon," she continued,—"I would not give you pain, but surely making an associate of a person of that description."

She looked towards my friend Willie, and was silent. I felt heartily ashamed of myself, and hastened to say it was an idle frolic, which want of occupation had suggested, and which I could not regret since it had procured me the pleasure I at present enjoyed.

Without seeming to notice my comment, she took the next opportunity to say, "Will Mr. Latimer permit a stranger who wishes him well to ask, whether it is right that, at his active age, he should be in so far void of occupation, as to be ready to adopt low society for the sake of idle amusement?"

"You are severe, madam," I answered, "but I can not think myself degraded by mixing with any society where I meet."

Here I stopped short, conscious that I was giving my answer an unhandsome turn. The argumentum ad hominem, the last to which a polite man has recourse, may, however, be justified by circumstances, but seldom or never the argumentum ad feminam.

She filled up the blank herself which I had left. "Where you meet me, I suppose you would say? But the case is different. I am, from my unhappy fate, obliged to move by the will of others, and to be in places which I would by my own will gladly avoid. Besides, I am, except for these few minutes, no participator of the revels—a spectator only, and attended by my servants. Your situation is different—you are here by choice, the partaker and minister of the pleasures of a class below you in education, birth, and fortunes. If I speak harshly, Mr. Latimer," she added, with much sweetness of manner, "I mean to do it."

I was confounded by her speech, "severe in youth, full wisdom;" all of naive or lively, suitable to such a dialogue, vanished from my recollection, and I answered, with gravity like her own, "I am indeed better educated than these poor people, but you, madam, whose kind admonition I am grateful for, must know more of my condition than I do myself. I dare not say I am their superior in birth, since I know nothing of my own, or in fortunes, over which hangs an impenetrable cloud."

"And why should your ignorance on these points drive you into low society and idle habits?" answered my female monitor. "Is it mainly to wait till fortune cast her beams upon you, when by exertion of your own energy you might distinguish your name?" "Do not the pursuits of learning lie open to you, if not the ambition of war?"—But no—not of war, that has already cost you too dear."

"I will be what you wish me to be," I replied with eagerness. "You have but to choose my path, and you shall see if I do not pursue it with energy were it only because you command me."

"Not because I command you," said the maiden, "but because reason, common sense, manhood, and, in one word, regard for your own safety, give the same counsel."

"At least permit me to reply, that reason and sense never assumed a fairer form—of presence on—I having added; for she turned from me—nor did she give me another opportunity of continuing what I had to say till the next pause of the dance, when, determined to bring our dialogue to a point, I said, "You mentioned manhood also, madam, and, in the same breath, personal danger. My idea of manhood suggests that it is cowardice to retreat before dangers of a doubtful character. You, who appear to know so much of my fortunes that I might call you my god and an angel, tell me what those dangers are, that I may judge whether manhood calls on me to face or to fly them."

She was evidently perplexed by this appeal.

"You make me pay dearly for acting as your humble adviser," she replied at last. "I acknowledge an interest in your fate, and yet I dare not tell you whence it arises; neither am I at liberty to say why, or from whom, you are in danger; but it is not less true that danger is near and imminent. Ask me no more, but, for your own sake, begone from this country. Elsewhere you are safe—here you do but run your fate."

"But am I doomed to bid thus farewell to almost the only human being who has showed an interest in my welfare?—Do not say so—say that we shall meet again, and the hope shall be the leading star to regulate my course?"

"It is more than probable," she said—"much more than probable, that we may never meet again. The help which I now render you is all that may be in my power; it is such as I should render to a blind man whom I might observe approaching the verge of a precipice, it ought to excite no surprise, and require no gratitude."

So saying, she again turned from me, nor did she address me until the dance was on the point of ending, when she said, "Do not attempt to speak to me again in the course of the night; leave the company as soon as you can, but not simply and God be with you."

I handed her to her seat, and did not quit the palm I held, without expressing my feelings by a gentle pressure. She coloured slightly, and withdrew her hand, but not angrily. Seeing the eyes of Coral and Mabel sternly fixed on me, I bowed back, and withdrew from her; my heart swelling and eyes becoming dim in spite of me, as the shifting crowd hid us from each other.

It was my intention to have crept back to my side Willie, and resumed my bow with such quiet I might, although at the moment I would have paid half my income for an instant's solitude. But my retreat was cut off by Dame Martin, with the festiveness—if it is not an inconsistent phrase—of an octogenary, that goes straight up to the point.

"Ay, lad, ye seem wery wane weery, to dance or lightly? Better the nag that ambles a day, or the horse that makes a bridle for a mile, and then is at the road."

This was a fair challenge, and I could not decline accepting it. Hence, I could see Dame Martin as queen of the revels, and so many were the odd and angular figures about me, that I was by no means certain whether I might not need some protection. I seized on her willing hand, and we took our place in the dance, where, if I did not acquit myself with the accuracy of step and movement which I had before attempted, I at least came up to the expectations of my partner, who said, and almost swore, "I was prima at it;" while, stimulated to her utmost exertions, she herself frisked like a kid, snapped her fingers like a catanista, whooped like a Bacchante, and bounded from the floor like a tennis-ball,—or if the colour of her garters was no particular mystery. She made the less secret of this, perhaps, that they were sky-blue, and fringed with silver.

The time has been that this would have been a great fun, or rather, last night was the only time I can recollect these four years when it would not have been so; yet, at this moment, I cannot tell you how I longed to be rid of Dame Martin. I almost said she would sprain one of those "many-twinkling" ankles, which served her so alertly; and when, in the midst of her exuberant capering, I saw my former partner leaving the apartment, and with eyes as I thought, turning towards me, this unwillingness to carry on the dance increased to such a point, that I was almost about to sign a divorce or a disengagement myself, in order to put an end to the performance. But there were around me scores of old women, all of whom looked as if they might have some secret recipe for such an accident; and, remembering old Blas and his pretended disorder in the robbery case, I thought it as wise to play Dame Martin false, and dance till she thought proper to dismiss me. Was I did I resolved to do stenuously, and in the last part of the exhibition, I cut and sprang from the floor as high and as perpendicularly as Dame Martin herself, and received, I promise you, thousands of applause, for the common people always prefer acrobatics and agility to grace. At length Dame Martin came dance no more, and, rejoicing at my release, I led her to a seat, and took the privilege of a partner to attend her.

"Hush, now," exclaimed Dame Martin, "I am our forgiveness! Troth, collins, I think ye has been against the death o' me."

I could only atone for the alleged offence by fetching her some refreshment, of which she readily partook.

"I have been lucky in my partners," I said, "first that pretty young lady, and then you, Mrs. Martin."

"Hout wi' your stretching," said Dame Martin.

"Gae we—gae we, lad, dinna blaw in folk's lugs that gae; me an' Miss Lillias even'd together! No, no, lad—oh, she is maybe four or five years younger than the like o' me—by and atter her gentle havings."

"She is the Lord's daughter?" said I, in as casual a tone of inquiry as I could assume.

"Her daughter, man? Na, na, only his niece—and sib enough to him, I think."

"Ay, indeed," I rejoined; "I thought she had borne his name?"

"She bears her an' name, and that's Lillias."

"And has she no other name?" asked I.

"What needs she another till she gets a gentleman?" answered my Thet, a little mirthed perhaps—in the women's phrase—that I turned the conversation upon my former partner, rather than addressed it to himself.

There was a short pause, which was interrupted by Dame Martin observing, "They are standing up again."

"True," said I, having no mind to renew my late violent capricious, "and I must go help old Willie."

As I could extricate myself, I heard poor Thet's address herself to a sort of Mr. man in a jacket of gingham's blue, and a pair of trousers, (whose hand, by the way, she had rejected at an earlier part of the evening,) and intimate that she was now disposed to take a trip.

"Tup away then, deary," said the vindictive man of the waters, without offering his hand; "there," pointing to the floor, "is a roomy berth for you."

Certain I had made one enemy, and perhaps two, I hastened to my original seat beside Willie, and began to handle my bow. But I could see that my conduct had made an unfavourable impression, the words, "flory conceited chap,"—"haffins jontle"—and at length, the still more alarming epithet of "ay," began to be buzzed about, and I was heartily glad when the apparition of Sam's visage at the door, who was already possessed of and draining a can of punch, gave me assurance that my means of retreat were at hand. I intimated as much to Willie, who probably had heard more of the murmurs of the company than I had, for he whispered, "Ay, ay—awe wi' ye—over lang here—slide out canny—dinna let them see ye are on the trane."

I slipped half a guinea into the old man's hand, who answered, "Truta! pruta! nonsense! but I'll be afore trusting ye can afford it—Awe wi' ye—and I'll be afore trusting ye can afford it."

I glided, by his advice, along the room as if looking for a part of the room, whom I disengaged with some difficulty from his can, and we left the cottage together in a manner as to attract the least possible observation. The houses were tied in a neighbouring road, and as the moon was up and I was now familiar with the road, broken and complicated as it is, we soon reached the Shepherd's Bush, where the old landlady was sitting up waiting for us, under some anxiety of mind, to account for which she did not hesitate to tell me that some folks had gone to Southburn from her house, or neighbouring towns, that did not come on safe back again. "Wandering Willie," she said, "was doubtless a kind of protection."

Here Willie's wife, who was smoking in the chimney corner, took up the praise of her "hinnin," as she called him, and endeavoured to awaken my generosity afresh, by describing the dangers from which, as she was pleased to allege, her husband's countenance had savedly been the means of preserving me. I was not, however, to be fooled out of more money at this time, and went to bed in haste, full of various cogitations.

I have since spent a couple of days betwixt Mount Sharon and this place, and betwixt reading, writing to thee this momentous history, forming plans for seeing the lovely Lillias, and—partly, I think, for the sake of contradiction—angling a little in spots of Joshua's scruples—though I am rather liking the amusement better as I begin to have some success in it.

And now, my dearest Alan, you are in full possession of my secret—let me as frankly into the recesses of your bosom. How do you feel towards this fair ignis fatuus, thus shy of the desert? Tell me honestly; for however the recollection of her may haunt my own mind, my love for Alan Fairford surpasses the love of woman. I know, too, that when you do love, it will be to "Love once and love no more."

A deep-consuming passion, once kindled in a breast as steady as yours, would never be extinguished but with life. I am of another and more volatile temper, and though I shall open your next with a trembling hand, and uncertain heart, yet let it bring a frank confession that this fair unknown has made a deeper impression on your gravity than you reckoned for, and you will see I can tear the arrow from my own wound, barb and all. In the mean time, though I have formed schemes once more to see her, I will, you may rely on it, take no step for putting them into practice. I have refrained from this hitherto, and I give you my word of honour, I shall continue to do so; yet why should you need any further assurance from one who is so entirely yours as

P. S. I shall be on thorns till I receive your answer. I read, and re-read your letter, and cannot for my soul discover what your real sentiments are. Sometimes I think you write of her as one in jest—and sometimes I think that cannot be. Put me at ease as soon as possible.

LETTER XIII.

ALAN FAIRFORD TO DAME MARTIN.

I wrote on the instant, as you direct; and in a trich-comer business, for I have a tear in my eye and a smile on my cheek. Dearest Dame, sure never a being but yourself could be so generous—sure never a being but yourself could be so absurd! I remember when you were a boy you wished to make your fine new whip a present to old aunt Peggy, merely because she admired it, and now, with like unreflecting and unappreciative liberality, you would resign your beloved to a smoke-dried young sophister, who cares not one of the hairs which it is his occupation to split, for all the daughters of Eve. I'm love with your Lillias—your green-waistle—your unknown enchantress—why I scarce saw her for five minutes, and even then only the tip of her chin was distinctly visible. She was well made, and the tip of her chin was of a most promising cast for the rest of the face; but, Heaven save you! she came upon business! and for a lawyer to fall in love with a pretty client on a single consultation, would be as wise as if he became enamoured of a particularly bright sunbeam which chanced for a moment to gild his bar-wig. I give you my word I am heart whole, and, moreover, I assure you, that before I suffer a woman to sit near my heart's core, I must see her full face, without mask or mantle, ay, and know a good deal of her mind into the bargain, so never fret yourself on my account, my kind and generous Dame, but, for your own sake, have a care, and let not in idle attachment, so lightly taken up, lead you into serious danger.

On this subject I feel so apprehensive, that now when I am decorated with the honours of the gown, I should have abandoned my career at the very starting to come to you, but for my father having contrived to clog my heels with letters of a professional nature, I will tell you the matter at length, for it is common enough; and why should not you list to my juridical adventures, as well as I to those of your fairer light-errantry?

It was after dinner, and I was considering how I might best introduce to my father the private resolution I had formed to set off for Dumfriesshire, or whether I had not better run away at once, and plead my excuse by letter, when, assuming the peculiar look with which he communicates any of his intentions respecting me that he suspects may not be altogether acceptable, "Alan," he said, "ye now wear a gown ye have opened shop, as we would say of a mere mechanical profession, and, doubtless, ye think the floor of the courts is strewn with guineas, and that ye have only to stoop down to gather them?"

"I hope I am a sensible, sir," I replied, "that I have some knowledge and practice to acquire, and must stoop for that in the first place."

"It is well said," answered my father; and always afraid to give too much encouragement, added, "Very well said, if it be well acted up to—'stoop to get knowledge and practice is the very word.' Ye know very well, Alan, that in the other faculty who study the Arts medicæ, before the young doctor goes to the bedside of patients, he must, as they call it, walk the hospitals, and cure Lazarus of his sores, before he be admitted to prescribe for Dives, when he has gout or indigestion."

"I am aware, sir, that"—

"What!—do not interrupt the court—Well—also the chirurgeons have a useful practice, by which they put their squinters and tyrones to work upon senseless dead bodies, to which, as they can do no good, as they certainly can do as little harm, while at the same time the tyros, or apprentice, gains experience, and becomes fit to whip off a leg or arm from a living subject, as cleanly as ye would slice an onion."

"I believe I guess your meaning, sir," answered I; "and were it not for a very particular engagement"—

"Do not speak to me of engagements; but what!—there is a good lad—and do not interrupt the court!"

My father you know is apt—be it said with all due duty—to be a little peevish in his tyrannies. I had nothing for it but to lean back and listen.

"Maybe you think, Alan, because I have, doubtless, the management of some actions in dependence which my worthy clients have intrusted me with, that I may think of setting them your way instantly, and as setting you up in practice as far as my small business or influence may go, and, doubtless, Alan, that is a day's talk I hope may come round. But then, before I give as the proverb hath it, 'My own fish guts to my own son maw,' I must, for the sake of my own character, be very sure that my son maw can pick them to some purpose. What say ye?"

"I am so far," answered I, "from wishing to get early into practice, sir, that I would willingly bestow a few days"—

"In further study, ye would say, Alan. But that is not the way either—ye must walk the hospitals—ye must cure Lazarus—ye must cut and carve on a departed subject, to show your skill."

"I am sure," I replied, "I will undertake the cause of any poor man with pleasure, and bestow as much pains upon it as if it were a duke's; but for the next two or three days"—

"They must be devoted to close study. Alan—very close study indeed; for ye must stand pained for a humerus, in procuratio Dominorum, upon Tuesday next."

"I, sir?" I replied in astonishment—"I have not opened my mouth in the Outer House yet!"

"Never mind the Court of the Gentles, man," said my father, "we will have you into the Sanctuary at once—no more shams, or rhymes."

"But, sir, I should really spoil any cause thrust on me so hastily."

"Ye cannot spoil it, Alan," said my father, rubbing his hands with much complacency, "that is the very cream of the business, man—it is just as I would before a subject upon which all the tyrones have been turning their whistles for fifteen years, and as there are ten or a dozen agents concerned, and as there is a stake of his own way, the case is come to that point at which the Stair or Arrestion could not mend it; and I do not think even you, Alan, can do a much harm—ye may get credit by it, but ye can lose none."

"And pray what is the name of my happy client, sir?" said I, ungraciously enough, I believe.

"It is a well-known name in the Parliament-House," replied my father, "To say the truth, I support him every moment; it is Peter Peebles."

"Peter Peebles?" exclaimed I, in astonishment; "he is an insane beggar—as poor as Job, and as mad as a March hare!"

"He has been plying in the court for fifteen years," said my father, in a tone of common reason, which seemed to acknowledge that this fact was enough to account for the poor man's condition both in mind and circumstances.

"Besides, sir," I added, he is on the Poor's Roll, and you know there are advocates regularly appointed to manage those cases; and for me to presume to interfere"—

"What! Alan!—never interrupt the court—do not in managed for ye like a wad ball," (my father sometimes draws his smiles from his once favorite game of golf)—"you must know, Alan, that Peter's case was to have been opened by young Dumfriesshire ye may ken the lad, a son of Dumfriesshire of that ilk, member of Parliament for the county of —, and nephew of the Laird's younger brother, worthy Laird Blackthorn, with ye are aware wounds as like him as a matchstick and a daisy seed, as a case up to a noble. Now Saunders Drudge, in his clerk, came to me this morning in the House, to the benefit of his wife; for it seems that young Dumfriesshire is one of the Poor's Lawyers, and Peter Peebles' process had been remitted to him of course. But when the hardhearted judge saw the fellow as indeed, Alan, they are none of the best, he was fidget, called for his hat, lap on, and away to the country he is gone; and my dear Saunders, my wife is at his wife's end with vexation and shame, to which never break off the case of the very start of it. I tell you, Saunders, and I, were I married and a friend or kinsman of mine should I say it, were I what the court was sitting, that I would, at least, what he liked, should never darken my door again. And then, Alan, I thought to turn the ball over my way, and I said that you were a good fellow, just off the iron, and if it would oblige my father and so forth, you would open Peter's case on Tuesday, and make some handsome apology for the absence of your learned friend, and the loss of your client and the court had sustained an irreparable loss at the proposition, like a good fellow, I was sure; for, he said, the only chance was to get a good hand, that did not ken the charge he was taking on him; for there was not a lad of two Scotchmen standing that was not dead with of Peter Peebles and his cause, and he advised me to break the matter out to you at the first, but I told him you were a good fellow, Alan, and had no will and pleasure in the matter but mine."

What could I say, Darnie, in answer to this arrangement, so very well meant—so very reason at the same time?—To imitate the defective flight of young Dumfriesshire, was at once to deny my father's hopes of me for ever; nay, such a levity with which he regarded all connected with his profession it might have been a step to breaking his heart. I was obliged, therefore, to bow in acquiescence, when my father called to James Wilmans, bringing the two bits of paper he would lay on his table.

Exit James, and presently re-enters, bending over the bowl of two huge leather bags, full of parchment, brown and labelled on the grossy backs with "The unfortunate in just (the person named Peter Peebles) (the court) frequented the courts of justice at the place the year 1788, and the sketch of his appearance, and from recollection. The author is of opinion that he is a good fellow, and the manner in which the Peter Peebles is a fine specimen of a man of letters, and as a man of good sense, in most young men who were called to the bar. The cause of the case is entirely imaginary."

I formerly a lawyer, supposed to be under the power of one of the particular judges, who occasionally used to say of me magic impress of the clerks of court, and the title, Peebles against Plainstones. This huge mass was deposited on the table, and my father, with no ordinary glee in his countenance, began to draw out the various bundles of papers, secured by none of your red tape or whipcord, but stout, substantial casts of tarred rope, such as might have held small craft at their moorings.

I made a last and desperate effort to get rid of the impending job. "I am really afraid, sir, that this case seems so much complicated, and there is so little time to prepare, that we had better move the Court to supersede it till next Session."

"How, sir?—how, Alan?" said my father—"Would you approbate and reprobate sir?—You have accepted the poor man's cause, and if you have not his fee in your pocket, it is because he has none to give you; and now would you approbate and reprobate in the same breath of your mouth?—Think of your oath of office, Alan, and your duty to your father, my dear boy."

Once more, what could I say?—I saw, from my father's hurried and alarmed manner, that nothing could vex him so much as failing in the point he had determined to carry, and once more intimated my readiness to do my best, under every disadvantage.

"Well, well, my boy," said my father, "the Lord will make your days long in the land, for the honour you have given to your father's gray hairs. You may find wiser advisers, Alan, but none that can wish you better."

My father, you know, does not usually give way to expressions of affection, and they are interesting in proportion to their rarity. My eyes began to fill at seeing his glisten; and my delight at having given him such sensible gratification would have been unmixed, but for the thoughts of you. These out of the question, I could have grappled with the bags, had they been as large as corn-sacks. But, to turn what was grave into farce, the door opened, and Wilkinson ushered in Peter Peebles.

You must have seen this original, Darsie, who, like others in the same predicament, continues to haunt the courts of justice, where he has made shipwreck of time, means, and understanding. Such insane paupers have sometimes seemed to me to resemble wrecks lying upon the shoals on the Goodwin Sands, or in Yarmouth Roads, warning other vessels to keep aloof from the banks on which they have been lost; or rather such ruined clients are like scarecrows and potato-bogles, distributed through the courts to scare away fools from the scene of litigation.

The identical Peter wears a huge great-coat, threadbare and patched itself, yet carefully so disposed and secured by what buttons remain, and many supplementary pins, as to conceal the still more infirm state of his under garments. The shoes and stockings of a ploughman were, however, seen to meet at his knees, with a pair of brownish, blackish breeches: a rusty-coloured handkerchief, that has been black in its day, surrounded his throat, and was an apology for linen. His hair, half gray half black, escaped in elf-locks around a huge wig, made of tow, as it seemed to me, and so much shrunk, that it stood upon the very top of his head; above which he plants, when covered, an immense cocked hat, which, like the chieftain's banner in an ancient battle, may be seen any seditious day betwixt nine and ten, high towering above all the fluctuating and changeable scene in the Outer House, where his eccentricities often make him the centre of a group of petulant and teasing boys, who exercise upon him every art of ingenious torture. His countenance, originally that of a portly, comely burgess, is now emaciated with poverty and anxiety, and rendered wild by an insane lightness about the eyes; a withered and blighted skin and complexion; features begrimed with snuff, charged with the self-importance peculiar to insanity; and a habit of perpetually speaking to himself. Such was my unfortunate client; and I must allow, Darsie, that my profession had need to do a great deal of good, if as is much to be feared, it brings many individuals to such a pass.

After we had been, with a good deal of form, presented to each other, at which time I easily saw by my father's manner that he was desirous of supporting Peter's character in my eyes, as much as circumstances would permit, "Alan," he said, "this is the gentleman who has agreed to accept of you as his counsel, in place of young Dumtoustie."

"Entirely out of favour to my old acquaintance your father," said Peter, with a benign and patronising countenance, "out of respect to your father, and my old intimacy with Lord Bladderskate. Otherwise, by the Regiam Majestatem! I would have presented a petition and complaint against Daniel Dumtoustie, Advocate, by name and surname—I would, by all the practises!—I know the forms of process; and I am not to be trifled with."

My father here interrupted my client, and reminded him that there was a good deal of business to do, as he proposed to give the young counsel an outline of the state of the conjoined process, with a view to letting him into the merits of the cause, disencumbered from the points of form. "I have made a short abridge, Mr. Peebles," said he; "having sat up late last night, and employed much of this morning in wading through these papers, to save Alan some trouble, and I am now about to state the result."

"I will state it myself," said Peter, breaking in without reverence upon his solicitor.

"No, by no means," said my father; "I am your agent for the time."

"Mine eleventh in number," said Peter; "I have a new one every year; I wish I could get a new coat as regularly."

"Your agent for the time," resumed my father; "and you, who are acquainted with the forms, know that the client states the cause to the agent—the agent to the counsel"—

"The counsel to the Lord Ordinary," continued Peter, once set a-going, like the peal of an alarm clock, "the Ordinary to the Inner-House, the President to the Bench. It is just like the rope to the man, the man to the axe, the axe to the ox, the ox to the water, the water to the fire"—

"Hush, for Heaven's sake, Mr. Peebles," said my father, cutting his recitation short; "time wears on—we must get to business—you must not interrupt the court, you know.—Hem, hem! From this abridge it appears"—

"Before you begin," said Peter Peebles, "I'll thank you to order me a morsel of bread and cheese, or some cauld meat, or broth, or the like alimentary provision; I was so anxious to see your son, that I could not eat a mouthful of dinner."

Heartily glad, I believe, to have so good a chance of stopping his client's mouth effectually, my father ordered some cold meat; to which James Wilkinson, for the honour of the house, was about to add the brandy bottle, which remained on the sideboard, but, at a wink from my father, supplied its place with small beer. Peter charged the provisions with the rapacity of a famished lion; and so well did the diversion engage him, that though, while my father stated the case, he looked at him repeatedly, as if he meant to interrupt his statement, yet he always found more agreeable employment for his mouth, and returned to the cold beef with an avidity which convinced me he had not had such an opportunity for many a day of satiating his appetite. Omitting much formal phraseology, and many legal details, I will endeavour to give you, in exchange for your fiddler's tale, the history of a litigant, or rather, the history of his lawsuit.

"Peter Peebles and Paul Plainstones," said my father, "entered into partnership, in the year —, as mercers and linendrapers, in the Luckenbooths, and carried on a great line of business to mutual advantage. But the learned counsel needeth not to be told, societas est mater discordiarum, partnership oft makes pleaship. The company being dissolved by mutual consent in the year —, the affairs had to be wound up, and after certain attempts to settle the matter extrajudicially, it was at last brought into the Court, and has branched out into several distinct processes, most of which have been conjoined by the Ordinary. It is to the state of these processes that counsel's attention is particularly directed. There is the original action of Peebles v. Plainstones, convening him for payment of 3000*l.*, less or more, as alleged balance due by Plainstones. 2dly, There is a counter action, in which Plainstones is pursuer and Peebles defender, for 2500*l.*, less or more, being balance alleged per contra, to be due by Peebles. 3dly, Mr. Peebles's seventh agent advised an action of Compt and Reckoning at his instance, wherein what balance should prove due on either side might be fairly struck and ascertained. 4thly, To meet the hypothetical case, that Peebles might be found liable in a balance to Plainstones, Mr. Wildgoose, Mr. Peebles's eighth agent, recommended a Multiplepoinding, to bring all parties concerned into the field."

My brain was like to turn at this account of lawsuit within law suit, like a nest of chip-boxes, with all of which I was expected to make myself acquainted.

"I understand," I said, "that Mr. Peebles claims a sum of money from Plainstones—how then can he be his debtor? and if not his debtor, how can he bring a Multiplepoinding, the very summons of which sets forth, that the pursuer does owe certain moneys, which he is desirous to pay by warrant of a judge?"

"Ye know little of the matter, I doubt, friend," said Mr. Peebles; "a Multiplepoinding is the safest remedium juris in the whole form of process. I have known it conjoined with a declarator of marriage.—Your beef is excellent," he said to my father, who in vain endeavoured to resume his legal disquisition; "but something highly powdered—and the twopenny is undeniable; but it is small swipes—small swipes—more of hop than malt—with your leave I'll try your black-bottle."

My father started to help him with his own hand, and in due measure; but, infinitely to my amusement, Peter got possession of the bottle by the neck, and my father's ideas of hospitality were far too scrupulous to permit his attempting, by any direct means, to redeem it; so that Peter returned to the table triumphant, with his prey in his clutch.

"Better have a wine-glass, Mr. Peebles," said my father, in an admonitory tone, "you will find it pretty strong."

"If the kirk is ower muckle, we can sing mass in the quire," said Peter, helping himself in the goblet out of which he had been drinking the small beer. "What is it, usquebaugh?—BRANDY, as I am an honest man! I had almost forgotten the name and taste of brandy.—Mr. Fairford elder, your good health," (a mouthful of brandy)—"Mr. Alan Fairford, wishing you well through your arduous undertaking," (another go-down of the comfortable liquor.) "And now, though you have given a tolerable breviate of this great lawsuit, of whilk every body has heard something that has walked the boards in the Outer-House, (here's to ye again, by way of interim decreet,) yet ye have omitted to speak a word of the arrestments."

"I was just coming to that point, Mr. Peebles."

"Or of the action of suspension of the charge on the bill."

"I was just coming to that."

"Or the advocacy of the Sheriff-Court process."

"I was just coming to it."

"As Tweed comes to Melrose, I think," said the litigant; and then filling his goblet about a quarter full of brandy, as if in absence of mind, "Oh, Mr. Alan Fairford, ye are a lucky man to buckle to such a cause as mine at the very outset! it is like a specimen of all causes, man. By the Regiam, there is not a remedium juris in the practiques but ye'll find a spice o't. Here's to your getting weel through with it—Pshut—I am drinking naked spirits, I think. But if the heathen be ower strong, we'll christen him with the brewer," (here he added a little small beer to his beverage, paused, rolled his eyes, winked, and proceeded,)—"Mr. Fairford—the action of assault and battery, Mr. Fairford, when I compelled the villain Plainstones to pull my nose within two steps of King Charles's statue, in the Parliament Close—there I had him in a hose-net. Never man could tell me how to shape that process—no counsel that ever sold wind could condescend and say whether it were best to proceed by way of petition and complaint, ad dictum publicam, with consent of his Majesty's advocate, or by action on the statute for battery, pendente lite, whilk would be the winning my plea at once, and so getting a back-door out of Court.—By the Regiam, that beef and brandy is unco bet at my heart—I maun try the ale again," (sipped a little beer; "and the ale's but cauld, I maun e'en put in the rest of the brandy.")

* Multiplepoinding is, I believe, equivalent to what is called in England a case of Double Distress.

He was as good as his word, and proceeded in so loud and animated a style of elocution, thumping the table, drinking and snuffing alternately, that my father, abandoning all attempts to interrupt him, sat silent and ashamed, suffering and anxious for the conclusion of the scene.

"And then to come back to my pet process of assault and battery and assault process, when I had the good luck to provoke him to pull my nose at the very threshold of the Court, whilk was the very thing I wanted—Mr. Pest, ye ken him, Daddie Fairford? Old Pest was for making it out hamesucken, for he said the Court might be said—said—ugh!—to be my dwelling place. I dwell mair there than ony gate else, and the essence of hamesucken is to strike a man in his dwelling place—mind that, young advocate—and so there's hope Plainstones may be hanged, as many has for a less matter; for, my Lords,—will Pest say to the Judiciary bodies,—my Lords, the Parliament House is Peebles's place of dwelling, says he—being communi forum, and commune forum est commune domicilium—Lass, fetch another glass of whisky, and score it—time to gae hame—by the practiques, I cannot find the jug—yet there's twa of them, I think. By the Regiam, Fairford—Daddie Fairford—lend us twa pennies to buy sneeshing, mine is done—Macer, call another cause."

The box fell from his hands, and his body wobbled; the same time have fallen from the chair, had I not supported him.

"This is intolerable," said my father—"Call a chairman, James Wilkinson, to carry this degraded, worthless, drunken beast home."

When Peter Peebles was removed from this memorable consultation, under the care of an able-bodied Celt, my father hastily bundled up the papers as a showman, whose exhibition has miscarried, hastes to remove his booth. "Here are my memoranda, Alan," he said, in a hurried way; "look them carefully over—compare them with the processes, and turn it in your head before Tuesday. Many a good speech has been made for a beast of a client; and hark ye, hark ye—I never intended to cheat you of your fee when all was done, though I would have liked to have heard the speech first; but there is nothing like corning the horse before the journey. Here are five goud guineas in a silk purse—of your poor mother's netting, Alan—she would have been a blithe woman to have seen her young son with a gown on his back—but no more of that—be a good boy, and to the work like a tiger."

I did set to work, Darsie; for who could resist such motives? With my father's assistance, I have entered the details, confused as they are; and on Tuesday, I shall plead as well for Peter Peebles, as I could for a duke. Indeed, I feel my head so clear on the subject, as to be able to write this long letter to you; into which, however, Peter and his lawsuit have insinuated themselves so far, as to show you how much they at present occupy my thoughts. Once more, be careful of yourself, and mindful of me, who am ever thine, while

From circumstances, to be hereafter mentioned, it was long ere this letter reached the person to whom it was addressed.

CHAPTER I.

NARRATIVE.

THE advantage of laying before the reader, in the words of the actors themselves, the adventures which we must otherwise have narrated in our own language given great popularity to the publication of epistolary correspondence, as practised by various great authors, and by ourselves in the preceding chapters. Nevertheless, a genuine correspondence of this kind (and Heaven forbid it should be in any respect sophisticated by interpolations of our own) can seldom be found to contain all in which it is necessary to instruct the reader for his full comprehension of the story. Also it must often happen that various prolixities and redundancies occur in the course of an interchange of letters, which must hang as a dead weight on the progress of the narrative. To avoid this dilemma, some biographers have used the letters of the personages concerned, or liberal extracts from them, to describe particular incidents, or express the sentiments which they entertained; while they connect them occasionally with such portions of narrative, as may serve to carry on the thread of the story.

It is thus that the adventurous travellers, who explore the summit of Mont Blanc, now move on through the crumbling snow-drift so slowly, that their progress is almost imperceptible, and anon abridge their journey by springing over the intervening chasms which cross their path, with the assistance of their pilgrim-staves. Or, to make a brierlier simile, the course of story-telling which we have for the present adopted, resembles the original discipline of the dragoons, who were trained to serve either on foot or horseback, as the emergencies of the service required. With this explanation, we shall proceed to narrate some circumstances which Alan Fairford did not, and could not, write to his correspondent.

Our reader, we trust, has formed somewhat approaching to a distinct idea of the principal characters who have appeared before him during our narrative; but in case our good opinion of his sagacity has been exaggerated, and in order to satisfy such as are addicted to the laudable practice of skipping, (with whom we have at times a strong fellow-feeling,) the following particulars may not be superfluous.

Mr. Saunders Fairford, as he was usually called, was a man of business of the old school, moderate in his charges, economical and even niggardly in his expenditure, strictly honest in conducting his own affairs, and those of his clients, but taught by long experience to be wary and suspicious in observing the motions of others. Punctual as the clock of Saint Giles tolled nine, the neat dapper form of the little hale old gentleman was seen at the threshold of the Court hall, or at farthest, at the head of the Back Stairs, trimly dressed in a complete suit of snuff-coloured brown, with stockings of silk or woollen, as suited the weather; a bobwig, and a small cocked hat; shoes blacked as Warren would have blacked them; silver shoe-buckles, and a gold stock-buckle. A nose-gay in summer, and a sprig of holly in winter, completed his well-known dress and appearance. His manners corresponded with his attire, for they were scrupulously civil, and not a little formal. He was an elder of the kirk, and, of course, zealous for King George and the government even to slaying, as he had showed by taking up arms in their cause. But then, as he had clients and connexions of business among families of opposite political tenets, he was particularly cautious to use all the conventional phrases which the civility of the time had devised, as an admissible mode of language betwixt the two parties. Thus he spoke sometimes of the Chevalier, but never either of the Prince, which would have been sacrificing his own principles, or of the Pretender, which would have been offensive to those of others. Again, he usually designated the Rebellion as the affair of 1745, and spoke of any one engaged in it as a person who had been out at a certain period.* So that, on the whole, Mr. Fairford was a man much liked and respected on all sides, though his friends would not have been sorry if he had given a dinner more frequently, as his little cellar contained some choice old wine, of which, on such rare occasions, he was no niggard.

The whole pleasure of this good old-fashioned man of method, besides that which he really felt in the discharge of his daily business, was the hope to see his son Alan, the only fruit of a union which death early dissolved, attain what in the father's eyes was the proudest of all distinctions—the rank and fame of a well-employed lawyer.

Every profession has its peculiar honours, and Mr. Fairford's mind was constructed upon so limited and exclusive a plan, that he valued nothing, save the objects of ambition which his own presented. He would have shuddered at Alan's acquiring the renown of a hero, and laughed with scorn at the equally barren laurels of literature; it was by the path of the law alone that he was desirous to see him rise to eminence, and the probabilities of success or disappointment were the thoughts of his father by day, and his dream by night.

The disposition of Alan Fairford, as well as his talents, were such as to encourage his father's expectations. He had acuteness of intellect, joined to habits of long and patient study, improved no doubt by the discipline of his father's house; to which, generally speaking, he conformed with the utmost docility, expressing no wish for greater or more frequent relaxation than consisted with his father's anxious and severe restrictions. When he did indulge in any juvenile frolics, his father had the candour to lay the whole blame upon his more mercurial companion, Darsie Latimer.

This youth, as the reader must be aware, had been received as an inmate into the family of Mr. Fairford, senior, at a time when some of the delicacy of constitution which had abridged the life of his consort, began to show itself in the son, and when the father was, of course, peculiarly disposed to indulge his slightest wish. That the young Englishman was able to pay a considerable board, was a matter of no importance to Mr. Fairford; it was enough that his presence seemed to make his son cheerful and happy. He was compelled to allow that "Darsie was a fine lad, though unsettled," and he would have had some difficulty in getting rid of him, and the apprehensions which his levities excited, had it not been for the voluntary excursion which gave rise to the preceding correspondence, and in which Mr. Fairford secretly rejoiced, as affording the means of separating Alan from his gay companion, at least until he should have assumed, and become accustomed to, the duties of his dry and laborious profession.

But the absence of Darsie was far from promoting the end which the elder Mr. Fairford had expected and desired. The young men were united by the closest bonds of intimacy; and the more so, that neither of them sought nor desired to admit any others into their society. Alan Fairford was averse to general company, from a disposition naturally reserved, and Darsie Latimer from a painful sense of his own unknown origin, peculiarly afflicting in a country where high and low are professed genealogists. The young men were all in all to each other; it is no wonder, therefore, that their separation was painful, and that its effects upon Alan Fairford, joined to the anxiety occasioned by the tenor of his friend's letters, greatly exceeded what the senior had anticipated. The young man went through his usual duties, his studies, and the examinations to which he was subjected, but with nothing like the zeal and assiduity which he had formerly displayed; and his anxious and observant father saw but too plainly that his heart was with his absent comrade.

A philosopher would have given way to this tide of feeling, in hopes to have diminished its excess, and permitted the youths to have been some time together, that their intimacy might have been broken off by degrees; but Mr. Fairford only saw the more direct mode of continued restraint, which, however, he was desirous of veiling under some plausible pretext. In the anxiety which he felt on this occasion, he had held communication with an old acquaintance, Peter Drudgitt, with whom the reader is partly acquainted.

* OLD FASHIONED SCOTCH CIVILITY. — Such were literally the points of politeness observed in general society during the author's youth, where it was by no means unusual in a company assembled by chance to find individuals who had borne arms on one side or other in the civil broils of 1745. Nothing, according to my recollection, could be more gentle and decorous than the respect these old enemies paid to each other's prejudices. But in this I speak generally. I have witnessed one or two explosions.

"Alan," he said, "was once wild, and eye was; and he was expecting every moment when he would start off in a wild-goose chase after the elusive Lawyer, Will Sampson, the horse-hunter and Candlermaker. Now had given him a hint that Alan had been looking for a good back, to go to the country for a few days. And then to surprise him downright, he could not but think on the way his past master was removed. Would to Heaven he was forced to some tight place of business, no matter whether well or ill paid, but some job that would harness him at least until the Court rose. If it were but for do 'em a snake."

Poor Dragnet sympathized for Peter had a man, who, even if none would make exchange the torn and only left an sleeve for the blue jacket and white lapels and he suggested as the water knows, the gang as out front & as on the matter of Poor Peter Perkins just opened by the detection of young Thompson whose detection would be at the same time arrested, and this Dragnet said, " would be filling two dogs with one stone.

With these explanations the reader will hold a man of the old-fashioned order and character far from the border-line and imminent catastrophe with which boys fling a puppy into a deep pond in order to say if the creature can swim. However confident in his own talents which were really considerable, he would have been very sorry to have involved him in the duty of performing a complicated and difficult campaign on his very first appearance at the bar had he not resorted to it as an effective way to prevent the young man from taking a step which his habits of thinking represented as a most fatal one of his interest of life.

Here at two o'clock, Mr. Fairford chose that which was in his own approach—the hour, and, like a brave soldier marching forth his own to battle, rather chose he should die upon the bench, than desert the conflict with dishonour. Neither did he leave him to his own unassisted energies. Like Alpheus preceding Hercules, he himself encountered the Augean mass of Peter Poshin's law matters. It was to the old man a labour of love to pluck in a clear and understood view the real merits of this case which the particularities and blunders of Peter's former solicitors had converted into a huge chaotic mass of unmanageable technicalities, and such was his skill and industry, that he was able after the exertion of two or three days, to present to the consideration of the young counsel the principal facts of the case in a light equally simple and comprehensible. With the assistance of a solicitor so efficient and indefatigable, Alon Fairford was enabled when the day of trial arrived to walk towards the Court attended by his anxious yet encouraging parent, with some degree of confidence, that he would lose no reputation upon this arduous occasion.

They were met at the door of the Court by Poor Peter Peabody, in his usual plaiden of wig and robe of law. He bowed on the young pleader like a lion on his prey. How is it with you, Mr. Alan? how is it with you, man?—The awful day is come at last—a day that will be long to elude in this happy Poor Peter Peabody against Plaintiffs' counsel pronounced. Hearing in presence stands for the Short Roll for this day. I have not been able to sleep for a week for thinking of it, and I dare to my brother here the Lord President himself!—for such a cause! But your father gave it me, and a wee drop every muckle of his just bottle the other night, it is no right to me, hardly w' business. Mr. Fairford, I would have been the wiser o' liquor if I would have drunk as muckle as you two would have had me. But there's a time for a' things, and if ye will dine with me after the case is heard, or, which is the same, or maybe better, I'll gang my way home wi' you and I wane object to a cheerfu' glass, within the bounds of moderation."

Old Fairfield shrugged his shoulders and hurried past the client, saw his son wept in the noble beam-burner, which, in his eyes, was more venerable than an archbishop's throne, and could not help fondly patting his shoulder, and whispering to him to take courage, and show he was worthy to wear it. The party entered the Outer Hall of the Court, once the place of meeting of the ancient Scottish Parliament, and which corresponds to the use of Westminster Hall in England, serving as a substitute to the Inner-House, as it is termed, and a place of domain to certain hereditary prerogatives called Lords Ordinary.

The earlier part of the morning was spent by old Farquhar in reiterating his instructions to A. J., and in running from one person to another from whom he thought he could still glean some grains of information, either concerning the point of issue or relative cause. At last time passed Peter Pochter, whose shallow brain was altogether unable to bear the importance of the moment, kept as close to his young counsel as shadow to substance, effected now a spread tail, now a whisper in his ear, now took his ghastly countenance with a wreathed smile, and in closed it with a shade of deep and not unappealing, and upon its contact it with the wave of calm and devotion. These moods of the client's mind very tremor as it with wags its moustache and enormous fangs are now, which the man of rage and indignation deemed appropriate to his change of circumstance. Now he brandished his arm aloft, now that he lay straight out as if to knock his opponent down. Now he laid his open palm on his brow, and as flinging it forward, he gallantly snarled his fangs at the air.

These demonstrations, and the obvious theatrical contrivances of Alan Fairford, did not escape the observation of the outside all-rounders in the hall. They did not inhibit, however, Peter with their usual grace having from some feeling of deference towards Fairford, though many accused him of contrivance in attempting to outdo at this early stage of his practice some of considerable difficulty. But Anne, scrubbing the butter-cream, was not the least aware that in and her composition were the subjects of just a passing jest, and many a shout of laughter was uttered that resonated all around themselves.

At birth the young animal's posterior gave way and as it threatened to carry it a premature end and recede back along with it, Alan frankly told his father that unless he was relieved from the burden of his client's personal presence and manner and it must necessarily throw up his brief, and decline joining the race.

"Hush, hush, my dear Allen," said the old gentleman, almost at his own will and upon hearing the dilemma, "I don't mind the silly or the wrong; I cannot keep the men from hearing his own words though he be not quite right in the head."

"On my life, sir," answered Alan, "I shall be able to go on, he drives every thing out of my remembrance, and if I attempt to speak seriously of the injuries he has sustained, and the confusion he is reduced to, how can I expect but that the very appearance of such an absurd occasion will cause all into ridicule?"

"There is something in that," said Saunders furiously, glancing a look at Poor Peter, and then carelessly snatching his forefinger under his hat-ey, as if to rub his temple and end his invention. "Is no harm for the fore-hat to see without laughing; but it is to get rid of him." To speak more, or all things like it, is the last thing he will listen to.—Say, or—then, my darling, her presence; I'll get him off the ground like a gowd-bag."

"So saying, he hastened to his ally Peter Deakin, who, standing back with marks of haste in his gait and upon his countenance, clapped his gun to his ear and said: 'What's the stir now, Mr. Sam? Is there anything wrong?'

"Here's a dollar, man," said Mr. Saunders, "get or never. Peter, do me a good turn. You're my warmest friend. Peter Prebiss, will drive the point out of my hands at you, & get him over to John's Coffee-house, man—give him his medicine—keep him there, drink or eat, till the hearing is over."

* The words is obvious, from the old manuscript of the text, where the publisher's mark, as the page wrought in the other was called, where laid down in length by the words was completely changed to the length of the page, which was suggested about a Scottish long-tail.

"Enough said," quoth Peter Drudgeit, no way displeased with his own share in the service required,—
"We'll do your bidding."

"Accordingly, the scribe was presently seen whispering in the ear of Peter Peebles, whose responses came forth in the following broken form:—

"Leave the Court for a minute on this great day of judgment?—not I, by the Reg—Eh! what? Brandy, did ye say—French Brandy?—couldna ye fetch a stoup to the bar under your coat, man?—Impossible? Na, if it's clean impossible, and if we have an hour good till they get through the single bills and the summar-roll, I carena if I cross the close wi' you; I am sure I need something to keep my heart up this awful day; but I'll no stay above an instant—not above a minute of time—nor drink aboon a single gill."

In a few minutes afterwards, the two Peters were seen moving through the Parliament Close, (which newfangled affectation has termed a Square,) the triumphant Drudgeit leading captive the passive Peebles, whose legs conducted him towards the drain-shop, while his reverted eyes were fixed upon the Court. They dived into the Cimmerian abysses of John's Coffee-house,* formerly the favourite rendezvous of the classical and genial Doctor Pitcairn, and were for the present seen no more.

Relieved from his tormentor, Alan Fairford had time to rally his recollections, which, in the irritation of his spirits, had nearly escaped him, and to prepare himself for a task, the successful discharge or failure in which must, he was aware, have the deepest influence upon his fortunes. He had pride, was not without a consciousness of talent, and the sense of his father's feelings upon the subject impelled him to the utmost exertion. Above all, he had that sort of self-command which is essential to success in every arduous undertaking, and he was constitutionally free from that feverish irritability, by which those whose over-active imaginations exaggerate difficulties, render themselves incapable of encountering such when they arrive.

Having collected all the scattered and broken associations which were necessary, Alan's thoughts reverted to Dumfries-shire, and the precarious situation in which he feared his beloved friend had placed himself; and once and again he consulted his watch, eager to have his present task commenced and ended, that he might hasten to Darsie's assistance. The hour and moment at length arrived. The Macer shouted, with all his well-remembered brazen strength of lungs, "Poor Peter Peebles versus Plainstances, per Dumtoustie et Tough:—Maister Da-an-iel Dumtoustie!" Dumtoustie answered not the summons, which, deep and swelling as it was, could not reach across the Queensferry; but our Maister Alan Fairford appeared in his place.

The Court was very much crowded; for much amusement had been received on former occasions when Peter had volunteered his own oratory, and had been completely successful in routing the gravity of the whole procedure, and putting to silence, not indeed the counsel of the opposite party, but his own.

Both bench and audience seemed considerably surprised at the juvenile appearance of the young man who appeared in the room of Dumtoustie, for the purpose of opening this complicated and long depending process, and the common herd were disappointed at the absence of Peter the client, the Punchinello of the expected entertainment. The Judges looked with a very favourable countenance on our friend Alan, most of them being acquainted, more or less, with so old a practitioner as his father, and all, or almost all, affording, from civility, the same fair play to the first pleading of a counsel, which the House of Commons yields to the maiden speech of one of its members.

Lord Bladderskate was an exception to this general expression of benevolence. He scowled upon Alan from beneath his large, shaggy, gray eye-brows, just as if the young lawyer had been usurping his nephew's honours, instead of covering his disgrace; and, from feelings which did his lordship little honour, he privately hoped the young man would not succeed in the cause which his kinsman had abandoned.

Even Lord Bladderskate, however, was, in spite of himself, pleased with the judicious and modest tone in which Alan began his address to the Court, apologizing for his own presumption, and excusing it by the sudden illness of his learned brother, for whom the labour of opening a cause of some difficulty and importance had been much more worthily designed. He spoke of himself as he really was, and of young Dumtoustie as what he ought to have been, taking care not to dwell on either topic a moment longer than was necessary. The old Judge's looks became benign; his family pride was propitiated, and, pleased equally with the modesty and civility of the young man whom he had thought forward and officious, he relaxed the scorn of his features into an expression of profound attention; the highest compliment, and the greatest encouragement, which a judge can render to the counsel addressing him.

Having succeeded in securing the favourable attention of the court, the young lawyer, using the lights which his father's experience and knowledge of business had afforded him, proceeded with an address and clearness, unexpected from one of his years, to remove from the case itself those complicated formalities with which it had been loaded, as a surgeon strips from a wound the dressings which have been hastily wrapped round it, in order to proceed to his cure secundum artem. Developed of the cumbrous and complicated technicalities of litigation, with which the perverse obstinacy of the client, the inconsiderate haste or ignorance of his agents, and the evasions of a subtle adversary had invested the process, the cause of Poor Peter Peebles, standing upon its simple merits, was no bad subject for the declamation of a young counsel, nor did our friend Alan fail to avail himself of its strong points.

He exhibited his client as a simple-hearted, honest, well-meaning man, who, during a copartnership of twelve years, had gradually become impoverished, while his partner, (his former clerk,) having no funds but his share of the same business, into which he had been admitted without any advance of stock, had become gradually more and more wealthy.

"Their association," said Alan, and the little flight was received with some applause, "resembled the ancient story of the fruit which was carved with a knife poisoned on one side of the blade only, so that the individual to whom the envenomed portion was served, drew decay and death from what afforded savour and sustenance to the consumer of the other moiety." He then plunged boldly into the mare magnum of accounts between the parties; he pursued each false statement from the waste-book to the day-book, from the day-book to the bill-book, from the bill-book to the ledger; placed the artful interpolations and insertions of the fallacious Plainstances in array against each other, and against the fact; and, availing himself to the utmost of his father's previous labours, and his own knowledge of accounts, in which he had been sedulously trained, he laid before the Court a clear and intelligible statement of the affairs of the copartnership, showing with precision, that a large balance must, at the dissolution, have been due to his client, sufficient to have enabled him to have carried on business on his own account, and thus to have retained his situation in society, as an independent and industrious tradesman. "But, instead of this justice being voluntarily rendered by the former clerk to his former master,—by the party obliged to his benefactor,—by one honest man to another,—his wretched client had been compelled to follow his quondam clerk, his present debtor, from Court to Court; had found his just claims met with well-invented but unfounded counter-claims; had seen his party shift his character of pursuer or defender, as often as Harlequin effects his transformations, till, in a chase so varied and so long, the unhappy litigant had lost substance, reputation, and almost the use of reason itself, and came before their Lordships an object of thoughtless derision to the unreflecting, of compassion to the better-hearted, and of awful meditation to every one, who considered that, in a country where excellent laws were administered by upright and incorruptible judges, a man might pursue an almost indisputable claim through all the mazes of litigation; lose fortune, reputation, and reason itself in the chase, and at length come before the Supreme Court of his country in the wretched condition of his unhappy client, a victim to protracted justice, and to that hope delayed which sickens the heart.

* This small dark coffee-house, now burnt down, was the resort of such writers and clerks belonging to the Parliament House above thirty years ago, as retained the ancient Scottish custom of a meridian, as it was called, or noontide dram of spirits. If their proceedings were watched, they might be seen turn sidgely about the hour of noon, and exchange looks with each other from their separate desks, till at length some one of formal and dignified presence assumed the honour of leading the band, when away they went, threading the crowd like a troop of wild-fowl, crossed the square or close, and following each other into the coffee-house, received in turn from the hand of the waiter, the meridian, which was placed ready at the bar. As they did, day by day: and though they did not speak to each other, they seemed to attach a certain degree of sociability to performing the ceremony in company.

The force of this appeal to feeling made as much impression on the Bench, as had been previously effected by the clearness of Alan's argument. The absurd form of Peter himself, with his tow-wig, was fortunately not present to excite any ludicrous emotion, and the pause that took place when the young lawyer had concluded his speech, was followed by a murmur of approbation, which the ears of his father drank in as the sweetest sounds that had ever entered them. Many a hand of gratulation was thrust out to his grasp, trembling as it was with anxiety, and finally with delight; his voice faltering, as he replied, "Ay, ay, I kend Alan was the lad to make a spoon or spoil a horn."*

The counsel on the other side arose, an old practitioner, who had noted too closely the impression made by Alan's pleading, not to fear the consequences of an immediate decision. He paid the highest compliments to his very young brother—"the Benjamin, as he would presume to call him, of the learned Faculty"—said the alleged hardships of Mr. Peebles were compensated, by his being placed in a situation where the benevolence of their Lordships had assigned him gratuitously such assistance as he might not otherwise have obtained at a high price—and allowed his young brother had put many things in such a new point of view, that, although he was quite certain of his ability to refute them, he was honestly desirous of having a few hours to arrange his answer, in order to be able to follow Mr. Fairford from point to point. He had further to observe, there was one point of the case to which his brother, whose attention had been otherwise so wonderfully comprehensive, had not given the consideration which he expected; it was founded on the interpretation of certain correspondence which had passed betwixt the parties, soon after the dissolution of the copartnership.

The Court having heard Mr. Tough, readily allowed him two days for preparing himself, hinting, at the same time, that he might find his task difficult, and affording the young counsel, with high encomiums upon the mode in which he had acquitted himself, the choice of speaking, either now or at next calling of the the cause, upon the point which Plainstane's lawyer had adverted to.

Alan modestly apologized for what in fact had been an omission very pardonable in so complicated a case, and professed himself instantly ready to go through that correspondence, and prove that it was in form and substance exactly applicable to the view of the case he had submitted to their lordships. He applied to his father, who sat behind him, to hand him, from time to time, the letters, in the order in which he meant to read and comment upon them.

Old Counsellor Tough had probably formed an ingenious enough scheme to blunt the effect of the young lawyer's reasoning, by thus obliging him to follow up a process of reasoning, clear and complete in itself, by a hasty and extemporary appendix. If so, he seemed likely to be disappointed; for Alan was well prepared on this, as on other parts of the cause, and recommenced his pleading with a degree of animation and spirit, which added force even to what he had formerly stated, and might perhaps have occasioned the old gentleman to regret his having again called him up; when his father, as he handed him the letters, put one into his hand which produced a singular effect on the pleader.

At the first glance, he saw that the paper had no reference to the affairs of Peter Peebles; but the first glance also showed him, what, even at that time, and in that presence, he could not help reading; and which, being read, seemed totally to disconcert his ideas. He stopped short in his harangue—gazed on the paper with a look of surprise and horror—uttered an exclamation, and, flinging down the brief which he had in his hand, hurried out of Court without returning a single word of answer to the various questions, "what was the matter?"—"Was he taken awell?"—"Should not a chair be called?" &c. &c. &c.

The elder Mr. Fairford, who remained seated, and looking as senseless as if he had been made of stone, was at length recalled to himself by the anxious inquiries of the judges and the counsel after his son's health. He then rose with an air, in which was mingled the deep habitual reverence in which he held the Court, with some internal cause of agitation, and with difficulty mentioned something of a mistake—a piece of bad news—Alan, he hoped, would be well enough to-morrow. But unable to proceed farther, he clasped his hands together, exclaiming, "My son! my son!" and left the court hastily, as if in pursuit of him.

"What's the matter with the auld bitch next?" said an acute metaphysical judge, though somewhat coarse in his manners, aside to his brethren. "This is a daft cause, Bladderskate—first, it drives the poor man mad that aught it—then your nevy goes daft with fright, and flies the pit—then this smart young hopeful is aff the hooks with too hard study, I fancy—and now auld Saunders Fairford is as lunatick as the best of them. What say ye till't, ye bitch?"

"Nothing, my lord," answered Bladderskate, much too formal to admire the levities in which his philosophical brother sometimes indulged—"I say nothing but pray to Heaven to keep our own wits."

"Amen, amen," answered his learned brother, "for some of us have but few to spare."

The Court then arose, and the audience departed, greatly wondering at the talent displayed by Alan Fairford, at his first appearance, in a case so difficult and so complicated, and assigning a hundred conjectural causes, each different from the others for the singular interruption which had clouded his day of success. The worst of the whole was, that six agents, who had each come to the separate resolution of thrusting a retaining fee into Alan's hand as he left the court, shook their heads as they returned the money into their leathern pouches, and said, "that the lad was clever, but they would like to see more of him before they engaged him in the way of business—they did not like his lowping away like a flea in a blanket."

CHAPTER II.

HAD our friend Alexander Fairford known the consequences of his son's abrupt retreat from the Court which was mentioned in the end of the last chapter, it might have accomplished the prediction of the lively old judge, and driven him utterly distracted. As it was, he was miserable enough. His son had risen ten degrees higher in his estimation than ever, by his display of juridical talents, which seemed to assure him that the applause of the judges and professors of the law, which, in his estimation, was worth that of all mankind besides, authorized to the fullest extent the advantageous estimate which even his parental partiality had been induced to form of Alan's powers. On the other hand, he felt that he was himself a little humbled, from a disguise which he had practised towards this son of his hopes and wishes.

The truth was, that on the morning of this eventful day, Mr. Alexander Fairford had received from his correspondent and friend, Provost Crosbie of Dumfries, a letter of the following tenor:—

* Tradition ascribes this whimsical style of language to the ingenious and philosophical Lord Kames.

"DEAR SIR,

"YOUR respected favour of 25th ultimo, per favour of Mr. Darsie Latimer, reached me in safety, and I showed to the young gentleman such attentions as he was pleased to accept of. The object of my present writing is twofold. First, the council are of opinion that you should now begin to stir in the thirlage cause; and they think they will be able, from evidence noviter repertum, to enable you to amend your condescendence upon the use and wont of the burgh, touching the grana inveccla et illata. So you will please consider yourself as authorized to speak to Mr. Pest, and lay before him the papers which you will receive by the coach. The council think that a fee of two guineas may be sufficient on this occasion, as Mr. Pest had three for drawing the original condescendence.

"I take the opportunity of adding, that there has been a great riot among the Solway fishermen, who have destroyed, in a masterful manner, the stake-nets set up near the mouth of this river; and have besides attacked the house of Quaker Geddes, one of the principal partners of the Tide-net Fishing Company, and done a great deal of damage. Am sorry to add, young Master Latimer was in the fray, and has not since been heard of. Murder is spoke of, but that may be a word of course. As the young gentleman has behaved rather oddly while in these parts, as in declining to dine with me more than once, and going about the country with strolling fiddlers and such-like, I rather hope that his present absence is only occasioned by a frolic; but as his servant has been making inquiries of me respecting his master, I thought it best to acquaint you in course of post. I have only to add, that our sheriff has taken a precognition, and committed one or two of the rioters. If I can be useful in this matter, either by advertising for Mr. Latimer as missing, publishing a reward, or otherwise, I will obey your respected instructions, being your most obedient to command.

"WILLIAM CROSBIE."

When Mr. Fairford received this letter, and had read it to an end, his first idea was to communicate it to his son, that an express might be instantly despatched, or a King's messenger sent with proper authority to search after his late guest.

The habits of the fishers were rude, as he well knew, though not absolutely sanguinary or ferocious; and there had been instances of their transporting persons who had interfered in their smuggling trade to the Isle of Man, and elsewhere, and keeping them under restraint for many weeks. On this account Mr. Fairford was naturally led to feel anxiety concerning the fate of his late inmate; and, at a less interesting moment, would certainly have set out himself, or licensed his son to go in pursuit of his friend.

But alas! he was both a father and an agent. In the one capacity, he looked on his son as dearer to him than all the world besides; in the other, the lawsuit which he conducted was to him like an infant to its nurse, and the case of Poor Peter Peebles against Plainstances was, he saw, adjourned, perhaps sine die, should this document reach the hands of his son. The mutual and enthusiastical affection betwixt the young men was well known to him; and he concluded, that if the precarious state of Latimer were made known to Alan Fairford, it would render him not only unwilling, but totally unfit, to discharge the duty of the day, to which the old gentleman attached such ideas of importance.

On mature reflection, therefore, he resolved, though not without some feelings of compunction, to delay communicating to his son the disagreeable intelligence which he had received, until the business of the day should be ended. The delay, he persuaded himself, could be of little consequence to Darsie Latimer, whose folly, he dared to say, had led him into some scrape which would meet an appropriate punishment, in some accidental restraint, which would be thus prolonged for only a few hours longer. Besides, he would have time to speak to the Sheriff of the county—perhaps to the King's Advocate—and set about the matter in a regular manner, or, as he termed it, as

The scheme, as we have seen, was partially successful, and was only ultimately defeated, as he confessed to himself with shame, by his own very unbusiness-like mistake of shuffling the Provost's letter, in the hurry and anxiety of the morning, among some papers belonging to Peter Peebles's affairs, and then handing it to his son, without observing the blunder. He used to protest, even till the day of his death, that he never had been guilty of such an inaccuracy as giving a paper out of his hand without looking at the docketing, except on that unhappy occasion, when, of all others, he had such particular reason to regret his negligence.

Disturbed by these reflections, the old gentleman had, for the first time in his life, some disinclination, arising from shame and vexation, to face his own son; so that to protract for a little the meeting which he feared would be a painful one, he went to wait upon the Sheriff-depute, who he found had set off for Dumfries, in great haste, to superintend in person the investigation which had been set on foot by his Substitute. This gentleman's clerk could say little on the subject of the riot, excepting that it had been serious, much damage done to property, and some personal violence offered to individuals; but as far as he had yet heard, no lives lost on the spot.

Mr. Fairford was compelled to return home with this intelligence; and on inquiring at James Wilkinson where his son was, received for answer, that "Maister Alan was in his own room, and very busy."

"We must have our explanation over," said Saunders Fairford to himself. "Better a finger off as aye wagging;" and going to the door of his son's apartment he knocked at first gently—then more loudly—but received no answer. Somewhat alarmed at this silence, he opened the door of the chamber—it was empty—clothes lay mixed in confusion with the law-books and papers, as if the inmate had been engaged in hastily packing for a journey. As Mr. Fairford looked around in alarm, his eye was arrested by a sealed letter lying upon his son's writing-table, and addressed to himself. It contained the following words:—

"MY DEAREST FATHER,

"You will not, I trust, be surprised, nor perhaps very much displeased, to learn that I am now on my way to Dumfries-shire, to learn, by my own personal investigation, the present state of my dear friend, and afford him such relief as may be in my power, and which, I trust, will be effectual. I do not presume to reflect upon you, dearest sir, for concealing from me information of so much consequence to my peace of mind and happiness; but I hope your having done so will be, if not an excuse, at least some mitigation of my present offence, in taking a step of consequence without consulting your pleasure; and, I must further own, under circumstances which perhaps might lead to your disapprobation of my purpose. I can only say, in further apology, that if any thing unhappy, which Heaven forbid! shall have occurred to the person who, next to yourself, is dearest to me in this world, I shall have on my heart, as a subject of eternal regret, that being in a certain degree warned of his danger, and furnished with the means of obviating it, I did not instantly hasten to his assistance, but preferred giving my attention to the business of this unlucky morning. No view of personal distinction, nothing, indeed, short of your earnest and often expressed wishes, could have detained me in town till this day; and having made this sacrifice to filial duty, I trust you will hold me excused, if I now obey the calls of friendship and humanity. Do not be in the least anxious on my account; I shall know, I trust, how to conduct myself with due caution in any emergence which may occur, otherwise my legal studies for so many years have been to little purpose. I am fully provided with money, and also with arms in case of need; but you may rely on my prudence in avoiding all occasions of using the latter, short of the last necessity. God Almighty bless you, my dearest father! and grant that you may forgive the first, and, I trust, the last act approaching towards premeditated disobedience, of which I either have now, or shall hereafter have, to accuse myself. I remain, till death, your dutiful and affectionate son,

* A Scots law phrase of no very determinate import, meaning, generally, to do what is fitting.

"ALAN FAIRFORD."

"P. S.—I shall write with the utmost regularity, acquainting you with my motions, and requesting your advice. I trust my stay will be very short, and I think it possible that I may bring back Darsie along with me."

The paper dropped from the old man's hand when he was thus assured of the misfortune which he apprehended. His first idea was to get a post-chaise and pursue the fugitive; but he recollected, that, upon the very rare occasions when Alan had shown himself indocile to the patria potestas, his natural ease and gentleness of disposition seemed hardened into obstinacy, and that now, entitled, as arrived at the years of majority, and a member of the learned Faculty, to direct his own motions, there was great doubt, whether, in the event of his overtaking his son, he might be able to prevail upon him to return back. In such a risk of failure, he thought it wiser to desist from his purpose, especially as even his success in such a pursuit would give a ridiculous éclat to the whole affair, which could not be otherwise than prejudicial to his son's rising character.

Bitter, however, were Saunders Fairford's reflections, as, again picking up the fatal scroll, he threw himself into his son's leathern easy-chair, and bestowed upon it a disjointed commentary. "Bring back Darsie? little doubt of that—the bad shilling is sure enough to come back again. I wish Darsie no worse ill than that he were carried where the silly fool Alan should never see him again. It was an ill hour that he darkened my doors in, for, ever since that, Alan has given up his ane old-fashioned mother-wit, for the t'other's capernointed maggots and nonsense. Provided with money? you must have more than I know of, then, my friend, for I trow I kept you pretty short for your own good.—Can he have gotten more fees? or, does he think five guineas has neither beginning nor end?—Arms! What would he do with arms, or what would any man do with them that is not a regular soldier under government, or else a thief-taker? I have had enough of arms, I trow, although I carried them for King George and the government. But this is a worse strait than Falkirk-field yet!—God guide us, we are poor inconsistent creatures! To think the lad should have made so able an appearance, and then bolted off this gate, after a glaiket ne'er-do-well, like a hound upon a false scent!—Las-a-day! it's a sore thing to see a stunkard cow kick down the pail when it's reaming fou.—But, after all, it's an ill bird that defiles its ain nest. I must cover up the scandal as well as I can.—What's the matter now, James?"

"A message, sir," said James Wilkinson, "from my Lord President; and he hopes Mr. Alan is not seriously indisposed."

"From the Lord President? the Lord preserve us!—I'll send an answer this instant; bid the lad sit down, and ask him to drink, James.—Let me see," continued he, taking a sheet of gilt paper, "how we are to draw our answers."

Ere his pen had touched the paper, James was in the room again.

"What now James?"

"Lord Bladderskate's lad is come to ask how Mr. Alan is, as he left the Court"—

"Ay, ay, ay," answered Saunders, bitterly; "he has e'en made a moonlight flitting, like my lord's ane neyoy."

"Shall I say sae, sir?" said James, who, as an old soldier, was literal in all things touching the service.

"The devil! no, no!—Bid the lad sit down and taste our ale. I will write his lordship an answer."

Once more the gilt paper was resumed, and once more the door was opened by James.

"Lord —— sends his servitor to ask after Mr. Alan."

"Oh, the deevil take their civility!" said poor Saunders. "Set him down to drink too—I will write to his Lordship."

"The lads will bide your pleasure, sir, as lang as I keep the bicker fou; but this ringing is like to wear out the bell, I think; there are they at it again."

He answered the fresh summons accordingly, and came back to inform Mr. Fairford, that the Dean of Faculty was below, inquiring for Mr. Alan.—"Will I set him down to drink, too?" said James.

"Will you be an idiot, sir?" said Mr. Fairford, "Show Mr. Dean into the parlour."

In going slowly down stairs, step by step, the perplexed man of business had time enough to reflect, that if it be possible to put a fair gloss upon a true story, the verity always serves the purpose better than any substitute which ingenuity can devise. He therefore told his learned visiter, that although his son had been incommoded by the heat of the court, and the long train of hard study, by day and night, preceding his exertions, yet he had fortunately so far recovered, as to be in condition to obey upon the instant a sudden summons which had called him to the country, on a matter of life and death.

"It should be a serious matter indeed that takes my young friend away at this moment," said the good-natured Dean. "I wish he had staid to finish his pleading, and put down old Tough. Without compliment, Mr. Fairford, it was as fine a first appearance as I ever heard. I should be sorry your son did not follow it up in a reply. Nothing like striking while the iron is hot."

Mr. Saunders Fairford made a better grimace as he acquiesced in an opinion which was indeed decidedly his own; but he thought it most prudent to reply, "that the affair which rendered his son Alan's presence in the country absolutely necessary, regarded the affairs of a young gentleman of great fortune, who was a particular friend of Alan's, and who never took any material step in his affairs, without consulting his counsel learned in the law."

"Well well, Mr. Fairford, you know best," answered the learned Dean; "If there be death or marriage in the case, a will or a wedding is to be preferred to all other business. I am happy Mr. Alan is so much recovered as to be able for travel, and wish you a very good morning."

Having thus taken his ground to the Dean of Faculty, Mr. Fairford hastily wrote cards in answer to the inquiry of three judges, accounting for Alan's absence in the same manner. These, being properly sealed and addressed, he delivered to James, with directions to dismiss the party-coloured gentry, who in the mean while, had consumed a gallon of twopenny ale while discussing points of law, and addressing each other by their master's titles.*

The exertion which these matters demanded, and the interest which so many persons of legal distinction appeared to have taken in his son, greatly relieved the oppressed spirit of Saunders Fairford, who continued to talk mysteriously of the very important business which had interfered with his son's attendance during the brief remainder of the session. He endeavoured to lay the same unction to his own heart; but here the application was less fortunate, for his conscience told him, that no end, however important, which could be achieved in Darsie Latimer's affairs could be balanced against the reputation which Alan was like to forfeit, by deserting the cause of Poor Peter Peebles.

In the mean while, although the haze which surrounded the cause, or causes, of that unfortunate litigant had been for a time dispelled by Alan's eloquence, like a fog by the thunder of artillery, yet it seemed once more to settle down upon the mass of litigation, thick as the palpable darkness of Egypt, at the very sound of Mr. Tough's voice, who on the second day after Alan's departure, was heard in answer to the opening counsel. Deep-mouthed, long-breathed, and pertinacious, taking a pinch of snuff betwixt every sentence, which otherwise seemed interminable—the veteran pleader prosed over all the themes which had been treated so luminously by Fairford; he quietly and imperceptibly replaced all the rubbish which the other had cleared away; and succeeded in restoring the veil of obscurity and unintelligibility which had for many years darkened the case of Peebles against Plainstones; and the matter was once more hung up by a remit to an accountant, with instruction to report before answer. So different a result from that which the public had been led to expect from Alan's speech, gave rise to various speculations.

* The Scottish Judges are distinguished by the title of lord prefixed to their own temporal designation. As the ladies of these official dignitaries do not bear any share in their husband's honours, they are distinguished only by their lord's family name. They were not always contented with this species of Salique law, which certainly is somewhat inconsistent. But their pretensions to title are said to have been long since repelled by James V., the Sovereign who founded the College of Justice. "I," said he, "made the earls lords, but who the devil made the carlines ladies?"

The client himself opined that it was entirely owing, first, to his own absence during the first day's pleading, being, as he said, deboshed with brandy, usquebaugh, and other strong waters, at John's Coffee-house, per ambages of Peter Drudgeit, employed to that effect by and through the device, counsel, and covyne of Saunders Fairford, his agent, or pretended agent. Secondly, by the flight and voluntary desertion of the younger Fairford, the advocate; on account of which he served both father and son with a petition and complaint against them, for malversation in office. So that the apparent and most probable issue of this cause seemed to menace the melancholy Mr. Saunders Fairford with additional subject for plague and mortification; which was the more galling, as his conscience told him that the case was really given away, and that a very brief resumption of the former argument, with reference to the necessary authorities and points of evidence, would have enabled Alan, by the mere breath, as it were, of his mouth, to blow away the various cobwebs with which Mr. Tough had again invested the proceedings. But it went, he said, just like a decret in absence, and was lost for want of a contradictor.

In the mean time, nearly a week passed over without Mr. Fairford hearing a word directly from his son. He learned, indeed, by a letter from Mr. Crosbie, that the young counsellor had safely reached Dumfries, but had left that town upon some ulterior researches, the purpose of which he had not communicated. The old man, thus left to suspense, and to mortifying recollections, deprived also of the domestic society to which he had been habituated, began to suffer in body as well as in mind. He had formed the determination of setting out in person for Dumfries-shire, when, after having been dogged, peevish, and snappish to his clerks and domestics, to an unusual and almost intolerable degree, the acrimonious humours settled in a hissing-hot fit of the gout, which is a well-known tamer of the most froward spirits, and under whose discipline we shall, for the present, leave him, as the continuation of this history assumes, with the next division, a form somewhat different from direct narrative and epistolary correspondence, though partaking of the character of both.

CHAPTER III.

JOURNAL OF DARSIE LATIMER.

[The following address is written on the inside of the envelope which contained the Journal.]

INTO what hands soever these leaves may fall, they will instruct him, during a certain time at least, in the history of the life of an unfortunate young man, who, in the heart of a free country, and without any crime being laid to his charge, has been, and is, subjected to a course of unlawful and violent restraint. He who opens this letter, is therefore conjured to apply to the nearest magistrate, and, following such indications as the papers may afford, to exert himself for the relief of one, who, while he possesses every claim to assistance which oppressed innocence can give, has at the same time, both the inclination and the means of being grateful to his deliverers. Or, if the person obtaining these letters shall want courage or means to effect the writer's release, he is, in that case, conjured, by every duty of a man to his fellow-mortals, and of a Christian towards one who professes the same holy faith, to take the earliest measures for conveying them with speed and safety to the hands of Alan Fairford, Esq., Advocate, residing in the family of his father, Alexander Fairford, Esq., Writer to the Signet, Brown's Square, Edinburgh. He may be assured of a liberal reward, besides the consciousness of having discharged a real duty to humanity.

MY DEAREST ALAN,

FEELING as warmly towards you in doubt and in distress, as I ever did in the brightest days of our intimacy, it is to you whom I address a history which may perhaps fall into very different hands. A portion of my former spirit descends to my pen, when I write your name, and indulging the happy thought that you may be my deliverer from my present uncomfortable and alarming situation, as you have been my guide and counsellor on every former occasion, I will subdue the debility which would otherwise overwhelm me. Therefore, as Heaven knows, I have time enough to write, I will endeavour to pour my thoughts out, as fully and freely as of old, though probably without the same gay and happy levity.

If the papers should reach other hands than yours, still I will not regret this exposure of my feelings; for, allowing for an ample share of the folly incidental to youth and inexperience, I fear not that I have much to be ashamed of in my narrative; nay, I even hope, that the open simplicity and frankness with which I am about to relate every singular and distressing circumstance, may prepossess even a stranger in my favour; and that, amid the multitude of seemingly trivial circumstances which I detailed at length, a clew may be found to effect my liberation.

Another chance certainly remains—the Journal, as I may call it, may never reach the hands, either of the dear friend to whom it is addressed, or those of an indifferent stranger, but may become the prey of the persons by whom I am at present treated as a prisoner. Let it be so—they will learn from it little but what they already know; that, as a man, and an Englishman, my soul revolts at the usage which I have received; that I am determined to essay every possible means to obtain my freedom; that captivity has not broken my spirit, and that, although they may doubtless complete their oppression by murder, I am still willing to bequeath my cause to the justice of my country. Undeterred, therefore, by the probability that my papers may be torn from me, and subjected to the inspection of one in particular, who, causelessly my enemy already, may be yet farther incensed at me for recording the history of my wrongs, I proceed to resume the history of events which have befallen me since the conclusion of my last letter to my dear Alan Fairford, dated, if I mistake not, on the 5th day of this still current month of August.

Upon the night preceding the date of that letter, I had been present, for the purpose of an idle frolic, at a dancing party at the village of Brokenburn, about six miles from Dumfries; many persons must have seen me there, should the fact appear of importance sufficient to require investigation. I danced, played on the violin, and took part in the festivity, till about midnight, when my servant, Samuel Owen, brought me my horses, and I rode back to a small inn called Shepherd's Bush, kept by Mrs. Gregson, which had been occasionally my residence for about a fortnight past. I spent the earlier part of the forenoon in writing a letter which I have already mentioned, to you, my dear Alan, and which, I think, you must have received in safety. Why did I not follow your advice, so often given me? Why did I linger in the neighbourhood of a danger, of which a kind voice had warned me? These are now unavailing questions. I was blinded by a fatality, and remained fluttering like a moth around the candle, until I have been scorched to some purpose.

The greater part of the day had passed, and time hung heavy on my hands. I ought, perhaps, to blush of realising what has been often objected to me by the dear friend to whom this letter is addressed, viz. the facility with which I have, in moments of indolence, suffered my motions to be diverted by any person who chanced to be near me instead of taking the labour of thinking or deciding for myself. I had employed for some time as a sort of guide and second boy a lad named Benjamin, the son of one widow Colford, who lives near the Shepherd's Bush, and I cannot but remember that, upon several occasions, I had of late suffered him to possess more influence over my motions than at all became the difference of our age and condition. At present he exerted himself to persuade me that it was the finest possible sport to get the fish taken out from the nets placed in the Gully at the reflux of the tide, and urged my going thither this evening so much, that looking back on the whole circumstance, I cannot but think he had some special motive for his conduct. Three particulars I have mentioned, that if these papers fall into friendly hands, the boy may be sought after and submitted to examination.

His eloquence being unable to persuade me that I should take any pleasure in seeing the fruitless struggle of the fish when left in the nets and devoured by the tide he artfully suggested that Mr. and Mrs. Gaddis, a respectable Quaker family well known in the neighbourhood and with whom I had contracted habits of intimacy, would possibly be offended if I did not make them an early visit. Both he said and I knew particularly inquiring the reasons of my leaving their house rather suddenly on the previous day. I resolved, therefore, to walk up to Mount Sharon and make my apologies, and I agreed to permit the boy to attend upon me, and wait my return from the house, that I might fish on my way homeward to Shepherd's Bush for which amusement he assured me I would find the evening most favourable. I mention this minute circumstance because I strongly suspect that this boy had a preconcerted plan the evening was to terminate with me, and entertained the selfish though childish wish of securing to himself an evening and which he had often admitted, as a part of my spoils. I may do the boy wrong, but I had before remarked in him the peculiar art of pursuing the trifling objects of cupidity proper to his age with the systematic address of much ripe years.

When we had commenced our walk, I explained him with the calmness of the evening, considering the season, the easterly wind, and other circumstances unfavourable for angling. He persisted in his own story and made a few casts, as if to convince me of my error, but caught no fish; and, indeed, as I am now convinced, was much more intent on watching my motions, than on taking any. When I retorted him once more on his fruitless endeavours, he answered with a sneering smile that "the trouts would not rise, because there was thunder in the air," or intimation which in one sense I have found too true.

I arrived at Mount Sharon, was received by my friends there as to their usual kindness, and after being a little rallied on my having suddenly left them on the preceding evening, I agreed to make atonement by staying all night, and dismissed the lad who attended with my fishing rod, to carry that instrument to Shepherd's Bush. It may be doubted whether he went thither, or in a different direction.

Not yet eight and nine o'clock when it began to become dark, we walked on the terrace to enjoy the appearance of the firmament, glittering with ten millions of stars, to which a slight touch of sea breeze gave unobscured lustre. As we gazed on this magnificent scene, Mrs. Gaddis, I think, was the first to point out to our admiration a shooting or falling star, which she said, drove a long train after it. Looking to the part of the heavens which she pointed out, I distinctly observed two successive sky-rockets arise and burst in the sky.

"Those meteors," said Mr. Gaddis, in answer to his sister's observation, "are not formed in heaven, nor do they bode any good to the dwellers upon earth."

As he spoke, I looked to another quarter of the sky, and a rocket, as if a signal in answer to them which had already appeared, came high from the earth, and burst apparently among the stars.

Mr. Gaddis seemed very thoughtful for some moments, and then said to his sister, "Rachel, though a weak lot, I must go down to the fishing station, and pass the night in the overseer's room, to-night."

"Nay, then," replied the lady, "I am but too well assured that the sons of Belial are menacing thee with nets and devices. Joshua, art thou a man of peace, and wilt thou willingly and wittingly thrust thyself where thou mayest be tempted by the old man Adam within thee, to enter into debate and strife?"

"I am a man of peace, Rachel," answered Mr. Gaddis, "even to the utmost extent which our friends can demand of humanity; and further have I not need, nay, with the help of God, will I at any hazard employ the arm of flesh to repel or to revenge injuries. But if I can, by mild remonstrance and firm conduct, save these rude men from committing a crime, and the property belonging to myself and others from sustaining damage, surely I do but the duty of a man and a Christian."

With these words, he ordered his horse instantly, and he came creeling to assist with him, folded his arms upon her bosom, and looked up to heaven with a resigned and yet sorrowful countenance.

These particulars may appear trivial; but it is better in my present condition, to exert my faculties in specifying the past and in recording it, than waste them in vain and anxious anticipations of the future.

It would have been extremely proper in me to visit in the house, from which the master was thus suddenly summoned away, and I therefore begged permission to attend him to the fishing station, sending his sister that I would be a guarantee for his safety.

The proposal seemed to give much pleasure to Mr. Gaddis. Let it be my brother, who said, "and let the young man have the duty of his hour, for there may be a faithful witness to stand by him in the hour of need, and to report how it shall have ended."

"No, Rachel," said the worthy man, "thou art to blame in this, that, to quiet thy apprehensions on my account, thou shouldst thrust into danger—a danger it shall prove to be—this youth, our guest. For what doubtless, in case of mishap, as many hearts as ache so may be offered on our account."

"Nay, my good friend," said I, taking Mr. Gaddis's hand, "I am not as happy as you suppose me. How my eyes to be contradicted this evening, few would so much as know that such a being had existed for twenty years on the face of the earth, and of that few, only one would sincerely regret me. Do not, therefore, refuse me the privilege of attending you, and of showing, by so trifling an act of kindness, that if I have few friends, I am at least desirous to serve them."

"Thou hast a kind heart, I warrant thee," said Joshua Gaddis, removing the pressure of my hand. "But the young man shall go with me. Why should he not face danger in order to do justice and preserve peace? There is that within me," he added, looking upwards, and with a passing emotion which I had not before observed, and the shores of which perhaps rather belonged to the sect than to his own personal character. "I say, I have that which assures me, that though the angels may rage even like the storm of the ocean, they shall not have freedom to prevail against us."

Having spoken thus, Mr. Gaddis appointed a party to be saddled for my use, and having taken a look with some provisions, and a servant to carry back the horses for which there was no accommodation at the fishing station, we set off about once o'clock at night, and after three quarters of an hour's riding, arrived at our place of destination.

The station consisted, or then consisted, of but for four or five fishermen, a cooperage and shade, and a better sort of cottage, at which the superintendent resided. We gave our horses to the servant to be carried back to Mount Sharon, my companion accompanying himself homeward on foot for their safety, and knocked at the door of the house. As yet we only heard a barking of dogs; but these animals became quiet on snuffing beneath the door, and acknowledging the presence of friends. A hoarse voice then demanded, in rather unfriendly accents, who we were, and what we wanted; and it was not until Joshua named himself, and called upon his superintendent to open, that the latter appeared at the door of the hut, attended by three large dogs of the Newfoundland breed. He had a flambeau in his hand, and two large heavy ship-pistols stuck into his belt. He was a stout, elderly man, who had been a sailor, as I learned, during the earlier part of his life, and was now much confided in by the Fishing Company, whose concerns he directed under the orders of Mr. Geddes.

"Thoudidst not expect me to-night, friend Davies?" said my friend to the old man, who was arranging seats for us by the fire.

"No, Master Geddes," answered he, "I did not expect you, nor, to speak the truth, did I wish for you either."

"These are plain terms, John Davies," answered Mr. Geddes.

"Ay, ay, sir, I know your worship loves no holyday speeches."

"Thou dost guess, I suppose, what brings us here so late, John Davies?" said Mr. Geddes.

"I do suppose, sir," answered the superintendent, "that it was because these d--d smuggling wreckers on the coast are showing their lights to gather their forces, as they did the night before they broke down the dam-dike and wears up the country; but if that same be the case, I wish once more you had staid away, for your worship carries no fighting tackle aboard, I think; and there will be work for such ere morning, your worship."

"Worship is due to Heaven only, John Davies," said Geddes. "I have often desired thee to desist from using that phrase to me."

"I won't, then," said John; "no offence meant: But how the devil can a man stand picking his words, when he is just going to come to blows?"

"I hope not, John Davies," said Joshua Geddes. "Call in the rest of the men, that I may give them their instructions."

"I may cry till doomsday, Master Geddes, ere a soul answers—the cowardly lubbers have all made sail—the cooper, and all the rest of them, so soon as they heard the enemy were at sea. They have all taken to the long-boat, and left the ship among the breakers, except little Phil and myself—they have, by ———!"

"Swear not at all, John Davies—thou art an honest man; and I believe without an oath, that thy comrades love their own bones better than my goods and chattels. And so thou hast no assistance but little Phil against a hundred men or two?"

"Why, there are the dogs, your honour knows, Neptune and Thetis—and the puppy may do something; and then though your worship—I beg pardon—though your honour be no great fighter, this young gentleman may bear a hand."

"Ay, and I see you are provided with arms," said Mr. Geddes; "let me see them."

"Ay, ay, sir; here be a pair of buffers will bite as well as bark—these will make sure of two rogues at least. It would be a shame to strike without firing a shot.—Take care your honour, they are double-shotted."

"Ay, John Davies, I will take care of them," throwing the pistols into a tub of water beside him; "and I wish I could render the whole generation of them useless at the same moment."

A deep shade of displeasure passed over John Davies's weather-beaten countenance. "Belike your honour is going to take the command yourself then?" he said, after a pause. "Why, I can be of little use now; and since your worship, or your honour, or whatever you are, means to strike quietly, I believe you will do it better without me than with me, for I am like enough to make mischief, I admit; but I'll never leave my post without orders."

"Then you have mine, John Davies, to go to Mount Sharon directly, and take the boy Phil with you. Where is he?"

"He is on the outlook for these scums of the earth," answered Davies; "but it is to no purpose to know when they come, if we are not to stand to our weapons."

"We will use none but those of sense and reason, John."

"And you may just as well cast chaff against the wind, as speak sense and reason to the like of them."

"Well, well, be it so," said Joshua; "and now, John Davies, I know thou art what the world calls a brave fellow, and I have ever found thee an honest one. And now I command you to go to Mount Sharon, and let Phil lie on the bank-side—see the poor boy hath a sea-cloak, though—and watch what happens here, and let him bring you the news; and if any violence shall be offered to the property there, I trust to your fidelity to carry my sister to Dumfries, to the house of our friends the Corsacks, and inform the civil authorities of what mischief hath befallen."

The old seaman paused a moment. "It is hard lines for me," he said, "to leave your honour in tribulation; and yet, staying here, I am only like to make bad worse; and your honour's sister, Miss Rachel, must be looked to, that's certain; for if the rogues once get their hand to mischief, they will come to Mount Sharon after they have wasted and destroyed this here snug little roadstead, where I thought to ride at anchor for life."

"Ay, ay, sir," said the veteran, "for they are something of my mind, and would not keep quiet if they saw mischief doing; so maybe they might come to mischief, poor dumb creatures. So God bless your honour—I mean your worship—I cannot bring my mouth to say fare you well.—Here, Neptune, Thetis! come, dogs, come."

"Now there goes one of the best and most faithful creatures that ever was born," said Mr. Geddes, as the superintendent shut the door of the cottage. "Nature made him with a heart that would not have suffered him to harm a fly; but thou seest, friend Latimer, that as men arm their bull-dogs with spiked collars, and their game-cocks with steel spurs, to aid them in fight, so they corrupt, by education, the best and mildest natures, until fortitude and spirit become stubbornness and ferocity. Believe me, friend Latimer, I would as soon expose my faithful household dog to a vain combat with a herd of wolves, as yon trusty creature to the violence of the enraged multitude. But I need say little on this subject to thee, friend Latimer, who, I doubt not, art trained to believe that courage is displayed and honour attained, not by doing and suffering, as becomes a man, that which fate calls us to suffer, and justice commands us to do, but because thou art ready to retort violence for violence, and considerest the lightest insult as a sufficient cause for the spilling of blood, nay, the taking of life.—But, leaving these points of controversy to a more fit season, let us see what our basket of provision contains; for in truth, friend Latimer, I am one of those whom neither fear nor anxiety deprive of their ordinary appetite."

We found the means of good cheer accordingly, which Mr. Geddes seemed to enjoy as much as if it had been eaten in a situation of perfect safety; nay, his conversation appeared to be rather more gay than on ordinary occasions. After eating our supper we left the hut together, and walked for a few minutes on the banks of the sea. It was high water, and the ebb had not yet commenced. The moon shone broad and bright upon the placid face of the Solway Frith, and showed a slight ripple upon the stakes, the tops of which were just visible above the waves, and on the dark-coloured buoys which marked the upper edge of the enclosure of nets. At a much greater distance,—for the estuary is here very wide,—the line of the English coast was seen on the verge of the water, resembling one of those fog-banks on which mariners are said to gaze, uncertain whether it be land or atmospherical delusion.

"We shall be undisturbed for some hours," said

Mr. Geddes; "they will not come down upon us till the state of the tide permits them to destroy the tide-nets. Is it not strange to think that human passions will so soon transform such a tranquil scene as this, into one of devastation and confusion?"

It was indeed a scene of exquisite stillness; so much so, that the restless waves of the Solway seemed, if not absolutely to sleep, at least to slumber;—on the shore no night-bird was heard—the cock had not sung his first matins, and we ourselves walked more lightly than by day, as if to suit the sound of our own paces to the serene tranquillity around us. At length, the plaintive cry of a dog broke the silence, and on our return to the cottage, we found that the younger of the three animals which had gone along with John Davies, unaccustomed, perhaps, to distant journeys, and the duty of following to heel, had strayed from the party, and, unable to rejoin them, had wandered back to the place of its birth.

"Another feeble addition to our feeble garrison," said Mr. Geddes, as he caressed the dog, and admitted it into the cottage. "Poor thing! as thou art incapable of doing any mischief, I hope thou wilt sustain none. At least thou mayst do us the good service of a sentinel, and permit us to enjoy a quiet repose, under the certainty that thou wilt alarm us when the enemy is at hand."

There were two beds in the superintendent's room, upon which we threw ourselves. Mr. Geddes, with his happy equanimity of temper, was asleep in the first five minutes. I lay for some time in doubtful and anxious thoughts, watching the fire and the motions of the restless dog, which, disturbed probably at the absence of John Davies, wandered from the hearth to the door and back again, then came to the bedside, and licked my hands and face, and at length, experiencing no repulse to its advances, established itself at my feet, and went to sleep, an example which I soon afterwards followed.

The rage of narration, my dear Alan—for I will never relinquish the hope that what I am writing may one day reach your hands—has not forsaken me even in my confinement, and the extensive though unimportant details into which I have been hurried, render it necessary that I commence another sheet. Fortunately, my pigny characters comprehend a great many words within a small space of paper.

CHAPTER IV.

DARIE LATIMER'S JOURNAL, IN CONTINUATION.

THE morning was dawning, and Mr. Geddes and I myself were still sleeping soundly, when the alarm was given by my canine bedfellow, who first growled deeply at intervals, and at length bore more decided testimony to the approach of some enemy. I opened the door of the cottage, and perceived, at the distance of about two hundred yards, a small but close column of men, which I would have taken for a dark hedge, but that I could perceive it was advancing rapidly and in silence.

The dog flew towards them, but instantly ran howling back to me, having probably been chastised by a stick or a stone. Uncertain as to the plan of tactics or of treaty which Mr. Geddes might think proper to adopt, I was about to retire into the cottage, when he suddenly joined me at the door, and, slipping his arm through mine, said, "Let us go to meet them manfully; we have done nothing to be ashamed of.—Friends," he said, raising his voice as we approached them, "who and what are you, and with what purpose are you here on my property?"

A loud cheer was the answer returned, and a brace of fiddlers who occupied the front of the march immediately struck up the insulting air, the words of which begin,

"Merrily danced the Quaker's wife,
And merrily danced the Quaker."

Even at that moment of alarm, I think I recognised the tones of the blind fiddler, known by the name of Wandering Willie, from his itinerant habits. They continued to advance swiftly and in great order, in their front

"The fery fiddlers playing martial airs;"

when, coming close up, they surrounded us by a single movement, and there was a universal cry, "Whoop, Quaker—whoop, Quaker! Here have we them both, the wet Quaker and the dry one."

"Hang up the wet Quaker to dry, and wet the dry one with a ducking," answered another voice.

"Where is the sea-otter, John Davies, that destroyed more fish than any seach upon Ailsay Craig?" exclaimed a third voice. "I have an old crow to pluck with him, and a pock to put the feathers in."

We stood perfectly passive; for, to have attempted resistance against more than a hundred men, armed with guns, fish-spears, iron-crows, spades, and bludgeons, would have been an act of utter insanity. Mr. Geddes, with his strong sonorous voice, answered the question about the superintendent in a manner, the manly indifference of which compelled them to attend to him.

"John Davies," he said, "will, I trust, soon be a Dumfries!"

"To fetch down redcoats and dragoons against us, you canting old villain!"

A blow was, at the same time, levelled at my friend, which I parried by interposing the stick I had in my hand. I was instantly struck down, and have a faint recollection of hearing some crying, "Kill the young spy!" and others, as I thought, interposing on my behalf. But a second blow on the head, received in the scuffle, soon deprived me of sense and consciousness, and threw me into a state of insensibility, from which I did not recover immediately. When I did come to myself, I was lying on the bed from which I had just risen before the fray, and my poor companion, the Newfoundland puppy, its courage entirely cowed by the tumult of the riot, had crept as close to me as it could, and lay trembling and whining as if under the most dreadful terror. I doubted at first whether I had not dreamed of the tumult, until, as I attempted to rise, a feeling of pain and dizziness assured me that the injury I had sustained was but too real. I gathered together my senses—listened—and heard at a distance the shouts of the rioters, busy, doubtless, in their work of devastation. I made a second effort to rise, or at least to turn myself, for I lay with my face to the wall of the cottage, but I found that my limbs were secured, and my motions effectually prevented—not indeed by cords, but by lines or cloth bandages swathed around my ankles, and securing my hands to my sides. Aware of my utter captive condition, I groaned betwixt bodily pain and mental distress.

A voice by my bedside whispered, in a whining tone, "Whisht a-ye, hinnie—whisht, a-ye; haud your tongue, like a good bairn—ye have cost us care enough already. My hinnie's clean gane now."

Knowing, as I thought, the phraseology of the wife of the itinerant musician, I asked her where her husband was, and whether he had been hurt.

"Broken," answered the dame, "all broken to pieces; fit for naught but to be made spunks of—the best blood that was in Scotland."

"Broken?—blood?—is your husband wounded; has there been bloodshed—broken limbs?"

"Broken limbs?—I wish," answered the beldam, "that my hinnie had broken the best bane in his body, before he had broken his fiddle, that was the best blood in Scotland—it was a cremony, for aught that I ken."

"Pshaw—only his fiddle?" said I.

"I dinna ken what waur your honour could have wished him to do, unless he had broken his neck; and this is muckle the same to my hinnie Willie and me Chaw, indeed! It is easy to say chaw, but wha is to gie us ony thing to chaw?—the bread-winner's gane and we may e'en sit down and starve."

"No, no," I said, "I will pay you for twenty such fiddles."

"Twenty such! is that a' ye ken about it? the country hadna the like o't. But if your honour wad to pay us, as nae doubt would be to your credit here and hereafter, where are ye to get the siller?"

"I have enough of money," said I, attempting to reach my hand towards my side-pocket; "unloose these bandages, and I will pay you on the spot."

This hint appeared to move her, and she was approaching the bedside, as I hoped, to liberate me from my bonds, when a nearer and more desperate shout was heard, as if the rioters were close by the hut.

"I daurna— I daurna," said the poor woman, "they would murder me and my bairn Willie bairn, and they have misguded us enough already;—but if there is any thing worldly I could do for your honour, leave out loosing ye!"

What she said recalled me to my bodily suffering. Agitation, and the effects of the usage I had received, had produced a burning thirst. I asked for a drink of water.

"Heaven Almighty forbid that Epps Ainslie should gie ony sick gentleman cauld well-water, and him in a fever. Na, na, hinne, let me alane, I'll do better for ye than the like of that."

"Give me what you will," I replied; "let it but be liquid and cool."

The woman gave me a large horn accordingly, filled with spirits and water, which, without minute inquiry concerning the nature of its contents, I drained at a draught. Either the spirits taken in such a manner, acted more suddenly than usual on my brain, or else there was some drug mixed with the beverage. I remember little after drinking it off, only that the appearance of things around me became indistinct; that the woman's form seemed to multiply itself, and to flit in various figures around me, bearing the same lineaments as she herself did. I remember also that the discordant noises and cries of those without the cottage seemed to die away in a hum like that with which a nurse hushes her babe. At length I fell into a deep sound sleep, or rather, a state of absolute insensibility.

I have reason to think this species of trance lasted for many hours; indeed, for the whole subsequent day and part of the night. It was not uniformly so profound, for my recollection of it is chequered with many dreams, all of a painful nature, but too faint and too indistinct to be remembered. At length the moment of waking came, and my sensations were horrible.

A deep sound, which, in the confusion of my senses, I identified with the cries of the rioters, was the first thing of which I was sensible; next, I became conscious that I was carried violently forward in some conveyance, with an unequal motion, which gave me much pain. My position was horizontal, and when I attempted to stretch my hands in order to find some mode of securing myself against this species of suffering, I found I was bound as before, and the horrible reality rushed on my mind, that I was in the hands of those who had lately committed a great outrage on property, and were now about to kidnap, if not to murder me. I opened my eyes, it was to no purpose— all around me was dark, for a day had passed over during my captivity. A dispiriting sickness oppressed my head—my heart seemed on fire, while my feet and hands were chilled and benumbed with want of circulation. It was with the utmost difficulty that I at length, and gradually, recovered in a sufficient degree the power of observing external sounds and circumstances; and when I did so, they presented nothing consolatory.

Groping with my hands, as far as the bandages would permit, and receiving the assistance of some occasional glances of the moonlight, I became aware that the carriage in which I was transported was one of the light carts of the country, called tumblers, and that a little attention had been paid to my accommodation, as I was laid upon some sacks covered with matting, and filled with straw. Without these, my condition would have been still more intolerable, for the vehicle, sinking now on one side, and now on the other, sometimes sticking absolutely fast, and requiring the utmost exertions of the animal which drew it to put it once more in motion, was subjected to jolts in all directions, which were very severe. At other times it rolled silently and smoothly over what seemed to be wet sand; and, as I heard the distant roar of the tide, I had little doubt that we were engaged in passing the formidable estuary which divides the two kingdoms.

There seemed to be at least five or six people about the cart, some on foot, others on horseback; the former lent assistance whenever it was in danger of upsetting, or sticking fast in the quicksand; the others rode before and acted as guides, often changing the direction of the vehicle as the precarious state of the passage required.

I addressed myself to the men around the cart, and endeavoured to move their compassion. I had harmed, I said, no one, and for no action in my life had deserved such cruel treatment. I had no concern whatever in the fishing station which had incurred their displeasure, and my acquaintance with Mr. Geddes was of a very late date. Lastly, and as my strongest argument, I endeavoured to excite their fears, by informing them that my rank in life would not permit me to be either murdered or secreted with impunity; and to interest their avarice, by the promises I made them of reward, if they would effect my deliverance. I only received a scornful laugh in reply to my threats; my promises might have done more, for the fellows were whispering together as if in hesitation, and I began to reiterate and increase my offers, when the voice of one of the horsemen, who had suddenly come up, enjoined silence to the men on foot, and, approaching the side of the cart, said to me, with a strong and determined voice, "Young man, there is no personal harm designed to you. If you remain silent and quiet, you may reckon on good treatment; but if you endeavour to tamper with these men in the execution of their duty, I will take such measures for silencing you, as you shall remember the longest day you have to live."

I thought I knew the voice which uttered these threats; but, in such a situation, my perceptions could not be supposed to be perfectly accurate. I was contented to reply, "Whoever you are that speak to me, I entreat the benefit of the meanest prisoner, who is not to be subjected legally to greater hardship than is necessary for the restraint of his person. I entreat that these bonds, which hurt me so cruelly, may be slackened at least, if not removed altogether."

"I will slacken the belts," said the former speaker; "nay, I will altogether remove them, and allow you to pursue your journey in a more convenient manner, provided you will give me your word of honour that you will not attempt an escape."

"Never!" I answered, with an energy of which despair alone could have rendered me capable—"I will never submit to loss of freedom a moment longer than I am subjected to it by force."

"Enough," he replied; "the sentiment is natural; but do not on your side complain that I, who am carrying on an important undertaking, use the only means in my power for ensuring its success."

I entreated to know what it was designed to do with me; but my conductor, in a voice of menacing authority, desired me to be silent on my peril; and my strength and spirits were too much exhausted to permit my continuing a dialogue so singular, even if I could have promised myself any good result by doing so.

It is proper here to add, that, from my recollections at the time, and from what has since taken place, I have the strongest possible belief that the man with whom I held this expostulation, was the singular person residing at Brokenburn, in Dumfriesshire, and called by the fishers of that hamlet, the Laird of the Solway Lochs. The cause for his inveterate persecution I cannot pretend even to guess at.

In the mean time, the cart was dragged heavily and wearily on, until the nearer roar of the advancing tide excited the apprehension of another danger. I could not mistake the sound, which I had heard upon another occasion, when it was only the speed of a fleet horse which saved me from perishing in the quicksands. Thou, my dear Alan, canst not but remember the former circumstances; and now, wonderful contrast! the very man, to the best of my belief, who then saved me from peril, was the leader of the lawless band who had deprived me of my liberty. I conjectured that the danger grew imminent; for I heard some words and circumstances which made me aware that a rider hastily fastened his own horse to the shafts of the cart, in order to assist the exhausted animal which drew it, and the vehicle was now pulled forward at a faster pace, which the horses were urged to maintain by blows and curses. The men, however, were inhabitants of the neighbourhood; and I had strong personal reason to believe, that one of them, at least, was intimately acquainted with all the depths and shallows of the perilous paths in which we were engaged. But they were in imminent danger themselves; and if so, as from the whispering and exertions to push on with the cart, was much to be apprehended, there was little doubt that I should be left behind as a useless encumbrance, and that while I was in a condition which rendered every chance of escape impracticable. These were awful apprehensions; but it pleased Providence to increase them to a point which my brain was scarcely able to endure.

As we approached very near to a black line, which, dimly visible as it was, I could make out to be the shore, we heard two or three sounds, which appeared to be the report of fire-arms. Immediately all was bustle among our party to get forward. Presently a fellow galloped up to us, crying out, "Ware hawk! ware hawk! the land-sharks are out from Burgh, and Allonby Tom will lose his cargo if you do not bear a hand."

Most of my company seemed to make hastily for the shore on receiving this intelligence. A driver was left with the cart; but at length, when, after repeated and hair-breadth escapes, it actually stuck fast in a slough or quicksand, the fellow with an oath cut the harness, and, as I presume, departed with the horses, whose feet I heard splashing over the wet sand, and through the shallows, as he galloped off.

The dropping sound of fire-arms was still continued, but lost almost entirely in the thunder of the advancing surge. By a desperate effort I raised myself in the cart, and attained a sitting posture which served only to show me the extent of my danger. There lay my native land—my own England—the land where I was born, and to which my wishes, since my earliest age, had turned with all the prejudices of national feeling—there it lay, within a furlong of the place where I yet was; that furlong which an infant would have raced over in a minute, was yet a barrier effectual to divide me for ever from England and from life. I soon not only heard the roar of this dreadful torrent, but saw, by the fitful moonlight, the foamy crests of the devouring waves, as they advanced with the speed and fury of a pack of hungry wolves.

The consciousness that the slightest ray of hope or power of struggling, was not left me, quite overcame the constancy which I had hitherto maintained. My eyes began to swim—my head grew giddy and mad with fear—I chattered and howled to the howling and roaring sea. One or two great waves already reached the cart, when the conductor of the party whom I have mentioned so often, was, as if by magic, at my side. He sprang from his horse into the vehicle, cut the ligatures which restrained me, and bade me get up and mount in the fiend's name.

Seeing I was incapable of obeying, he seized me, as if I had been a child of six months old, threw me across the horse, sprung on behind, supporting with one hand, while he directed the animal with the other. In my helpless and painful posture, I was unconscious of the degree of danger which we incurred; but I believe at one time the horse was swimming, or nearly so; and that it was with difficulty, that my stern and powerful assistant kept my head above water. I remember particularly the shock which I felt when the animal, endeavouring to gain the bank, reared, and very nearly fell back on his burden. The time during which I continued in this dreadful condition did not probably exceed two or three minutes, yet so strongly were they marked with horror and agony, that they seem to my recollection a much more considerable space of time.

When I had been thus snatched from destruction, I had only power to say to my protector,—or oppressor,—for he merited either name at my hand, "You do not, then, design to murder me?"

He laughed as he replied, but it was a sort of laughter which I scarce desire to hear again.—"Fie! you think I had let the waves do their work? But remember, the shepherd saves his sheep from the torrent—is it to preserve its life?—Be silent, however, with questions or entreaties. What I mean to do, thou canst no more discover or prevent than a man, with his bare palm, can scoop dry the Solway."

I was too much exhausted to continue the argument; and, still numbed and torpid in all my limbs, permitted myself without reluctance to be placed on a horse brought for the purpose. My formidable conductor rode on the one side, and another person on the other, keeping me upright in the saddle. In this manner we travelled forward at a considerable rate, and by by-roads, with which my attendant seemed as familiar as with the perilous passages of the Solway.

At length, after stumbling through a labyrinth of dark and deep lanes, and crossing more than one rough and barren heath, we found ourselves on the edge of a high-road, where a chaise and four awaited as it appeared, our arrival. To my great relief we now changed our mode of conveyance: for my dizziness and headache had returned in so strong a degree, that I should otherwise have been totally unable to keep my seat on horseback, even with the support which I received.

My doubted and dangerous companion signed to me to enter the carriage—the man who had ridden on the left side of my horse stepped in after me, and, drawing up the blinds of the vehicle, gave the signal for instant departure.

I had obtained a glimpse of the countenance of my new companion, as by the aid of a dark lantern the drivers opened the carriage door, and I was well nigh persuaded that I recognised in him the domestic of the leader of this party, whom I had seen at his house in Brokenburn on a former occasion. To ascertain the truth of my suspicion, I asked him whether his name was not Cristal Nixon.

"What is other folk's names to you," he replied, gruffly, "who cannot tell your own father and mother?"

"You know them, perhaps?" I exclaimed eagerly. "You know them! and with that secret is connected the treatment which I am now receiving? It must be so, for in my life have I never injured any one. Tell me the cause of my misfortunes, or rather, help me to my liberty, and I will reward you richly."

"Ay, ay," replied my keeper; "but what can I give you liberty, who know nothing how to use it? I'm a gentleman, but spend your time with Quakers and fiddlers, and such-like raff? If I was your—hem, hem!"

Here Cristal stopped short, just on the point, as it appeared, when some information was likely to escape him. I urged him once more to be my friend, and promised him all the stock of money which I had about me, and it was not inconsiderable, if he would assist in my escape.

He listened, as if to a proposition which had some interest, and replied, but in a voice rather softer than before, "Ay, but men do not catch old birds with chaff, my master. Where have you got the rhinoceros are so flush of?"

"I will give you earnest directly, and that in bank-notes," said I: but, thrusting my hand into my side-pocket, I found my pocketbook was gone. I would have persuaded myself that it was only the numbness of my hands which prevented my finding it; but Cristal Nixon, who bears in his countenance the cynicism which is especially entertained with human misery, no longer suppressed his laughter.

"Oh, ho! my young master," he said; "we have taken good enough care you have not kept the means of bribing poor folk's fidelity. What, man, they have souls as well as other people, and to make them break trust is a deadly sin. And as for me, young gentleman, if you would fill Saint Mary's Kirk with gold, Cristal Nixon would mind it no more than a many chucky-stones."

I would have persisted, were it but in hopes of his letting drop that which it concerned me to know, but he cut off further communication, by desiring me to lean back in the corner and go to sleep.

"Thou art cockbrained enough already," he added, "and we shall have thy young pate addled entirely, if you do not take some natural rest."

I did indeed require repose, if not slumber; the draught which I had taken continued to operate, and satisfied in my own mind that no attempt on my life was designed, the fear of instant death no longer combated the terror which crept over me—I slept, and slept soundly, but still without refreshment.

When I awoke, I found myself extremely indisposed; images of the past, and anticipations of the future, floated confusedly through my brain. I perceived, however, that my situation was changed, greatly for the better. I was in a good bed, with the curtains drawn round it; I heard the lowered voice and cautious step of attendants, who seemed to respect my repose; it appeared as if I was in the hands either of friends, or of such as in want me no personal harm.

I can give but an indistinct account of two or three broken and feverish days which succeeded, but in they were chequered with dreams and visions of terror, other and more agreeable objects were also sometimes presented. Alan Parford well understands me when I say, I am convinced I saw G. M. during this interval of oblivion. I had medical attendance, and was bled more than once. I also remember a painful operation performed on my head where I had received a severe blow on the night of the riot. My hair was cut short, and the bone of the skull examined, to discover if the cranium had received any injury.

On seeing the physician, it would have been a natural to have appealed to him on the subject of my confinement, and I remember more than once attempting to do so. But the fever lay like a spell upon my tongue, and when I would have implored the doctor's assistance, I rambled from the subject, and spoke I know not what—nonsense. Some power, which I was unable to resist, seemed to pervert me into a different course of conversation from what I intended, and though conscious, in some degree, of the failure, I could not mend it; and resolved, therefore, to be patient, until my capacity of steady thought and examination was restored to me with my ordinary health, which had sustained a severe shock from the vicissitudes to which I had been exposed.*

DARSIE LATIMER'S JOURNAL, IN CONTINUATION.

Two or three days, perhaps more, perhaps less, had been spent in bed, when I was carefully attended, and treated, I believe, with as much judgment as the case required, and I was at length allowed to quit my bed, though not the chamber. I was now more able to make some observation on the place of my confinement.

* It may be here mentioned, that a violent and popular attack upon what the country people of this district consider as an invasion of their rights, is by no means an uninteresting fiction. Shortly after the close of the American war, Sir James Graham of Netherby constructed a canal, the object of which was the Ebbot, at which a vessel flowed from the estate, through it has its origin, and the principal part of its course is situated. The new farmer at Netherby was considered as an encroachment, calculated to injure the salmon fishery, and to send into Scotland, and the right of erecting it being an international question of law between the sister kingdoms, there was no court in either competent to its decision. In this dilemma, the Scots people assembled in numbers by signal of rocket night, and, roughly armed with bowing-poles, fish-spears, and such other weapons, marched to the heads of the river for the purpose of pulling down the dam, the only object to Sir James's canal arm. Many of his own men, to protect his property, and had some military from Canada to the same purpose. A renewal of the Border wars had nearly taken place in the nineteenth century, when pride and emulation on both sides saved much tumult, and perhaps some bloodshed. The English prior consented that a breach should be made in his dam, sufficient for the passage of the fish, and thus removed the Scottish grievance. I believe the river has since that time taken the matter into its own disposal, and entirely swept away the dam, the question.

The room, in appearance and furniture, resembled the best apartment in a farmer's house; and the window, two stories high, looked into a back-yard, or court, filled with poultry. There were the usual domestic offices about this yard. I could distinguish the brewhouse and the barn, and I heard from a more remote building, the lowing of the cattle and other rural sounds, announcing a large and well-stocked farm. Trees were sights and sounds qualified to dispel any apprehension of immediate violence. Yet the building seemed a retreat and strong, a part of the roof was battlemented, and the walls were of great thickness; lastly, I observed with some unpleasant sensations, that the windows of my chamber had been lately secured with iron stanchions, and that the servants who brought me victuals, or visited my apartment to render other menial offices, always locked the door when they retired.

The comfort and cleanliness of my chamber were of true English growth, and such as I had rarely seen on the other side of the Tweed; the very old wainscot, which composed the floor and the paneling of the room, was scrubbed with a degree of labour which the Scottish housewife rarely bestows on her most costly furniture.

The whole apartments appropriated to my use consisted of the bedroom, a small parlour adjacent, within which was a still smaller closet, having a narrow window, which seemed anciently to have been used as a shot-hole, admitting, indeed, a very moderate portion of light and air, but without its being possible to see any thing from it except the blue sky, and that only by mounting on a chair. There were appearances of a separate entrance into this cabinet, besides that which communicated with the parlour, but it had been recently built up, as I discovered, by removing a piece of tapestry which covered the fresh mason-work. I found some of my clothes here, with linen and other articles, as well as my writing case, containing pen, ink, and paper, which enabled me, at my leisure, (which God knows, is undisturbed enough) to make this record of my confinement. It may be well believed, however, that I do not trust to the security of the bureau, but carry the written sheets about my person, so that I can only be deprived of them by actual violence. I also am cautious to write in the little cabinet only, so that I can hear any person approach me through the other apartments, and have time enough to put aside my journal before they come on me.

The servants, a stout country fellow, and a very pretty milkmaid-looking lass, by whom I am attended, seem of the true Joan and Hodge school, thinking of little and desiring nothing, beyond the very limited sphere of their own duties and enjoyments, and having no curiosity whatever about the affairs of others. Their behaviour to me, in particular, is, at the same time, very kind and very provoking. My table is abundantly supplied, and they seem anxious to comply with my taste in that department. But whenever I make inquiries beyond "what's for dinner," the boots of a lad baffles me by his overt, and his danna Joan, and, if hard pressed, turns his back on me contemptuously, and leaves the room. The girl, too, pretends to be as simple as he; but an arch grin, which she cannot always suppress, seems to acknowledge that she understands perfectly well the game which she is playing, and is determined to keep me in ignorance. Both of them, and the wench in particular, treat me as they would do a spoiled child, and never deign to refuse me any thing which I ask, taking care, at the same time, not to make their words good by effectually granting my request. Thus, if I desire to go out, I am promised by Dorcas that I shall walk in the park at night and see the cows milked, just as she would propose such an amusement to a child. But she takes care never to keep her word, if it is in her power to do so.

In the mean time, there has stolen on me insensibly an indifference to my freedom—a carelessness about my situation, for which I am unable to account, unless it be the consequence of weakness and loss of blood. I have read of men who, immured as I am, have surprised the world by the address with which

and a little silver to buy ribands, with which she was so much delighted, that she exclaimed, "God! Christ! Nixon may say his worst on thee; but thou art a civil gentleman for all him; and a quiet man wth women folk looks."

There is no sense in being too quiet with women folk, so I added a kiss with my crown piece; and I cannot help thinking, that I have secured a partisan in Dorcas. At least she blushed, and pocketed her little compliment with one hand, while, with the other, she adjusted her cherry-coloured ribands, a little disordered by the struggle it cost me to attain the honour of a salute.

As she unlocked the door to leave the apartment, she turned back, and looking on me with a strong expression of compassion, added the remarkable words, "—be't med or no, thou'ee a metted lad, after all."

There was something very ominous in the sound of those farewell words, which seemed to afford me a clue to the pretext under which I was detained in confinement. My demeanour was probably means enough, while I was agitated at once by the frenzy incident to the fever, and the anxiety arising from my extraordinary situation. But is it possible they can now establish any cause for confining me, arising out of the state of my mind?

If this be really the pretext under which I am restrained from my liberty, nothing but the immediate correction of my conduct can remove the prejudices which these circumstances may have excited in the minds of all who have approached me during my illness. I have heard dreadful thought!—of men who for various reasons, have been reprieved into the custody of the keepers of private madhouses, and whose brain, after years of misery, became at length unsettled, through irresistible sympathy with the wretched beings among whom they were retained. This shall not be my case, if, by strong internal resolution, it is in human nature to avoid the action of exterior and contagious sympathies.

Mean time I sat down to compose and arrange my thoughts, for my personal appeal to my jailer—so I must call him—whom I addressed in the following manner, having at length, and after making several copies, found language to qualify the sense of resentment which burned in the first draughts of my letter, and endeavoured to assume a tone more conciliating. I mentioned the two accusations on which he had certainly saved my life, when at the utmost peril; and I added, that whatever was the purpose of the restraint now practised on me, as I was given to understand, by his authority it could not certainly be with any view to ultimately injuring me. He might, I said, have mistaken me for some other person, and I gave him what account I could of my situation and education, to correct such an error. I supposed it not possible, that he might think me too weak for travelling, and not capable of taking care of myself, and I begged to assure him that I was restored in perfect health, and quite able to endure the fatigue of a journey. Lastly, I reminded him in firm though measured terms, that the restraint which I sustained was an illegal one, and highly punishable by the laws which protect the liberties of the subject. I ended by demanding, that he would take me before a magistrate; or, at least, that he would favour me with a personal interview, and explain his meaning with regard to me.

Perhaps this letter was expressed in a tone too humble for the situation of an injured man, and I am inclined to think so when I again recapitulate its tenor. But what could I do? I was in the power of one whose passions seem so violent as his means of gratifying them appear unbounded. I had reason, too, to believe (him to be, Alan) that all his family did not approve of the violence of his conduct towards me; my object, in fine, was freedom, and who would not sacrifice much to attain it?

I had no means of addressing my letter excepting, "For the Squire's own hand." He could be at no great distance, for in the course of twenty-four hours I received an answer. It was addressed to Dorcas Latimer, and contained these words:—"You have demanded an interview with me. You have required to be carried before a magistrate. Your first wish shall be granted—perhaps the second also. Mean while, be assured that you are a prisoner for the time, by competent authority, and that such authority is supported by adequate power. However, therefore, of struggling with a force sufficient to crush you, but abandon yourself to that train of events by which we are both swept along, and which it is impossible that either of us can resist."

These mysterious words were without signature of any kind, and left me nothing more important to do than to prepare myself for the morning which they promised. For that purpose I must now break off, and make sure of the manuscript, so far as I can, in my present condition, be sure of any thing,—by confining it within the lining of my coat, so as not to be found without secret search.

CHAPTER VI.

LATIMER'S JOURNAL, IN CONTINUATION.

THE important interview expected at the conclusion of my last took place sooner than I had calculated; for the very day I received the letter, and just when my dinner was finished, the Squire, or whatever he is called, entered the room so suddenly, that I almost thought I beheld an apparition. The figure of this man is peculiarly noble and stately, and his voice has that deep fulness of accent which implies uncreated authority. I had risen involuntarily as he entered; we gazed on each other for a moment in silence, which was at length broken by my valet.

"You have desired to see me," he said. "I am here; if you have aught to say, let me hear it; my time is too brief to be consumed in childish dumb-show."

"I would ask of you," said I, "by what authority I am detained in this place of confinement, and for what purpose?"

"I have told you already," said he, "that my authority is sufficient, and my power equal to it; this is all which it is necessary for you at present to know."

"Every British subject has a right to know why he suffers restraint," I replied. "nor can he be deprived of liberty without a legal warrant—Show me that by which you confine me thus."

"You shall see more," he said; "you shall see the magistrate by whom it is granted, and that without a moment's delay."

This sudden proposal flattered and alarmed me; I felt, nevertheless, that I had the right cause, and resolved to press it boldly, although I could well have desired a little further time for preparation. He turned, however, threw open the door of the apartment, and commanded me to follow him. I felt some inclination, when I crossed the threshold of my prison-chamber, to have turned and run for it; but I knew not where to find the stairs—had reason to think the outer-door would be secured—and, to conclude, so soon as I had quitted the room to follow the proud step of my conductor, I observed that I was dogged by Christal Nixon, who suddenly appeared with two paces of me, and with whose great personal strength, independent of the assistance he might have received from his master, I saw no chance of contending. I therefore followed, unhesitatingly, and in silence along one or two passages of great greater length than I conceived with the ideas I had previously entertained of the size of the house. At length a door was flung open, and we entered a large old-fashioned parlour, having coloured glass in the windows, oak-panelling on the wall, a large grate in which a large log or two smoked under an arched chimney-piece of stone, which bore some animal device, whilst the walls were adorned with the usual number of pictures in armour, with large wigs instead of helmets, and ladies in ermine, smiling to nosegays.

Behind a long table, on which were several books, sat a smart underbred-looking man, wearing his own hair tied in a club, and who, from the quire of paper laid before him, and the pen which he handled at my entrance, seemed prepared to officiate as clerk. As I wish to describe these persons as accurately as possible, I may add, he wore a dark-coloured coat, corduroy breeches, and spatterdashies. At the upper end of the same table, in an ample easy-chair, covered with black leather, reposed a fat personage, about fifty years old, who either was actually a country justice, or was well selected to represent such a character. His leathern breeches were faultless in make, his jockey boots spotless in the varnish, and a handsome and flourishing pair of boot-garters, as they are called, united the one part of his garments to the other; in fine, a richly-laced scarlet waistcoat, and a purple coat, set off the neat though corpulent figure of the little man, and threw an additional bloom upon his plethoric aspect. I suppose he had dined, for it was two hours past noon, and he was amusing himself, and aiding digestion, with a pipe of tobacco. There was an air of importance in his manner which corresponded to the rural dignity of his exterior, and a habit which he had of throwing out a number of interjectional sounds, uttered with a strange variety of intonation, running from bass up to treble in a very extraordinary manner, or breaking off his sentences with a whiff of his pipe, seemed adopted to give an air of thought and mature deliberation to his opinions and decisions. Notwithstanding all this, Alan, it might be dooted, as our old Professor used to say, whether the Justice was any thing more than an ass. Certainly, besides a great deference for the legal opinion of his clerk, which might be quite according to the order of things, he seemed to be wonderfully under the command of his brother Squire, if squire either of them were, and indeed much more than was consistent with so much assumed consequence of his own.

"Ho—ha—ay—so—so—Hum—humph—this is the young man, I suppose—Hum—ay—seems sickly—Young gentleman, you may sit down."

I used the permission given, for I had been much more reduced by my illness than I was aware of, and felt myself really fatigued, even by the few paces I had walked, joined to the agitation I suffered.

"And your name, young man, is—humph—ay—ha—what is it?"

"Darsie Latimer."

"Right—ny—humph—very right. Darsie Latimer is the very thing—ha—ay—where do you come from?"

"From Scotland, sir," I replied.

"A native of Scotland—a—humph—eh—how is it?"

"I am an Englishman by birth, sir."

"Right—ay—yes, you are so. But pray, Mr. Darsie Latimer, have you always been called by that name, or have you any other?—Nick, write down his answers, Nick."

"As far as I remember, I never bore any other," was my answer.

"How, no?—well I should not have thought so—Hey, neighbour, would you?"

Here he looked towards the other Squire, who had thrown himself into a chair; and, with his legs stretched out before him, and his arms folded on his bosom, seemed carelessly attending to what was going forward. He answered the appeal of the Justice by saying, that perhaps the young man's memory did not go back to a very early period.

"Ah—eh—ha—you hear the gentleman—Pray, how far may your memory be pleased to run back to?—umph?"

"Perhaps, sir, to the age of three years, or a little farther."

"And will you presume to say, sir," said the Squire, drawing himself suddenly erect in his seat, and exerting the strength of his powerful voice, "that you then bore your present name?"

I was startled at the confidence with which this question was put, and in vain rummaged my memory for the means of replying. "At least," I said, "I always remember being called Darsie; children, at that early age, seldom get more than their Christian name."

"O, I thought so," he replied, and again stretched himself on his seat, in the same lounging posture as before.

"So you were called Darsie in your infancy," said the Justice; "and hum—ay—when did you first take the name of Latimer?"

"I did not take it, sir; it was given to me."

"I ask you," said the lord of the mansion, but with less severity in his voice than formerly, "whether you can remember that you were ever called Latimer, until you had that name given you in Scotland?"

"I will be candid; I cannot recollect an instance that I was so called when in England, but neither can I recollect when the name was first given me; and if any thing is to be founded on these queries and my answers, I desire my early childhood may be taken into consideration."

"Hum—ay—yes," said the Justice; "all that requires consideration shall be duly considered. Young man—eh—I beg to know the name of your father and mother?"

This was galling a wound that has festered for years, and I did not endure the question so patiently as those which preceded it; but replied, "I demand, in my turn, to know if I am before an English Justice of the Peace?"

"His worship Squire Foxley, of Foxley Hall, has been of the quorum these twenty years," said Master Nicholas.

"Then he ought to know, or you, sir, as his clerk should inform him," said I, "that I am the complainant in this case, and that my complaint ought to be heard before I am subjected to cross-examination."

"Humph—hoy—what, ay—there is something in that, neighbour," said the poor Justice, who, blown about by every wind of doctrine, seemed desirous to attain the sanction of his brother Squire.

"I wonder at you, Foxley," said his firm-minded acquaintance; "how can you render the young man justice unless you know who he is?"

"Ha—yes—egad that's true," said Mr. Justice Foxley; "and now—looking into the matter more closely—there is, eh, upon the whole—nothing at all in what he says—so, sir, you must tell your father's name and surname."

"It is out of my power, sir; they are not known to me, since you must needs know so much of my private affairs."

The Justice collected a great affatus in his cheeks, which puffed them up like those of a Dutch cherub while his eyes seemed flying out of his head, from the effort with which he retained his breath. He then blew it forth with,—"Whew!—Hoom—poof—ha!—not know your parents, youngster?—Then I must commit you for a vagrant, I warrant you. Omne ignotum pro terribili, as we used to say at Appleton school; that is, every one that is not known to the Justice, is a rogue and a vagabond. Ha!—ay, you may sneer, sir; but I question if you would have known the meaning of that Latin unless I had told you."

I acknowledged myself obliged for a new edition of the adage, and an interpretation which I could never have reached alone and unassisted. I then proceeded to state my case with greater confidence. The Justice was an ass, that was clear; but it was scarcely possible he could be so utterly ignorant as not to know what was necessary in so plain a case as mine. I therefore informed him of the riot which had been committed on the Scottish side of the Solway Firth; explained how I came to be placed in my present situation; and requested of his worship to set me at liberty. I pleaded my cause with as much earnestness as I could, casting an eye from time to time upon the opposite party, who seemed entirely indifferent to all the animation with which I accused him.

As for the Justice, when at length I had ceased as really not knowing what more to say in a case so very plain, he replied, "Ho—ay—ay—yes—wonderful! and so this is all the gratitude you show to this good gentleman for the great charge and trouble he hath had with respect to and concerning of you?"

"He saved my life, sir, I acknowledge, on one occasion certainly, and most probably on two; but his having done so gives him no right over my person. I am not, however, asking for any punishment or revenge; on the contrary, I am content to part friends with the gentleman, whose motives I am unwilling to suppose are bad, though his actions have been, towards me, unauthorized and violent."

This moderation, Alan thou wilt comprehend, was not entirely dictated by my feelings towards the individual of whom I complained; there were other reasons, in which regard for him had little share. It seemed, however, as if the mildness with which I pleaded my cause had more effect upon him than any thing I had yet said. He was moved to the point of being almost out of countenance; and took snuff repeatedly, as if to gain time to stifle some degree of emotion.

But on Justice Foxley, on whom my eloquence was particularly designed to make impression, the result was much less favourable. He consulted in a whisper with Mr. Nicholas his clerk—pshawed, hemmed, and elevated his eyebrows, as if in scorn of my supplication. At length, having apparently made up his mind, he leaned back in his chair, and smoked his pipe with great energy, with a look of defiance, designed to make me aware that all my reasoning was lost on him.

At length, when I stopped, more from lack of breath than want of argument, he opened his oracular jaws, and made the following reply, interrupted by his usual interjectional ejaculations, and by long volumes of smoke:—"Hem—ay—eh—poof—And, youngster, do you think Matthew Foxley, who has been one of the quorum for these twenty years, is to be come over with such trash as would hardly cheat an apple-woman?—Poof—poof—eh! Why, man—eh—dost thou not know the charge is not a butable matter—and that—hum—ay—the greatest man—poof—the Baron of Graystock himself, must stand committed? and yet you pretend to have been kidnapped by this gentleman, and robbed of property, and what not; and—eh—poof—you would persuade me all you want is to get away from him?—I do believe—eh—that it is all you want. Therefore, as you are a sort of a slip-string gentleman, and—ay—hum—a kind of idle apprentice, and something cockbrained within, as the honest folk of this house tell me—why, you must even remain under custody of your guardian, till your coming of age, or my Lord Chancellor's warrant shall give you the management of your own affairs, which, if you can gather your brains again, you will even then not be—ay—hem—poof—in particular haste to assume."

The time occupied by his worship's hums, and haws, and puffs of tobacco smoke, together with the slow and pompous manner in which he spoke, gave me a minute's space to collect my ideas, dispersed as they were by the extraordinary purport of this announcement.

"I cannot conceive, sir," I replied, "by what singular tenure this person claims my obedience as a guardian; it is a barefaced imposture—I never in my life saw him, until I came unhappily to this country, about four weeks since."

"Ay, sir—we—eh—know, and are aware—that—poof—you do not like to hear some folk's names; and that—eh—you understand me—there are things, and sounds and matters, conversation about names, and such like, which puts you off the hooks—which I have no humour to witness. Nevertheless, Mr. Darsie—or—poof—Mr. Darsie Latimer—or—poof, poof—eh—ay, Mr. Darsie without the Latimer—you have acknowledged as much to-day as assures me you will best be disposed of under the honourable care of my friend here—all your confessions—besides that—poof—eh—I know him to be a most responsible person—a—hry—ay—most responsible and honourable person—Can you deny this?"

"I know nothing of him," I repeated; "not even his name; and I have not, as I told you, seen him in the course of my whole life, till a few weeks since."

"Will you swear to that?" said the singular man, who seemed to await the result of this debate, secure as a rattlesnake is of the prey which has once felt its fascination. And while he said these words in a deep under-tone, he withdrew his chair a little behind that of the Justice, so as to be unseen by him or his clerk, who sat upon the same side; while he bent on me a frown so portentous, that no one who has witnessed the look can forget it during the whole of his life. The furrows of the brow above the eyes became livid and almost black, and were bent into a semicircular, or rather elliptical form, above the junction of the eyebrows. I had heard such a look described in an old tale of diablerie, which it was my chance to be entertained with not long since; when this deep and gloomy contortion of the frontal muscles was not unaptly described, as forming the representation of a small horseshoe.

The tale, when told, awakened a dreadful vision of infancy, which the withering and blighting look now fixed on me again forced on my recollection, but with much more vivacity. Indeed I was so much surprised, and, I must add, terrified, at the vague ideas which were awakened in my mind by this fearful sign, that I kept my eyes fixed on the face in which it was exhibited as on a frightful vision; until passing his handkerchief a moment across his countenance, this mysterious man relaxed at once the look which had for me something so appalling. "The young man will no longer deny that he has seen me before," said he to the Justice, in a tone of complacency; "and I trust he will now be reconciled to my temporary guardianship, which may end better for him than he expects."

"Whatever I expect," I replied, summoning my scattered recollections together, "I see I am neither to expect justice nor protection from this gentleman, whose office it is to render both to the lieges. For you, sir, how strangely you have wrought yourself into the fate of an unhappy young man, or what interest you can pretend in me, you yourself only can explain. That I have seen you before, is certain: for none can forget the look with which you seem to have the power of blighting those upon whom you cast it."

The Justice seemed not very easy under this hint. "Ho!—ay," he said; "it is time to be going, neighbour. I have a many miles to ride, and I care not to risk darkling in these parts.—You and I, Mr. Nicholas, must be jogg'ing."

The Justice fumbled with his gloves, in endeavouring to draw them on hastily, and Mr. Nicholas bustled to get his great-coat and whip. Their landlord endeavoured to detain them, and spoke of supper and beds. Both pouring forth many thanks for his invitation, seemed as if they would much rather not; and Mr. Justice Foxley was making a score of apologies, with at least a hundred cautionary hems and eh-ehs, when the girl Dorcas burst into the room, and announced a gentleman on justice business.

"What gentleman?—and whom does he want?"

"He is come post on his ten toes," said the wench; "and on justice business to his worship loike. I see uphald him a gentleman, for he speaks as good Latin as the schulkmaster; but, lack-a-day! he has gotten a queer mop of a wig."

The gentleman, thus announced and described, bounced into the room. But I have already written as much as fills a sheet of my paper, and my singular embarrassments press so hard on me, that I have matter to fill another from what followed the intrusion of my dear Alan—your crazy client—Poor Peter Peebles!

CHAPTER VII.

I HAVE rarely in my life, till the last alarming days, known what it was to sustain a moment's real sorrow. What I called such, was, I am now well convinced, only the weariness of mind, which, having nothing actually present to complain of, turns upon itself, and becomes anxious about the past and the future; those periods with which human life has so little connexion, that Scripture itself hath said, "Sufficient for the day is the evil thereof."

If, therefore, I have sometimes abused prosperity, by murmuring at my unknown birth and uncertain rank in society, I will make amends by bearing my present and adversity with patience and courage, and, if I can, even with gayety. What can they—dare they, do to me?—Foxley, I am persuaded, is a real Justice of Peace, and country gentleman of estate, though, (wonderful to tell!) he is an ass notwithstanding; and his functionary in the drab coat must have a shrewd guess at the consequences of being accessory to an act of murder or kidnapping. Men invite not such witnesses to deeds of darkness. I have also—Alan, I have hopes, arising out of the family of the oppressor himself. I am encouraged to believe that G. M. is likely again to enter on the field. More I dare not here say; nor must I drop a hint which another eye than thine might be able to construe. Enough, my feelings are lighter than they have been; and though fear and wonder are still around me, they are unable entirely to overcloud the horizon.

Even when I saw the spectral form of the old scarecrow of the Parliament-House rush into the apartment where I had undergone so singular an examination, I thought of thy connexion with him, and could almost have parodied Lear—

"Death!—nothing could have thus subdued nature
To such a lowness, but his 'learned lawyers.'"

He was e'en as we have seen him of yore, Alan, when, rather to keep thee company than to follow my own bent, I formerly frequented the halls of justice. The only addition to his dress, in the capacity of a traveller, was a pair of boots, that seemed as if they might have seen the field of Sheriff-moor; so large and heavy, that, tied as they were to the creature's wearied hams with large bunches of worsted tape of various colours, they looked as if he had been dragging them along, either for a wager, or by way of penance.

Regardless of the surprised looks of the party on whom he thus intruded himself, Peter blundered into the middle of the apartment, with his head charged like a ram's in the act of butting, and saluted them thus:—

"Gude day to ye, gude day to your honours—Is't here they sell the fugie warrants?"

I observed that, on his entrance, my friend—or enemy—drew himself back, and placed himself as if he would rather avoid attracting the observation of the new comer. I did the same myself, as far as I was able; for I thought it likely that Mr. Peebles might recognise me, as indeed I was too frequently among the group of young juridical aspirants who used to amuse themselves by putting cases for Peter's solution, and playing him worse tricks; yet I was uncertain whether I had better avail myself of our acquaintance to have the advantage, such as it might be, of his evidence before the magistrate, or whether to make him, if possible, bearer of a letter which might procure me more effectual assistance. I resolved, therefore, to be guided by circumstances, and to watch carefully that nothing might escape me. I drew back as far as I could, and even reconnoitred the door and passage, to consider whether absolute escape might not be practicable. But there paraded Cristal Nixon, whose little black eyes, sharp as those of a basilisk, seemed, the instant when they encountered mine, to penetrate my purpose.

I sat down, as much out of sight of all parties as I could, and listened to the dialogue which followed—a dialogue how much more interesting to me than any I could have conceived, in which Peter Peebles was to be one of the Dramatis Personæ!

"Is it here where ye sell the warrants?—the fugies, ye ken?" said Peter.

"Hey—eh—what!" said Justice Foxley; "what the devil does the fellow mean?—What would you have a warrant for?"

"It is to apprehend a young lawyer that is in meditatione fugæ; for he has ta'en my memorial and pleaded my cause, and a good fee I gave him, and as muckle brandy as he could drink that day at his father's house—he loes the brandy ower weel for sae youthful a creature."

"And what has this drunken young dog of a lawyer done to you, that you are come to me—eh—ha? Has he robbed you? Not unlikely, if he be a lawyer—eh—Nick—ha?" said Justice Foxley.

"He has robbed me of himself, sir," answered Peter; "of his help, comfort, aid, maintenance, and assistance, whilk, as a counsel to a client, he is bound to yield me ratione officii—that is it, ye see. He has pouched my fee, and drucken a mutch! and now he's ower the march, and I half won half lost—as dead a heat a ower the back-sands. Now, I was ad-cunning laddies that are used to crack me in the House, that the best thing I to take heart o' grace and set out after I taken post on my ain shanks, forby a ca the like. I got wind of him in Dumfri have run him ower to the English side fugie warrant against him."

How did my heart throb at this information! Thou art near me then, an with what kind purpose; thou hast ab fly to my assistance; and no wonder thy friendship and faith, thy sound sag severing disposition, "my bosom's lo sit lightly on his throne;" that gayety involuntarily hover on my pen; and should beat like that of a general, res drums of his advancing ally, without a battle must have been lost.

I did not suffer myself to be startled surprise, but continued to bend my stri to what followed among this singula Poor Peter Peebles had been put upon chase, by some of his juvenile advisers ment House, he himself had intimated with much confidence, and the Justice to have some secret apprehension of trouble in the matter, and, as sometin the English frontier, a jealousy lest the ness of their northern neighbours mi their own simplicity, turned to his cle plexed countenance.

"Eh—oh—Nick—d—n thee—Hast thing to say? This is more Scots law, more Scotsmen." (Here he cast a side owner of the mansion, and winked to h would Solway were as deep as it is wide then some chance of keeping of them o

Nicholas conversed an instant aside plicant, and then reported;—

"The man wants a border-warrant, they are only granted for debt—now he catch a lawyer."

"And what for no?" answered P doggedly; "what for no, I would be If a day-labourer refuses to work, y warrant to gar him do out his daurg- quean rin away from her hairst, ye'll se to her heuk again—if sae mickle as a salter make a moonlight flitting, ye w by the back-spaul in a minute of tur the damage canna amount to mair the of coals, and a forpit or twa of saut; an chield taks leg from his engagement, a me to the tune of sax thousand pun that is, three thousand that I should wi thousand mair that I am like to los; a ca' yoursell a justice canna help a poor the rinaway? "The fellow must be drunk," said the

"I winna refuse your neighbourly offer Peter Peebles, making his bow; "muck wi' your honour, and wisdom to gude ye traordinary cause."

When I saw Peter Peebles about to re room, I could not forbear an effort to obta such evidence as might give me some cr Justice. I stepped forward, therefore, a him, asked him if he remembered me?"

for a stove or two, and a long stack of snuff, religion seemed suddenly to dawn on Peter Peebles. "What ye say?" he said; "by my troth do I—Haud a grip, gentleman!—constable, keep him fast!—that ill-deedy herry in, ye are sure that Alan and is not far off—Haud him fast, Master Constable! I charge ye wi' him, for I am mair on if he is the bottom of this runaway business. He was etting the mally callant Alan awa wi' yon, and the like of that, to Rousin, and Prestonspean, the idle gates he could think of. He's a runaway-apprentice, that one."

"Peebles," I said, "do not do me wrong. I am on can say no harm of me justly, but can satisfy gentlemen, if you will, that I am a student of Edinburgh—Darius Latimer by name."

"I satisfy! how can I satisfy the gentlemen," cried Peter, "that am far from being satisfied? I ken naething about your name, and can satisfy, wad need in reason."

"pretty witness you have brought forward in favour," said Mr. Foxley. "But—ha—ay—I'll an a question or two. —Pray, friend, will you take oath to this youth being a runaway apprentice?"

"I will make oath to ony thing in n; when a case comes to my oath it's a won; But I am in some haste to give your worship's cheer;" for Peter had become much more real in his demeanour towards the Justice, since he heard some intimation of dinner.

"ou shall have—eh—hum—ay—a bellyful, if it be do to fill it. First let me know if this young be really what he pretends.—Nick, make him sit."

"he is just a wud harum-scarum creature, that never take to his studies; daft, or, clean daft," said the Justice; "what d'ye mean by eh?"

"not Ffish," replied Peter; "woud—a wee bit by not-Nook or no; it's a common case—the too if the world thinks the ither daft. I have met folk in my day, that thought I was daft myself; for my part, I think our Court of Session clean that have had the great cause of Peebles against stanes before them for the score of years, and never been able to ding the bottom out of it."

"cannot make out a word of his cursed bragg," said the Justice; "can you, neighbour—eh? I can be mean by daft?"

"he means mad," said the party appealed to, "as off his guard by impotence of this protracted union."

"e have it—ye have it," said Peter; "that is, not shure, but—"

"so he stopped, and fixed his eye on the person he said with an air of joyful recognition. "Ay, ay, ferries of Burrenswark, is this your unaid in and bone? I thought ye had been hanged at ington Common, or Hamlet, or some of these, after the bonny ploy ye made in the forty-

"Believe you are mistaken, friend," said Herries, by, with whose name and designation I was thus unexpectedly acquainted.

"he dril a bit," answered the undaunted Peter, "I mind ye weel, for ye lodged in my house that year of forty-five, for a great year it was; Grand Rebellion broke out, and my cause—the cause—Peebles against Plainstones, at per con—was called in the beginning of the winter Season would have been heard, but that there was 'cease of justice, with your plans, and your ill, and your conscience."

"tell you, fellow," said Herries, yet more fiercely, "I have confused me with some of the other fur-e of your crazy pate."

"speak like a gentleman, sir," answered Peebles; "we are not legal phrases, Mr. Herries of Burren-i. Speak in form of law, or I shall bid ye guide air. I have nae pleasure in speaking to proud though I am willing to answer ony thing in a way; so if you are for a crack about said lang-, and the others that you and Captain Redgimist used to breed in my house, and the girded snuff of brandy that ye drank and no'er thought of paying for it, (not that I minded it much in those days, though I have felt a lack of it since,) why I will waste an hour on ye at ony time.—And where is Captain Redgimist now? he was a wud chap, like yourself, though they are nae one here after you poor bodies for these some years bygone; the heading and hanging is wud over now—awful job—awful job—will ye try my smocking?"

He concluded his desultory speech by thrusting out his large bony paw, filled with a Scotch snuff of huge dimensions, which Herries, who had been standing like one petrified by the assurance of this unexpected address, rejected with a contemptuous motion of his hand, which spilled some of the contents of the box.

"Awed, awed," said Peter Peebles, totally un-ashamed by the repulse, "e'en as ye like, a wifful man mean has his way; but," he added, stooping down, and endeavouring to gather the spilt snuff from the polished floor, "I canna afford to lose my smocking for a' that ye are gumpie-frusted wi' me."

My attention had been keenly awakened, during this extraordinary and unexpected scene. I watched, with as much attention as my own agitation permitted me to command, the effect produced on the parties concerned. It was evident that our friend, Peter Peebles, had unwarily let out something which altered the sentiments of Justice Foxley and his clerk towards Mr. Herries, with whom, until he was known and acknowledged under that name, they had appeared to be so intimate. They talked with each other aside, looked at a paper or two which the clerk selected from the contents of a huge black pocketbook and mused under the influence of fear and uncertainty, totally at a loss what line of conduct to adopt.

Herries made a different and a far more interesting figure. However little Peter Peebles might resemble the angel Ishrael, the appearance of Herries, his high and scornful demeanour, vexed at what seemed dejection, yet fearless of the consequences, and regarding the whispering magistrate and his clerk with looks in which contempt predominated over anger or anxiety, bore, in my opinion, no slight resemblance to —"the royal part And fitted splendour war"

with which the poet has revealed the detested King of the Powers of the Air.

As he glanced round, with a look which he had endeavoured to compose to haughty indifference, his eye encountered mine, and, I thought, at the first glance sank beneath it. But he instantly rallied his natural spirit, and returned me one of those extraordinary looks, by which he could contort so strangely the wrinkles on his forehead. I started; but, angry at myself for my pusillanimity, I answered him by a look of the same kind, and, catching the reflection of my countenance in a large antique mirror which stood before me, I started again at the real or imaginary resemblance which my countenance, at that moment, bore to that of Herries. Surely my fate is somehow strangely interwoven with that of this mysterious individual. I had no time at present to speculate upon the subject, for the subsequent conversation demanded all my attention.

The Justice addressed Herries, after a pause of about five minutes, in which all parties seemed at some loss how to proceed. He spoke with embarrassment, and his faltering voice, and the long intervals which divided his sentences, seemed to indicate fear of him whom he addressed.

"Neighbour," he said, "I could not have thought this; or, if I—eh—did think—in a corner of my own mind as it were—that you, I say—that you might have unluckily engaged in—eh—the matter of the forty-five—there was still time to have forgot all that."

"And is it so singular that a man should have been out in the forty-five?" said Herries, with contemptuous composure;—"your father, I think, Mr. Foxley, was out with Derwentwater in the fifteen."

"And lost half of his estate," answered Foxley, with more rapidity than usual; "and was very near—hem—being hanged into the boot. But this is—another guess job—for—eh—fifteen is not forty-five; and my father had a remission, and you, I take it, have not."

"Perhaps I have," said Herries, indifferently; "or, if I have not, I am but in the case of half a dozen others whom government do not think worth looking after at this time of day, so they give no offence or disturbance."

"But you have given both, sir," said Nicholas Faggot, the clerk, who, having some petty provincial situation, as I have since understood, deemed himself bound to be zealous for government. "Mr. Justice Foxley cannot be answerable for letting you pass free, now your name and surname have been spoken plainly out. There are warrants out against you from the Secretary of State's office."

"A proper allegation, Mr. Attorney! that, at the distance of so many years, the Secretary of State should trouble himself about the unfortunate relics of a ruined cause!" answered Mr. Herries.

"But if it be so," said the clerk, who seemed to assume more confidence upon the composure of Herries's demeanour; "and if cause has been given by the conduct of a gentleman himself, who hath been, it is alleged, raking up old matters, and mixing them with new subjects of disaffection—I say, if it be so, I should advise the party, in his wisdom, to surrender himself quietly into the lawful custody of the next Justice of Peace—Mr. Foxley, suppose—where, and by whom, the matter should be regularly inquired into. I am only putting a case," he added, watching with apprehension the effect which his words were likely to produce upon the party to whom they were addressed.

"And were I to receive such advice," said Herries, with the same composure as before—"putting the case, as you say, Mr. Faggot—I should request to see the warrant which countenanced such a scandalous proceeding."

Mr. Nicholas, by way of answer, placed in his hand a paper, and seemed anxiously to expect the consequences which were to ensue. Mr. Herries looked it over with the same equanimity as before, and then continued, "And were such a scrawl as this presented to me in my own house, I would throw it into the chimney, and Mr. Faggot upon the top of it."

Accordingly, seconding the word with the action, he flung the warrant into the fire with one hand, and fixed the other, with a stern and irresistible gripe, on the breast of the attorney, who, totally unable to contend with him, in either personal strength or mental energy, trembled like a chicken in the raven's clutch. He got off, however, for the fright; for Herries, having probably made him fully sensible of the strength of his grasp, released him with a scornful laugh.

"Deforcement—spulzie—stouthrief—masterful rescue!" exclaimed Peter Peebles, scandalized at the resistance offered to the law in the person of Nicholas Faggot. But his shrill exclamations were drowned in the thundering voice of Herries, who, calling upon Cristal Nixon, ordered him to take the bawling fool down stairs, fill his belly, and then give him a guinea, and thrust him out of doors. Under such injunctions, Peter easily suffered himself to be withdrawn from the scene.

Herries then turned to the Justice, whose visage, wholly abandoned by the rubicund hue which so lately beamed upon it, hung out the same pale livery as that of his dismayed clerk. "Old friend and acquaintance," he said, "you came here at my request, on a friendly errand, to convince this silly young man of the right which I have over his person for the present. I trust you do not intend to make your visit the pretext of disquieting me about other matters? All the world knows that I have been living at large, in these northern counties, for some months, not to say years, and might have been apprehended at any time, had the necessities of the state required, or my own behaviour deserved it. But no English magistrate has been ungenerous enough to trouble a gentleman under misfortune, on account of political opinions and disputes, which have been long ended by the success of the reigning powers. I trust, my good friend, you will not endanger yourself, by taking any other view of the subject than you have done ever since we were acquainted?"

The Justice answered with more readiness, as well as more spirit than usual, "Neighbour Ingoldsby—what you say—is—eh—in some sort true; and when you were coming and going at markets, horse-races, and cock-fights, fairs, hunts, and such like—it was—eh—neither my business nor my wish to dispel—I say—to inquire into and dispel the mysteries which hung about you; for while you were a good companion in the field, and over a bottle now and then—I did not—eh—think it necessary to ask—into your private affairs. And if I thought you were—ahem—somewhat unfortunate in former undertakings, and enterprises, and connexions, which might cause you to live unsettledly and more private, I could have—eh—very little pleasure—to aggravate your case by interfering, or requiring explanations, which are often more easily asked than given. But when there are warrants and witnesses to names—and those names, christian and surname, belong to—eh—an attainted person—charged—I trust falsely—with—ahem—taking advantage of modern broils and heart-burnings to re-new our civil disturbances, the case is altered; and I must—ahem—do my duty."

The Justice got on his feet as he concluded his speech, and looked as bold as he could. I drew close beside him and his clerk, Mr. Faggot, thinking the moment favourable for my own liberation, and intimated to Mr. Foxley my determination to stand by him. But Mr. Herries only laughed at the menacing posture which we assumed. "My good neighbour," said he, "you talk of a witness—Is yon crazy beggar a fit witness in an affair of this nature?"

"But you do not deny that you are Mr. Herries of Birrenswort, mentioned in the Secretary of State's warrant?" said Mr. Foxley.

"How can I deny or own any thing about it?" said Herries, with a sneer. "There is no such warrant in existence now; its ashes, like the poor wretch whose doom it threatened, have been dispersed to the four winds of heaven. There is now no warrant in the world."

"But you will not deny," said the Justice, "that you were the person named in it; and that—eh—you own act destroyed it?"

"I will neither deny my name nor my actions, Justice," replied Mr. Herries, "when called upon by competent authority to avow or defend them. But I will resist all impertinent attempts either to intrude into my private motives, or to control my person. I am quite well prepared to do so; and I trust that you, my good neighbour and brother sportsman, in your expostulation, and my friend Mr. Nicholas Faggot here, in his humble advice and petition that I should surrender myself, will consider yourselves as having amply discharged your duty to King George and Government."

The cold and ironical tone in which he made this declaration; the look and attitude, so nobly expressive of absolute confidence in his own superior strength and energy, seemed to complete the indecision which had already shown itself on the side of those whom he addressed.

The Justice looked to the Clerk—the Clerk to the Justice; the former ha'd, eh'd, without bringing forth an articulate syllable; the latter only said, "As the warrant is destroyed, Mr. Justice, I presume you do not mean to proceed with the arrest?"

"Hum—ay—why no—Nicholas—it would not be quite advisable—and as the Forty-five was an old affair—and—hem—as my friend here will, I hope, at his error—that is, if he has not seen it already—and renounce the Pope, the Devil, and the Pretender—I mean no harm, neighbour—I think we—as we have no posse, or constables, or the like—should order our horses—and, in one word, look the matter over."

"Judiciously resolved," said the person whom this disturbed; "but before you go, I trust you will be friends?"

"said the Justice, rubbing his brow, "our men—here—rather a thirsty one." "said Nixon," and Mr. Herries, "let us have a and instantly large enough to quench the whole communion."

Cristal was absent on this grand errand, a pause, of which I endeavoured to avail myself by bringing back the discourse to my own

"But I said to Justice Foxley, "I have business with your late discussion with Mr. Herries just then far—You leave me, a loyal King George, an unwilling prisoner in the person whom you have reason to believe to be the King's cause. I humbly submit that it is your duty as a magistrate, and that to make Mr. Herries aware of the illegality of his proceedings, and take steps for my removal, either spot or, at least, as soon as possible after left this case."

"I would remember you are under the power, the law—them of your guardian."

He himself so, indeed, I replied, "but he has no evidence to establish so absurd a claim, and had, his circumstances, as an attacked person from parson, would void such a right. I do therefore desire you, Mr. Justice, his clerk to consider my situation, and of his at your peril."

"is a young fellow now," said the Justice, h embarrassed looks, "thinks that I carry statute law of England in my head and a statue to enforce them in my pocket? Why, I would my interference do!—but—hum—I speak to your guardian in your favour."

Mr. Herries said, and seemed indeed to throw upon him with much earnestness, as such a species of interference was all the circumstances, I was entitled to expect was enough to study the effusion of the Justice, while the Justice was engaged in the tedious ceremony of taking leave. That argument was less ceremonious, but I suspect a bevy of empty compliments passed between Mr. Herries, for I remarked that the latter passed a piece of paper into the hand of the former, which perhaps be a little statement for the with which he had burnt the warrant, and no gentle hand on the respectable mission of whom it was exhibited, and I observed with this proposition in such a manner as to from the worthy clerk's principal.

When this was arranged, the party took leave of each other, with much formality on the part of Justice Foxley, amongst whose adieu the following phrase was chiefly remarkable—"I presume you do not intend to stay long in these parts?"

"Not for the present, Justice, you may be sure; here are good reasons to the contrary. But I have no doubt of arranging my affairs, so that we shall speedily have sport together again."

He went to wait upon the Justice to the court-yard, and, as he did so, commanded Cristal Nixon to go, but I returned into my apartment. Knowing it would be to no purpose to resist or tamper with that stubborn functionary, I abeyed in silence, and was once more a prisoner in my former quarters.

CHAPTER VIII.

LATIMER'S JOURNAL IN CONTINUATION.

I spent more than an hour, after returning to the apartment which I may call my prison, in redrawing the singular circumstances which I had just witnessed. Methought I could now form some guess at the character of Mr. Herries, upon whose name and situation the late scene had thrown considerable light, one of those fanatical Jacobites, doubtless, whose error, not twenty years since, had shaken the British throne, and some of whom, though their party daily diminished in numbers, energy and were retained still an inclination to renew the attempt they had found so desperate. He was indeed perfectly different from the sort of malicious Jacobites whom it had been my luck hitherto to meet with. Old ladies of tawny over their hyson, and gray haired aunts over their punch. I had often heard utter a bold fearless treason, while the former remembered having led down a dance with the Chevalier and the latter recounted the feats they had performed at Preston, Clifton, and Falkirk.

The disaffection of such persons was too unimportant to excite the attention of government. I had heard however, that there still existed partisans of the Stewart family, of a more daring and dangerous description, men who, furnished with gold from Rome, moved secretly and in disguise, through the various classes of society, and endeavoured to keep alive the expiring zeal of their party.

I had no difficulty in assigning an important post among this class of persons, whose agency and execution are only doubted by those who look on the surface of things, to this Mr. Herries, whose mental energies, as well as his personal strength and activity, seemed to qualify him well to act so dangerous a part; and I knew that, all along the Western Border, both in England and Scotland, there are so many Nonjurors, that such a person may reside there with absolute safety, unless it becomes, in a very especial degree, the object of the government to secure his person; and which purpose, even then, might be disappointed by early intelligence, or as in the case of Mr. Foxley by the unwillingness of provincial magistrates to interfere in what is now considered an unavailing pursuit of the unfortunate.

There have, however, been rumours lately, as if the present state of the nation or at least of some disaffected provinces, agitated by a variety of causes, but particularly by the unpopularity of the present administration, may soon in this species of agitation a favourable period for recommencing their intrigues; while, on the other hand, government may not, at such a crisis, be inclined to look upon them with the contempt which a few years ago would have been their most appropriate punishment.

That men should be found rash enough to throw away their service and live in a desperate cause, is nothing new in history which abounds with instances of similar devotion—that Mr. Herries is such an enthusiast is no less evident, but all this explains not his conduct towards me. Had he sought to make me a proselyte to his ruined cause, violence and compulsion were arguments very unlikely to prevail with any generous spirit. But even if such were his object, of what use to him could be the acquisition of a single reluctant partisan, who could bring only his own person to support any quarrel which he might adopt? He had claimed over me the rights of a guardian; he had more than hinted that I was in a state of mind which could not dispense with the authority of such a person. Was this man, so sternly desperate in his purpose,—he who seemed willing to take on his own shoulders the entire support of a cause which had been ruinous to thousands,—was he the person that had the power of deciding on my fate? Was it from him those dangers flowed, to secure me against which I had been educated under such circumstances of secrecy and precaution?

And if this was so, of what nature was the claim which he asserted?—Was it that of propinquity?—And did I share the blood, perhaps the features, of this singular being?—Strange as it may seem, a thrill of awe, which shot across my mind at that instant, was not unmingled with a wild and mysterious feeling of wonder, almost amounting to pleasure. I remembered the reflection of my own face in the mirror at one striking moment during the singular interview of the day, and I hastened to the outward apartment to consult a glass which hung there, whether it were possible for my countenance to be again contorted into the peculiar frown which so much resembled the terrific look of Herries. But I folded my brows in vain into a thousand complicated wrinkles, and I was obliged to conclude, either that the supposed mark on my brow was altogether imaginary, or that it could not be called forth by voluntary effort; or, in fine, what seemed most likely, that it was such a resemblance as the imagination traces in the embers of a wood fire, or among the varied veins of marble, distinct at one time, and obscure or invisible at another, according as the combination of lines strikes the eye, or impresses the fancy.

While I was moulding my visage like a mad player, the door suddenly opened, and the girl of the house entered. Angry and ashamed at being detected in my singular occupation, I turned round sharply, and, I suppose, chance produced the change on my features which I had been in vain labouring to call forth.

The girl started back, with her "Don't ye look so now—don't ye, for love's sake—you be as like the ould Squire as—But here a comes," said she, huddling away out of the room; "and if you want a third, there is none but ould Harry, as I know of, that can match ye for a brent broo!"

As the girl muttered this exclamation, and hastened out of the room, Herries entered. He stopped on observing that I had looked again to the mirror; anxious to trace the look by which the wench had undoubtedly been terrified. He seemed to guess what was passing in my mind, for, as I turned towards him, he observed, "Doubt not that it is stamped on your forehead—the fatal mark of our race; though it is not now so apparent as it will become when age and sorrow, and the traces of stormy passions, and of bitter penitence, shall have drawn their furrows on your brow."

"Mysterious man," I replied, "I know not of what you speak; your language is as dark as your purposes."

"Sit down, then," he said, "and listen; thus far, at least, must the veil of which you complain be raised. When withdrawn, it will only display guilt and sorrow—guilt, followed by strange penalty, and sorrow, which Providence has entailed upon the posterity of the mourners."

He paused a moment, and commenced his narrative, which he told with the air of one, who, remote as the events were which he recited, took still the deepest interest in them. The tone of his voice, which I have already described as rich and powerful, aided by its inflections the effects of his story, which I will endeavour to write down, as nearly as possible, in the very words which he used.

"It was not of late years that the English nation learned, that their best chance of conquering their independent neighbours must be by introducing amongst them division and civil war. You need not be reminded of the state of thralldom to which Scotland was reduced by the unhappy wars betwixt the domestic factions of Bruce and Baliol; nor how, after Scotland had been emancipated from a foreign yoke, by the conduct and valour of the immortal Bruce, the whole fruits of the triumphs of Bannockburn were lost in the dreadful defeats of Dupplin and Halidon; and Edward Baliol, the minion and feudatory of his namesake of England, seemed, for a brief season, in safe and uncontested possession of the throne, so lately occupied by the greatest general and wisest prince in Europe. But the experience of Bruce had not died with him. There were many who had shared his martial labours, and all remembered the successful efforts by which, under circumstances as disadvantageous as those of his son, he had achieved the liberation of Scotland.

"The usurper, Edward Baliol, was feasting with a few of his favourite retainers in the Castle of Annon, when he was suddenly surprised by a chosen band of insurgent patriots. Their chiefs were, Douglas, Randolph, the young Earl of Moray, and Sir Simon Fraser; and their success was so complete, that Baliol was obliged to fly for his life, scarcely clothed, and on a horse which there was no leisure to saddle. It was of importance to seize his person, if possible, and his flight was closely pursued by a valiant knight of Norman descent, whose family had been long settled in the marches of Dumfries-shire. Their Norman appellation was Fitz-Aldin, but this knight, from the great slaughter which he had made of the Southrons, and the reluctance which he had shown to admit them to quarter during the former wars of that bloody period, had acquired the name of Redgauntlet, which he transmitted to his posterity."

"Redgauntlet!" I involuntarily repeated.

"Yes, Redgauntlet," said my alleged guardian looking at me keenly; "does that name recall any associations to your mind?"

"No," I replied, "except that I lately heard it given to the hero of a supernatural legend."

"There are many such current concerning the family," he answered; and then proceeded in his narrative.

"Alberick Redgauntlet, the first of his house so termed, was, as may be supposed from his name, of a stern and implacable disposition, which had been rendered more so by family discord. An only son, now a youth of eighteen, shared so much the haughty spirit of his father, that he became impatient of domestic control, resisted paternal authority, and finally fled from his father's house, renounced his political opinions, and awakened his mortal displeasure by joining the adherents of Baliol. It was said that his father cursed in his wrath his degenerate offspring, and swore that, if they met, he should perish by his hand. Mean time, circumstances seemed to promise atonement for this great deprivation. The lady of Alberick Redgauntlet was again, after many years, in a situation which afforded her husband the hope of a more dutiful heir.

"But the delicacy and deep interest of his wife's condition did not prevent Alberick from engaging in the undertaking of Douglas and Moray. He had been the most forward in the attack of the castle, and was now foremost in the pursuit of Baliol, eagerly engaged in dispersing or cutting down the few daring followers who endeavoured to protect the usurper in his flight.

"As these were successively routed or slain, the formidable Redgauntlet, the mortal enemy of the House of Baliol, was within two lances' length of the fugitive Edward Baliol, in a narrow pass, when a youth, one of the last who attended the usurper in his flight, threw himself between them, received the shock of the pursuer, and was unhorsed and overthrown. The helmet rolled from his head, and the beams of the sun, then rising over the Solway, showed Redgauntlet the features of his disobedient son, in the livery, and wearing the cognizance, of the usurper.

"Redgauntlet beheld his son lying before his horse's feet; but he also saw Baliol, the usurper of the Scottish crown, still, as it seemed, within his grasp, and separated from him only by the prostrate body of his overthrown adherent. Without pausing to inquire whether young Edward was wounded, he dashed his spear into his horse, meaning to leap over him, but was unhappily frustrated in his purpose. The sword made indeed a bound forward, but was unable to clear the body of the youth, and with its hand lost struck him in the forehead, as he was in the act of rising. The blow was mortal. It is needless to add, that the pursuit was checked, and Edward escaped.

"Redgauntlet, furious as he is described, was yet overwhelmed with the thoughts of the crime he had committed. When he returned to his castle, it was to encounter new domestic sorrows. His wife had been prematurely seized with the pangs of labour upon hearing the dreadful catastrophe which had taken place. The birth of an infant boy cost her her life. Redgauntlet sat by her corpse for more than twenty-four hours without changing either feature or posture, so far as his terrible distresses could observe. The Abbot of Dunblane preached consolation to him in vain. Douglas, who came to visit in his affliction a father of such a or agonised soul, was quite successful in raising his attention. He caused the trumpets to sound on English point of war in the court-yard, and Redgauntlet at once sprung to his arms, and seemed restored to the recollection, which had been lost in the event of his misery.

"From that moment whatever he might feel inwardly, he gave way to no outward emotion. Douglas caused his infant to be brought, but even the iron-hearted soldiers were struck with horror to observe, that by the mysterious law of nature, the hour of his mother's death, and the evidence of his father's guilt, was stamped on the innocent face of the babe, whose brow was distinctly marked by the miniature resemblance of a horseshoe. Redgauntlet himself pointed it out to Douglas, saying, with a ghastly smile, 'It should have been doubly.'

"Moved, as he was, to compassion for his brother-in-law, and excited against all softer feelings by the habits of evil war, Douglas shuddered at this sight, and displayed a desire to leave the house which was doomed to be the scene of such horrors. As he was parting, however, he exhorted Albrecht Redgauntlet to make a pilgrimage to Saint Ninian's of Whitburn, then esteemed a shrine of great sanctity, and departed with a precipitation, which might have appeared, had that been possible, the fearful state of his unhappy friend. But that seems to have been incapable of admitting any addition. Sir Albrecht found the bodies of his slaughtered son and the mother to be laid side by side in the ancient chapel of his house, after he had used the skill of a celebrated surgeon of that time to embalm them, and it was said, that for many weeks he spent some hours nightly in the vault where they rested.

"At length he undertook the proposed pilgrimage to Whitburn, where he confessed himself for the first time since his misfortune, and was observed by an aged monk, who afterwards died in the odour of sanctity. It is said, that it was then foretold to the Redgauntlet, that on account of his unshaken patriotism, his family should continue to be powerful amid the changes of future times; but that, in destruction of his unbroken and cruelty to his own soul, Heaven had decreed that the value of his race should always be fraction, and that the cause which they espoused should never prosper.

"Submitting to such penance as was there imposed, Sir Albrecht went, as a thought, on a pilgrimage either to Rome, or to the Holy Sepulchre itself. He was universally considered as dead, and it was not till thirteen years afterwards, that, in the great battle of Durham, fought between David Bruce and Queen Philippa of England, a knight, bearing a horseshoe for his crest, appeared in the van of the Scottish army, distinguished himself by his reckless and desperate valour, who being at length overpowered and slain, was finally discovered to be the brave and unhappy Sir Albrecht Redgauntlet.

"And has the fatal sign," said I, when Herron had ended his narrative, "descended on all the posterity of this unhappy house?"

"It has been handed down from ancestor, and is still believed," said Herron. "But perhaps there is in the popular evidence, something of that story which creates what it sees. Certainly no other family have purchased by a debt the name of Redgauntlet as marks a singular adventure of the kind, which is derived from the son of Albrecht, the brother to the unfortunate Edward, who is supposed in an obscure manner. It is said, that he had been a fair upon the shores of Redgauntlet, which has been on the landing, and a series of cruel broils which have divided the rights of Scotland, from David Bruce's death, to the late valiant and unsuccessful attempt of the English Charles Edward."

"He concluded with a deep sigh, as one whom the subject had involved in a train of painful reflection.

"And am I then," I exclaimed, "descended from this unhappy race?"—Do you not belong to it?—And if so, why do I sustain restraint and hard usage at the hands of a relation?"

"Inquire no farther for the present," he said. "The line of conduct which I am pursuing towards you, is dictated not by choice but by necessity. You were withdrawn from the bosom of your family, and the care of your legal guardian, by the unwary and ignorance of a distant mother, who was incapable of estimating the arguments of feelings of those who pay for honour and principle to fortune and even to life. The young hawk, accustomed only to the fostering care of its dam, must be tamed by darkness and sleeplessness, ere it is trusted on the wing for the purposes of the labourer."

"I was appalled at this declaration, which seemed to threaten a long continuance, and a dangerous termination of my captivity. I dreamed it soon, however, to show some spirit, and at the same time to mingle a tone of calm, stern. "Mr. Herron, I said, "if I call you right by that name, let us speak upon this matter without the taint of mystery and fear in which you seem inclined to envelope it. I have been long, alas! deprived of the care of that affectionate mother to whom you allude—long under the charge of strangers—and compelled to form my own resolutions upon the reasoning of my own mind. Misfortune—early deprivation—has given me the privilege of sitting for myself, and constraint shall not deprive me of an Englishman's best privilege."

"The true cost of the day," said Herron, in a tone of scorn. "The privilege of free action belongs to no mortal—we are laid down by the fetters of duty—our moral path is limited by the regulations of honour—our most indifferent actions are but members of the web of destiny by which we are all surrounded."

He paced the room rapidly, and proceeded in a tone of enthusiasm which, joined to some other parts of his conduct, seems to animate an over-zealous imagination, were it not contradicted by the general tenor of his speech and conduct.

"Nothing," he said, in an earnest yet melancholy voice, "nothing is the work of chance—nothing is the consequence of free will—the liberty of which the Englishman boasts, gives an ill-represented freedom to its owner as the despotism of an Eastern Sultan permits to his slave. The usurper, William of Norway, went forth to hunt, and thought, doubtless, that it was by an act of his own royal pleasure that the horse of his murdered victim was prepared for his bloody sport. But Heaven had other views, and before the sun was high, a stumble of that very animal over an obstacle so considerable as a man-hill, cost the thoughtless ruler his life and his usurped crown. Do you think an inclination of the rein could have avoided that trifling impediment? I tell you, it created his way as inevitably as all the long chain of Causation could have done. You young men, in danger and suffering, we play but the part allotted by Destiny—the manager of this strange drama, stands bound to get no more than is prescribed, to say no more than is set down for us, and yet we mouth about free will and freedom of thought and action, as if Richard must not die, or Richmond conquer, exactly where the Author has decreed it shall be so."

with folded arms and downcast looks; and the sound of his steps and tone of his voice brought to my remembrance, that I had heard this singular person, when I met him on a former occasion, uttering such soliloquies in his solitary chamber. I observed, that, like other Jacobites, in his inveteracy against the memory of King William, he had adopted the party opinion, that the monarch, on the day he had his fatal accident, rode upon a horse once the property of the unfortunate Sir John Friend, executed for High Treason in 1696.

It was not my business to aggravate, but, if possible, rather to soothe him in whose power I was so singularly placed. When I conceived that the keenness of his feelings had in some degree subsided, I answered him as follows:—"I will not—indeed I feel myself incompetent to argue a question of such metaphysical subtlety, as that which involves the limits betwixt free-will and predestination. Let us hope we may live honestly and die hopefully, without being obliged to form a decided opinion upon a point so far beyond our comprehension."

"Wisely resolved," he interrupted, with a sneer—"there came a note from some Geneva sermon."

"But," I proceeded, "I call your attention to the fact, that I, as well as you, am acted upon by impulses, the result either of my own free-will, or the consequences of the part which is assigned to me by destiny. These may be—nay, at present they are—in direct contradiction to those by which you are actuated; and how shall we decide which shall have precedence?—You perhaps feel yourself destined to act as my jailer. I feel myself, on the contrary, destined to attempt and effect my escape. One of us must be wrong, but who can say which errs till the event has decided betwixt us?"

"I shall feel myself destined to have recourse to severe modes of restraint," said he, in the same tone of half jest, half earnest, which I had used.

"In that case," I answered, "it will be my destiny to attempt every thing for my freedom."

"And it may be mine, young man," he replied, in a deep and stern tone, "to take care that you should rather die than attain your purpose."

This was speaking out indeed, and I did not allow him to go unanswered. "You threaten me in vain," said I; "the laws of my country will protect me; or whom they cannot protect, they will avenge."

I spoke this firmly, and he seemed for a moment silenced; and the scorn with which he at last answered me, had something of affectation in it.

"The laws!" he said; "and what, stripling, do you know of the laws of your country?—Could you learn jurisprudence under a base born blotter of parchment, such as Saunders Fairford; or from the empty pedantic coxcomb, his son, who now, forsooth, writes himself advocate?—When Scotland was herself, and had her own King and Legislature, such plebeian cubs, instead of being called to the bar of her Supreme Courts, would scarce have been admitted to the honour of bearing a sheepskin process-bag."

Alan, I could not bear this, but answered indignantly, that he knew not the worth and honour from which he was detracting.

"I know as much of these Fairfords as I do of you," he replied.

"As much," said I, "and as little; for you can neither estimate their real worth nor mine. I know you saw them when last in Edinburgh."

"Ha!" he exclaimed, and turned on me an inquisitive look.

"It is true," said I; "you cannot deny it; and having thus shown you that I know something of your motions, let me warn you I have modes of communication with which you are not acquainted. Oblige me not to use them to your prejudice."

"Prejudice me!" he replied. "Young man, I smile at, and forgive your folly. Nay, I will tell you that of which you are not aware, namely, that it was from letters received from these Fairfords that I first suspected, what the result of my visit to them confirmed, that you were the person whom I had sought for years."

"If you learned this," said I, "from the papers which were about my person on the night when I was under the necessity of becoming your guest at Brokenburn, I do not envy your indifference to the means of acquiring information. It was dishonourable to"—

"Peace, young man," said Herries, more calmly than I might have expected; "the word dishonour must not be mentioned as in conjunction with my name. Your pocketbook was in the pocket of your coat, and did not escape the curiosity of another, though it would have been sacred from mine. My servant, Cristal Nixon, brought me the intelligence after you were gone. I was displeased with the manner in which he had acquired his information; but it was not the less my duty to ascertain its truth, and for that purpose I went to Edinburgh. I was in hopes to persuade Mr. Fairford to have entered into my views; but I found him too much prejudiced to permit me to trust him. He is a wretched, yet a timid slave of the present government, under which our unhappy country is dishonourably enthralled; and I would have been altogether unfit and unsafe to have intrusted him with the secret either of the right which I possess to direct your actions, or of the manner in which I purpose to exercise it."

I was determined to take advantage of his communicative humour, and obtain, if possible, more light upon his purpose. He seemed most accessible to being piqued on the point of honour, and I resolved to avail myself, but with caution, of his sensibility upon that topic. "You say," I replied, "that you are not friendly to indirect practices, and disapprove of the means by which your domestic obtained information of my name and quality—Is it honourable to avail yourself of that knowledge which is dishonourably obtained?"

"It is boldly asked," he replied; "but, within certain necessary limits, I dislike not boldness of exposition. You have, in this short conference, displayed more character and energy than I was prepared to expect. You will, I trust, resemble a forest plant, which has indeed, by some accident, been brought up in the greenhouse, and thus rendered delicate and effeminate, but which regains its native firmness and tenacity, when exposed for a season to the winter air. I will answer your question plainly. In business, in war, spies and informers are necessary evils, which all good men detest; but which yet all practical men must use, unless they mean to fight and act blindfold. But nothing can justify the use of falsehood and treachery in our own person."

"You said to the elder Mr. Fairford," continued I with the same boldness, which I began to find was my best game, "that I was the son of Ralph Latimer of Langcote-Hall?—How do you reconcile this with your late assertion that my name is not Latimer?"

He coloured as he replied, "The doting old fool lied; or perhaps mistook my meaning. I said, that gentleman might be your father. To say truth I wished you to visit England, your native country; because, when you might do so, my rights over you would revive."

This speech fully led me to understand a caution which had been often impressed upon me, that if I regarded my safety, I should not cross the southern Border; and I cursed my own folly, which kept me fluttering like a moth around the candle, until I was betrayed into the calamity with which I had called. "What are those rights," I said, "which you claim over me?—To what end do you propose to turn them?"

"To a weighty one, you may be certain," answered Mr. Herries; "but I do not, at present, mean to communicate to you either its nature or extent. You may judge of its importance, when, in order entirely to possess myself of your person, I condescended to mix myself with the fellows who destroyed the fishing station of yon wretched Quaker. That I held him in contempt, and was displeased at the gross devices with which he ruined a manly sport, is true enough; but, unless as it favoured my designs on you, he might have, for me, maintained his stake-nets till Solway should cease to ebb and flow."

"Alas!" I said, "it doubles my regret to have been the unwilling cause of misfortune to an honest and friendly man."

"Do not grieve for that," said Herries; "honest Joshua is one of those who, by dint of long prayers, can possess themselves of widows' houses—he will quickly repair his losses. When he sustains any mishap, he and the other canters set it down as a debt against Heaven, and, by way of set-off, practise rogueries without compunction, till they make the balance even, or incline it to the winning side. Enough of this for the present.—I must immediately shift my quarters; for although I do not fear the overzeal of Mr. Justice Foxley or his clerk will lead them to any extreme measure, yet that mad scoundrel's unhappy recognition of me may make it more serious for them to connive at me, and I must not put their patience to an over severe trial. You must prepare to attend me, either as a captive or a companion; if as the latter, you must give your parole of honour to attempt no escape. Should you be so ill advised as to break your word once pledged, be assured that I will blow your brains out, without a moment's scruple."

"I am ignorant of your plans and purposes," I replied, "and cannot but hold them dangerous. I do not mean to aggravate my present situation by any unavailing resistance to the superior force which detains me; but I will not renounce the right of asserting my natural freedom should a favourable opportunity occur. I will, therefore, rather be your prisoner than your confederate."

"That is spoken fairly," he said; "and yet not without the canny caution of one brought up in the Gude Town of Edinburgh. On my part, I will impose no unnecessary hardship upon you, but, on the contrary, your journey shall be made as easy as is consistent with your being kept safely. Do you feel strong enough to ride on horseback as yet, or would you prefer a carriage? The former mode of travelling is best adapted to the country through which we are to travel, but you are at liberty to choose between them."

I said, "I felt my strength gradually returning, and that I should much prefer travelling on horseback. A carriage," I added, "is so close"—

"And so easily guarded," replied Herries, with a look as if he would have penetrated my very thoughts,—"that, doubtless, you think horseback better calculated for an escape."

"My thoughts are my own," I answered; "and though you keep my person prisoner, these are beyond your control."

"O, I can read the book," he said, "without opening the leaves. But I would recommend to you to make no rash attempt, and it will be my care to see that you have no power to make any that is likely to be effectual. Linen, and all other necessities for one in your circumstances, are amply provided. Cristal Nixon will act as your valet,—I should rather, perhaps, say, your femme de chambre. Your travelling dress you may perhaps consider as singular; but it is such as the circumstances require; and, if you object to use the articles prepared for your use, your mode of journeying will be as personally unpleasant as that which conducted you hither.—Adieu—We now know each other better than we did—it will not be my fault if the consequences of farther intimacy be not a more favourable mutual opinion."

He then left me, with a civil good-night, to my own reflections, and only turned back to say, that we should proceed on our journey at daybreak next morning, at farthest; perhaps earlier, he said; but complimented me by supposing that, as I was a sportsman, I must always be ready for a sudden start.

We are then at issue, this singular man and myself. His personal views are to a certain point explained. He has chosen an antiquated and desperate line of politics, and he claims, from some pretended tie of guardianship, or relationship, which he does not deign to explain, but which he seems to have been able to pass current on a silly country Justice and his knavish clerk, a right to direct and to control my motions. The danger which awaited me in England, and which I might have escaped had I remained in Scotland, was doubtless occasioned by the authority of this man. But what my poor mother might fear for me as a child—what my English friend, Samuel Griffiths, endeavoured to guard against during my youth and nonage, is now, it seems, come upon me; and, under a legal pretext, I am detained in what must be a most illegal manner, by a person, too, whose own political immunities have been forfeited by his conduct. It matters not—my mind is made up—neither persuasion nor threats shall force me into the desperate designs which this man meditates. Whether I am of the trifling consequence which my life hitherto seems to intimate, or whether I have (as would appear from my adversary's conduct) such importance, by birth or fortune, as may make me a desirable acquisition to a political faction, my resolution is taken in either case. Those who read this Journal, if it shall be perused by impartial eyes, shall judge of me truly; and if they consider me as a fool in encountering danger unnecessarily, they shall have no reason to believe me a coward or a turncoat, when I find myself engaged in it. I have been bred in sentiments of attachment to the family on the throne, and in these sentiments I will live and die. I have, indeed, some idea that Mr. Herries has already discovered that I am made of different and more unmanageable metal than he had at first believed. There were letters from my dear Alan Fairford, giving a ludicrous account of my instability of temper, in the same pocket-book, which, according to the admission of my pretended guardian, fell under the investigation of his domestic, during the night I passed at Brokenburn, where, as I now recollect, my wet clothes, with the contents of my pockets, were, with the thoughtlessness of a young traveller, committed too rashly to the care of a strange servant. And my kind friend and hospitable landlord, Mr. Alexander Fairford, may also, and with justice, have spoken of my levities to this man. But he shall find he has made a false estimate upon these plausible grounds, since—

But I must break off for the present.

LATIMER'S JOURNAL, IN CONTINUATION.

THERE is at length a halt—at length I have gained so much privacy as to enable me to continue my Journal. It has become a sort of task of duty to me, without the discharge of which I do not feel that the business of the day is performed. True, no friendly eye may ever look upon these labours, which have amused the solitary hours of an unhappy prisoner. Yet, in the mean while, the exercise of the pen seems to act as a sedative upon my own agitated thoughts and tumultuous passions. I never lay it down but I rise stronger in resolution, more ardent in hope. A thousand vague fears, wild expectations, and indigested schemes, hurry through one's thoughts in seasons of doubt and of danger. But by arresting them as they flit across the mind, by throwing them on paper, and even by that mechanical act compelling ourselves to consider them with scrupulous and minute attention, we may perhaps escape becoming the dupes of our own excited imagination; just as a young horse is cured of the vice of starting, by being made to stand still and look for some time without any interruption at the cause of its terror.

There remains but one risk, which is that of discovery. But, besides the small characters in which my residence in Mr. Fairford's house enabled me to excel, for the purpose of transferring as many scroll sheets as possible to a huge sheet of stamped paper, I have, as I have elsewhere intimated, had hitherto the comfortable reflection, that if the record of my misfortunes should fall into the hands of him by whom they are caused, they would, without harming any one, show him the real character and disposition of the person who has become his prisoner—perhaps his victim. Now, however, that other names, and other characters, are to be mingled with the register of my own sentiments, I must take additional care of these papers, and keep them in such a manner that, in case of the least hazard of detection, I may be able to destroy from the moment's notice. I shall not soon or easily forget the lesson I have been taught, by the trying disposition which Marshal Nixon, this man's agent and confederate, manifested at Broomfield, and which proved the original cause of my sufferings.

My laying aside the last sheet of my Journal hastily, was occasioned by the unwelcome sound of a violin, in the far distance beneath my window. It will not appear surprising to those who have made more than study that, after listening to a few notes, I became at once assured that the musician was no other than the minstrel formerly mentioned as present at the destruction of Joshua Fielden's stake fire, the superior delicacy and force of whose execution would enable me to swear to his bow amongst a whole orchestra. I had the less reason to doubt his identity, because he played twice over the beautiful Scotch air called Wandering Willie, and I could not help concluding that he did so for the purpose of interesting his own presence, since what the French call the nom de guerre of the performer was described by the title.

He will catch at the most feeble twig for support in extremity. I knew this man, though deprived of sight, to be bold, impetuous, and perfectly capable of acting as a guide. I believed I had won his good will, by having, in a frolic, assumed the character of his partner; and I remember that, in a wild, wandering, and disordered course of life men, as they become separated from the ordinary bounds of civil society, hold those of comradeship more closely sacred, so that honour is sometimes found among thieves, and faith and attachment in such as the law has termed vagabonds. The history of Richard Coeur de Lion and his minstrel Blondel, rushed, at the same time, on my mind though I could not even then suppress a smile at the dignity of the example, when applied to a blind fiddler and myself. Still there was something in all this to awaken a hope that if I could open a correspondence with this poor violin, he might be useful in extricating me from my present situation.

His profession furnished me with some hope that the desired communication might be attained, since it is well known that in Scotland, where there is so much national music, the words and airs of what are generally known, there is a kind of free-masonry amongst performers, by which they can, by the interchange of a tune, express a great deal to the listener. Personal allusions are often made in this manner with much point and pleasantness, and nothing is more usual at public levees, than that the air played to accompany a particular health or toast is made the vehicle of compliment, of wit and sometimes of satire.

While these things passed through my mind rapidly, I heard my friend beneath reminiscence, for the third time, the air from which his own name had been probably adopted, when he was interrupted by his rustic audience.

"If thou canst play no other spring but that, mon, ho hadst best put up ho's pipe and be joggin' square wi' be back onn or Master Nixon, and we'll see who will pay piper then."

Oh, thought I, if I have no sharper ears than those of my friends Jan and Dorcas to encounter, I may venture an experiment upon them; and, as much as I prize of my state of captivity, I sang two or three lines of the 127th Psalm.

"By Babel's streams we sat and wept."

The country people listened with attention, and when I ceased, I heard them whisper together in tones of commiseration. "Lack a day, poor soul! as pretty a man to be broke his wits!"

As he be that gair, said Wandering Willie, in a tone calculated to reach my ears. "I ken naething will rouse him airts like a spring." And he struck up with great vigour and spirit, the lively Scotch air, the words of which instantly occurred to me.

"O wha'st and I'll come i' ye my lad,

O wha'st and I'll come i' ye my lad

Though father and mother and I should gae aye,

O wha'st and I'll come i' ye my lad.

* Every one must remember variations of this latter system, in which the adaptation to the tune to the next was remarkably frequent. Old Ned Gave, and his son William, were particularly happy in such variations.

I soon heard a clattering noise of feet in the courtyard, which I concluded to be Jan and Dorcas dropping a peg in their Cumberland wooden clogs. Fair cover of this air, I endeavoured to answer Willie's signal by whistling, as loud as I could.

"Come back again and let me see What o' the love we gae."

He instantly threw the dancers out by changing his air to

"There's my dance, I'll no' forget it."

I no longer doubted that a communication between us was happily established, and that, if I had an opportunity of speaking to the poor musician, I should find him willing to take my letter to the post, to invoke the assistance of some active magistrate, or of the commanding officer of Caphale Cove, or a short to do whatever else I could point out in the compass of his power, to contribute to my liberation. But to obtain speech of him, I must have run the risk of alarming the suspicions of Dorcas, if not of her more stupid Corydon. My ally's blindness prevented his receiving any communication by signs from the window—even if I could have ventured to make them consistently with prudence—so that notwithstanding the mode of intercourse we had adopted was both ridiculous and peculiarly liable to misapprehension, for nothing I could do better than to continue it, using my own and my correspondent's discretion, as referring to the sure the meaning they were intended to convey. I thought of singing the words themselves of some significant song, but I said I might, by doing so, attract suspicion. I endeavoured, therefore, to intimate my speedy departure from my present state of residence, by whistling the well-known air which festive parties in Scotland usually conclude with dances.

"Good night and joy be wi' ye o',
Put hae nae langer doubt I stay;
There's naebody fitter nor I am of mine
But wishes that I were away."

It appeared that Willie's powers of intelligence were much more active than mine, and that this deaf person, accustomed to be spoken to by signs, comprehended from the very first notes the idea meaning I intended to convey, and he accompanied me in the air with his violin, in such a manner as to show he understood my meaning, and to prevent my whistling from being attended to.

His reply was almost immediate, and was answered in the old martial air of "Hie, Johnnie, hie, rock up your heaver." I ran over the words, and said on the following stanza, as most applicable to my circumstances.

"Cook up your heaver and make it fit for speck,
We'll over the Border and give them a knock;
There's naebody there as it much better bicker—
Hie, Johnnie, hie, rock up your heaver."

If these sounds alluded, as I hope they do, to my chance of assistance from my Scottish friends, I may indeed consider that a door is open to hope and freedom. I immediately replied with,

"My heart's in the Highlands, my heart's not here;
My heart's in the Highlands, & chasing the deer;
& chasing the wild deer and following the roe;
My heart's in the Highlands wherever I go."

"Farward to the Highlands, farward to the Highlands,
The birthplace of valour, the cradle of worth;
Whither I wander wherever I rove,
The hills of the Highlands for ever I love."

Willie instantly played, with a degree of spirit which might have awakened hope in Despair himself, if Despair could be supposed to understand Scotch music, the fine old Jacobite air.

"For a' that, and a' that,
And twice as much as a' that."

I next endeavoured to intimate my wish to send notice of my condition to my friends; and, desiring to find an air sufficiently expressive of my purpose, I ventured to sing a verse, which, in various forms, occurs so frequently in old ballads—

"When will I get a better bed
That will come here and there."

That will gae down to Darsie's door,
And bid my merry-men come?"

He drowned the latter part of the verse by playing, with much emphasis,

"Kind Robin loes me."

Of this, though I ran over the verses of the song in my mind, I could make nothing; and before I could contrive any mode of intimating my uncertainty, a cry arose in the court-yard that Cristal Nixon was coming. My faithful Willie was obliged to retreat; but not before he had half played, half hummed, by way of farewell,

"Leave thee—leave thee, lad—
I'll never leave thee;
The stars shall gae wither ahins
Ere I will leave thee."

I am thus, I think, secure of one trusty adherent in my misfortunes; and, however whimsical it may be to rely much on a man of his idle profession and deprived of sight withal, it is deeply impressed on my mind, that his services may be both useful and necessary. There is another quarter from which I look for succour, and which I have indicated to thee, Alan, in more than one passage of my Journal. Twice, at the early hour of daybreak, I have seen the individual alluded to in the court of the farm, and twice she made signs of recognition in answer to the gestures by which I endeavoured to make her comprehend my situation; but on both occasions, she pressed her finger on her lips, as expressive of silence and secrecy.

The manner in which G. M. entered upon the scene for the first time, seems to assure me of her goodwill, so far as her power may reach; and I have many reasons to believe it is considerable. Yet she seemed hurried and frightened during the very transitory moments of our interview, and I think was, upon the last occasion, startled by the entrance of some one into the farm-yard, just as she was on the point of addressing me. You must not ask whether I am an early riser, since such objects are only to be seen at daybreak; and although I have never again seen her, yet I have reason to think she is not distant. It was but three nights ago, that, worn out by the uniformity of my confinement, I had manifested more symptoms of despondence than I had before exhibited, which I conceive may have attracted the attention of the domestics, through whom the circumstance might transpire. On the next morning, the following lines lay on my table; but how conveyed there, I cannot tell. The hand in which they are written is a beautiful Italian manuscript:—

"As lords their labourers' hire delay,
Fate quits our toil with hopes to come,
Which, if far short of present pay,
Still owns a debt and names a sum.

"Quit not the pledge, frail sufferer, then,
Although a distant date be given;
Despair is treason towards man,
And blasphemy to Heaven."

That these lines were written with the friendly purpose of inducing me to keep up my spirits, I cannot doubt; and I trust the manner in which I shall conduct myself may show that the pledge is accepted.

The dress is arrived in which it seems to be my self-elected guardian's pleasure that I shall travel; and what does it prove to be?—A skirt, or upper-pet-coat of camlet, like those worn by country ladies of moderate rank when on horseback, with such a riding-mask as they frequently use on journeys to preserve their eyes and complexion from the sun and dust, and sometimes, it is suspected, to enable them to play off a little coquetry. From the gayer mode of employing the mask, however, I suspect I shall be secluded; for instead of being only pasteboard, covered with black velvet, I observed with anxiety that mine is thickened with a plate of steel, which, like Quixote's visor, serves to render it more strong and durable.

This apparatus, together with a steel clasp for securing the mask behind me with a padlock, gave me fearful recollections of the unfortunate being, who, never being permitted to lay aside such a visor, acquired the well-known historical epithet of the Man in the Iron Mask. I hesitated a moment whether I should so far submit to the acts of oppression designed against me as to assume this disguise, which was, of course, contrived to aid their purposes. But then I remembered Mr. Herries's threat, that I should be kept close prisoner in a carriage, unless I assumed the dress which should be appointed for me; and I considered the comparative degree of freedom which I might purchase by wearing the mask and female dress, as easily and advantageously purchased. Here, therefore, I must pause for the present, and await what the morning may bring forth.

[To carry on the story from the documents before us, we think it proper here to drop the Journal of the captive Darsie Latimer, and adopt, instead, a narrative of the proceedings of Alan Fairford in pursuit of his friend, which forms another series in this history.]

CHAPTER X.

NARRATIVE OF ALAN FAIRFORD.

THE reader ought, by this time, to have formed some idea of the character of Alan Fairford. He had a warmth of heart which the study of the law and of the world could not chill, and talents which they had rendered unusually acute. Deprived of the personal patronage enjoyed by most of his contemporaries, who assumed the gown under the protection of their aristocratic alliances and descents, he early saw that he should have that to achieve for himself which fell to them as a right of birth. He laboured hard in silence and solitude, and his labours were crowned with success. But Alan doted on his friend Darsie, even more than he loved his profession, and, as we have seen, threw every thing aside when he thought Latimer in danger; forgetting fame and fortune, and hazarding even the serious displeasure of his father, to rescue him whom he loved with an elder brother's affection. Darsie, though his parts were more quick and brilliant than those of his friend, seemed always to the latter a being under his peculiar charge, whom he was called upon to cherish and protect, in cases where the youth's own experience was unequal to the exigency; and now, when the fate of Latimer seemed worse than doubtful, and Alan's whole prudence and energy were to be exerted in his behalf, an adventure which might have seemed perilous to most youths of his age, had no terrors for him. He was well acquainted with the laws of his country, and knew how to appeal to them; and besides his professional confidence, his natural disposition was steady, sedate, persevering, and undaunted. With these requisites he undertook a quest which, at that time, was not unattended with actual danger, and had much in it to appal a more timid disposition.

Fairford's first inquiry concerning his friend was of the chief magistrate of Dumfries, Provost Crosbie, who had sent the information of Darsie's disappearance. On his first application, he thought he discerned in the honest dignitary a desire to get rid of the subject. The Provost spoke of the riot at the fishing station as an "outbreak among those lawless loons the fishermen, which concerned the Sheriff," he said, "more than us poor Town-Council bodies, that have enough to do to keep peace within burgh, amongst such a set of commoners as the town are plagued with."

"But this is not all, Provost Crosbie," said Mr. Alan Fairford; "a young gentleman of rank and fortune has disappeared amongst their hands—you know him. My father gave him a letter to you—Mr. Darsie Latimer."

"Lack-a-day, yes! lack-a-day, yes!" said the Provost; "Mr. Darsie Latimer—he dined at my house—I hope he is well?"

"I hope so too," said Alan, rather indignantly; "but I desire more certainty on that point. You yourself wrote my father that he had disappeared."

"Troth, yes, and that is true," said the Provost.

"But did he not go back to his friends in Scotland? it was not natural to think he would stay here."

"Not unless he is under restraint," said Fairford, surprised at the coolness with which the Provost seemed to take up the matter.

"Rely on it, sir," said Mr. Crosbie, "that if he has not returned to his friends in Scotland, he must have gone to his friends in England."

"I will rely on no such thing," said Alan; "if there is law or justice in Scotland, I will have the thing cleared to the very bottom."

"Reasonable, reasonable," said the Provost, "so far as is possible; but you know I have no power beyond the ports of the burgh."

"But you are in the commission besides, Mr. Crosbie; a Justice of Peace for the county."

"True, very true—that is," said the cautious magistrate, "I will not say but my name may stand on the list, but I cannot remember that I have ever qualified."

"Why, in that case," said young Fairford, "there are ill-natured people might doubt your attachment to the Protestant line, Mr. Crosbie."

"God forbid, Mr. Fairford! I who have done and suffered in the Forty-five! I reckon the Highlandmen did me damage to the amount of 100*l.* Scots, forby all they ate and drank—no, no, sir, I stand beyond challenge: but as for plaguing myself with county business, let them that aught the mare shoe the mare. The Commissioners of Supply would see my back broken before they would help me in the burgh's work, and all the world kens the difference of the weight between public business in burgh and landward. What are their riots to me? have we not riots enough of our own?—But I must be getting ready, for the council meets this forenoon. I am blithe to see your father's son on the causeway of our ancient burgh, Mr. Alan Fairford. Were you a twelve-month alder, we would make a burgess of you, man. I hope you will come and dine with me before you go away. What think you of to-day at two o'clock—just a roasted chucky and a drappit egg?"

Alan Fairford resolved that his friend's hospitality should not, as it seemed the inviter intended, put a stop to his queries. "I must delay you for a moment," he said, "Mr. Crosbie; this is a serious affair; a young gentleman of high hopes, my own dearest friend, is missing—you cannot think it will be passed over slightly, if a man of your high character, and known zeal for the government, do not make some active inquiry. Mr. Crosbie, you are my father's friend, and I respect you as such—but to others it will have a bad appearance."

The withers of the Provost were not unwrung; he paced the room in much tribulation, repeating, "But what can I do, Mr. Fairford? I warrant your friend casts up again—he will come back again, like the ill shilling—he is not the sort of gear that tynes—a hellicat boy, running through the country with a blind fiddler, and playing the fiddle to a parcel of blackguards, who can tell where the like of him may have scampered to?"

"There are persons apprehended, and in the jail of the town, as I understand from the Sheriff-Substitute," said Mr. Fairford; "you must call them before you, and inquire what they know of this young gentleman."

"Ay, ay—the Sheriff-Depute did commit some poor creatures, I believe—wretched, ignorant fishermen bodies, that had been quarrelling with Quaker Geddes and his stake-nets, whilk, under favour of your gown be it spoken, Mr. Fairford, are not over and above lawful, and the Town-Clerk thinks they may be lawfully removed via facti—but that is by the by. But, sir, the creatures were a' dismissed for want of evidence; the Quaker would not swear to them, and what could the Sheriff and me do but just let them loose? Come awa, cheer up, Master Alan, and take a walk till dinner time—I must really go to the council."

"Stop a moment, Provost," said Alan; "I lodge a complaint before you, as a magistrate, and you will find it serious to slight it over. You must have these men apprehended again."

* By taking the oaths to Government.

"Ay, ay—easy said; but catch them that can," answered the Provost; "they are ower the March by this time, or by the point of Cairn.—Lord help ye! they are a kind of amphibious deevils, neither land nor water beasts—neither English nor Scots—neither county nor stewartry, as we say—they are dispersed like so much quicksilver. You may as well try to whistle a sealgh out of the Solway, as to get hold of one of them till all the fray is over."

"Mr. Crosbie this will not do," answered the young counsellor; "there is a person of more importance than such wretches as you describe concerned in this unhappy business—I must name to you a certain Mr. Herries."

He kept his eye on the Provost as he uttered the name, which he did rather at a venture, and from the connexion which that gentleman, and his real or supposed niece seemed to have with the fate of Darsie Latimer, than from any distinct cause of suspicion which he entertained. He thought the Provost seemed embarrassed, though he showed much desire to assume an appearance of indifference, in which he partly succeeded.

"Herries!" he said—"What Herries?—There are many of that name—not so many as formerly, for the old stocks are wearing out; but there is Herries of Heathgill, and Herries of Auchintulloch, and Herries"—

"To save you farther trouble, this person's designation is Herries of Birrenswark."

"Of Birrenswark?" said Mr. Crosbie; "I have not now, Mr. Alan. Could you not as well have said the Laird of Redgauntlet?"

Fairford was too wary to testify any surprise at the identification of names, however unexpected. "I thought," said he, "he was more generally known by the name of Herries. I have seen and been in company with him under that name, I am sure."

"O ay; in Edinburgh, belike. You know Redgauntlet was unfortunate a great while ago, and though he was maybe not deeper in the mire than other folk, yet, for some reason or other, he did not get so easily out."

"He was attainted, I understand; and has no commission," said Fairford.

The cautious Provost only nodded, and said, "You may guess, therefore, why it is so convenient he should hold his mother's name, which is also partly his own when he is about Edinburgh. To bear his proper name might be accounted a kind of flying in the face of government, ye understand. But he has been long connived at—the story is an old story—and the gentleman has many excellent qualities, and is of a very ancient and honourable house—has cousins among the great folk—counts kin with the Advocate and with the Sheriff—hawks, you know, Mr. Alan, will not pike out hawks' een—he is widely connected—my wife is a fourth cousin of Redgauntlet's."

Hinc illa lachryma! thought Alan Fairford to himself; but the hint presently determined him to proceed by soft means, and with caution. "I beg you to understand," said Fairford, "that in the investigation which I am about to make, I design no harm to Mr. Herries, or Redgauntlet—call him what you will. All I wish is, to ascertain the safety of my friend. I know that he was rather foolish in once going upon a merry frolic in disguise, to the neighbourhood of this same gentleman's house. In his circumstances, Mr. Redgauntlet may have misinterpreted the motives, and considered Darsie Latimer as a spy. His influence, I believe, is great, among the disorderly people you speak of but now?"

The Provost answered with another sagacious shake of his head, that would have done honour to Lord Burleigh in the Critic.

"Well, then," continued Fairford, "is it not possible that, in the mistaken belief that Mr. Latimer was a spy, he may, upon such suspicion, have caused him to be carried off and confined somewhere?—Such things are done at elections, and on occasions less pressing than when men think their lives in danger from an informer."

"Mr. Fairford," said the Provost, very earnestly, "I scarce think such a mistake possible; or if, by any extraordinary chance, it should have taken place, Redgauntlet, whom I cannot but know well, being, as I have said my wife's first cousin, (fourth cousin, I should say,) is altogether incapable of doing any thing harsh to the young gentleman—he might send him ower to Ailsay for a night or two, or maybe land him on the north coast of Ireland, or in Islay, or some of the Hebrides; but depend upon it, he is incapable of harming a hair of his head."

"I am determined not to trust to that, Provost," answered Fairford, firmly; "and I am a good deal surprised at your way of talking so lightly of such an aggression on the liberty of the subject. You are to consider, and Mr. Herries or Mr. Redgauntlet's friends would do very well also to consider, how it will sound in the ears of an English Secretary of State, that an attainted traitor (for such is this gentleman) has not only ventured to take up his abode in this realm—against the King of which he has been in arms—but is suspected of having proceeded, by open force and violence, against the person of one of the lieges, a young man, who is neither without friends nor property to secure his being righted."

The Provost looked at the young counsellor with a face in which distrust, alarm, and vexation, seemed mingled. "A fashious job," he said at last, "a fashious job; and it will be dangerous meddling with it. I should like ill to see your father's son turn informer against an unfortunate gentleman."

"Neither do I mean it," answered Alan, "provided that unfortunate gentleman and his friends give me a quiet opportunity of securing my friend's safety. If I could speak with Mr. Redgauntlet, and hear his own explanation, I should probably be satisfied. If I am forced to denounce him to government, it will be in his new capacity of a kidnapper. I may not be able, nor is it my business, to prevent his being recognised in his former character of an attainted person, excepted from the general pardon."

"Master Fairford," said the Provost, "would ye ruin the poor innocent gentleman on an idle suspicion?"

"Say no more of it, Mr. Crosbie; my line of conduct is determined—unless that suspicion is removed."

"Weel, sir," said the Provost, "since so it be, and since you say that you do not seek to harm Redgauntlet personally, I'll ask a man to dine with us to-day that kens as much about his matters as most folk. You must think, Mr. Alan Fairford, though Redgauntlet be my wife's near relative, and though, doubtless, I wish him weel, yet I am not the person who is like to be intrusted with his incomings and outgoings. I am not a man for that—I keep the kirk, and I abhor Pop-ry—I have stood up for the House of Hanover, and for liberty and property—I carried arms, sir, against the Pretender, when three of the Highlandmen's baggage-carts were stopped at Ecclefechan; and I had an especial loss of a hundred pounds"—

"Scots," interrupted Fairford. "You forget you told me all this before."

"Scots or English, it was too much for me to lose," said the Provost; "so you see I am not a person to pack or peel with Jacobites, and such unfreemen as poor Redgauntlet."

"Granted, granted, Mr. Crosbie; and what then?" said Alan Fairford.

"Why, then, it follows, that if I am to help you at this pinch, it cannot be by and through my ain personal knowledge, but through some fitting agent or third person."

"Granted again," said Fairford. "And pray who may this third person be?"

"Wha but Pate Maxwell of Summertrees—him they call Pate-in-Peril."

"An old forty-five man, of course?"

"Ye may swear that," replied the Provost—"as black a Jacobite as the auld leaven can make him; but a soney, merry companion, that none of us think it worth while to break wi' for all his brags and his clavers. You would have thought, if he had had but his own way at Derby, he would have marched Charlie Stewart through between Wade and the Duke, as a thread goes through the needle's ee, and seated him in Saint James's before you could have said haud your hand. But though he is a windy body when he gets on his auld-world stories, he has nair gumption in him than most people—knows business, Mr. Alan, being bred to the law; but never took the gown, because of the oaths, which kept more folk out then than they do now—the more's the pity."

"What! are you sorry, Provost, that Jacobitism is upon the decline?" said Fairford.

"No, no," answered the Provost—"I am only sorry for folks losing the tenderness of conscience which they used to have. I have a son breeding to the bar, Mr. Fairford; and, no doubt, considering my services and sufferings, I might have looked for some bit postie to him; but if the muckle tikes come in—I mean a' these Maxwells, and Johnstones, and great lairds, that the oaths used to keep out lang syne—the bits o' messan dogies, like my son, and may be like your father's son, Mr. Alan, will be sair put to the wall."

"But to return to the subject, Mr. Crosbie," said Fairford, "do you really think it likely that this Mr. Maxwell will be of service in this matter?"

"It's very like he may be, for he is the tongue of the trumpet to the whole squad of them," said the Provost; "and Redgauntlet, though he will not stick at times to call him a fool, takes more of his counsel than any man's else that I am aware of. If Pate can bring him to a communing, the business is done. He's a sharp chield, Pate-in-Peril."

"Pate-in-Peril!" repeated Alan; "a very singular name."

"Ay, and it was in as queer a way he got it; but I'll say naething about that," said the Provost, "for fear of forestalling his market; for ye are sure to hear it once at least, however oftener, before the punch-bowl gives place to the ten-pot.—And now, fare ye weel; for there is the council-bell clinking in earnest; and if I am not there before it jows in, Bailie Laurie will be trying some of his manœuvres."

The Provost, repeating his expectation of seeing Mr. Fairford at two o'clock, at length effected his escape from the young counsellor, and left him at a considerable loss how to proceed. The Sheriff, it seems, had returned to Edinburgh, and he feared to find the visible repugnance of the Provost to interfere with this Laird of Birrenswark, or Redgauntlet, much stronger amongst the country gentlemen, many of whom were Catholics as well as Jacobites, and most others unwilling to quarrel with kinsmen and friends, by prosecuting with severity political offences which had almost run a prescription.

To collect all the information in his power, and not to have recourse to the higher authorities until he could give all the light of which the case was capable, seemed the wiser proceeding in a choice of difficulties. He had some conversation with the Procurator-Fiscal, who, as well as the Provost, was an old correspondent of his father. Alan expressed to that officer a purpose of visiting Brokenburn, but was assured by him, that it would be a step attended with much danger to his own person, and altogether fruitless; that the individuals who had been ringleaders in the riot were long since safely sheltered in their various lurking-holes in the Isle of Man, Cumberland, and elsewhere; and that those who might remain would undoubtedly commit violence on any who visited their settlement with the purpose of inquiring into the late disturbances.

There were not the same objections to his hastening to Mount Sharon, where he expected to find the latest news of his friend; and there was time enough to do so, before the hour appointed for the Provost's dinner. Upon the road, he congratulated himself on having obtained one point of almost certain information. The person who had in a manner forced himself upon his father's hospitality, and had appeared desirous to induce Darsie Latimer to visit England, against whom, too, a sort of warning had been received from an individual connected with and residing in his own family, proved to be a promoter of the disturbance in which Darsie had disappeared.

What could be the cause of such an attempt on the liberty of an inoffensive and amiable man? It was impossible it could be merely owing to Redgauntlet's mistaking Darsie for a spy; for though that was the solution which Fairford had offered to the Provost, he well knew that, in point of fact, he himself had been warned by his singular visitor of some danger to which his friend was exposed, before such suspicion could have been entertained; and the injunctions received by Latimer from his guardian, or him who acted as such, Mr. Griffiths of London, pointed to the same thing. He was rather glad, however, that he had not let Provost Crosbie into his secret, farther than was absolutely necessary; since it was plain that the connexion of his wife with the suspected party was likely to affect his impartiality as a magistrate.

When Alan Fairford arrived at Mount Sharon, Rachel Geddes hastened to meet him, almost before the servant could open the door. She drew back in disappointment when she beheld a stranger, and said, to excuse her precipitation, that "she had thought it was her brother Joshua returned from Cumberland."

"Mr. Geddes is then absent from home?" said Fairford, much disappointed in his turn.

"He hath been gone since yesterday, friend," answered Rachel, once more composed to the quietude which characterizes her sect, but her pale cheek and red eye giving contradiction to her assumed equanimity.

"I am," said Fairford, hastily, "the particular friend of a young man not unknown to you, Miss Geddes—the friend of Darsie Latimer—and am come hither in the utmost anxiety, having understood from Provost Crosbie, that he had disappeared in the night when a destructive attack was made upon the fishing-station of Mr. Geddes."

"Thou dost afflict me, friend by thy inquiries," said Rachel, more affected than before; "for although the youth was like those of the worldly generation, wise in his own conceit, and lightly to be moved by the breath of vanity, yet Joshua loved him, and his heart clave to him as if he had been his own son. And when he himself escaped from the sons of Belial, which was not until they had tired themselves with reviling, and with idle reproach, and the jests of the scoffer, Joshua, my brother, returned to them once and again, to give ransom for the youth called Darsie Latimer, with offers of money and with promise of remission, but they would not hearken to him. Also, he went before the Head Judge, whom men call the Sheriff, and would have told him of the youth's peril; but he would in no way hearken to him unless he would swear unto the truth of his words, which thing he might not do without sin, seeing it is written, Swear not at all—also, that our conversation shall be yea or nay. Therefore, Joshua returned to me disconsolate, and said, 'Sister Rachel, this youth hath run into peril for my sake; assuredly I shall not be guiltless if a hair of his head be harmed, seeing I have sinned in permitting him to go with me to the fishing-station when such evil was to be feared. Therefore, I will take my horse, even Solomon, and ride swiftly into Cumberland, and I will make myself friends with Mammon of Unrighteousness, among the magistrates of the Gentiles, and among their mighty men; and it shall come to pass that Darsie Latimer shall be delivered, even if it were at the expense of half my substance.' And I said, 'Nay, my brother, go not, for they will but scoff at and revile thee; but hire with thy silver one of the scribes, who are eager as hunters in pursuing their prey, and he shall free Darsie Latimer from the men of violence by his cunning, and thy soul shall be guiltless of evil towards the lad.' But he answered and said, 'I will not be controlled in this matter.' And he is gone forth, and hath not returned, and I fear me that he may never return; for though he be peaceful, as becometh one who holds all violence as offence against his own soul, yet neither the floods of water, nor the fear of the snare, nor the drawn sword of the adversary brandished in the path, will overcome his purpose. Wherefore the Solway may swallow him up, or the sword of the enemy may devour him—nevertheless, my hope is better in Him who directeth all things, and ruleth over the waves of the sea, and overruleth the devices of the wicked, and who can redeem us even as a bird from the fowler's net."

This was all that Fairford could learn from Miss Geddes; but he heard with pleasure, that the good Quaker, her brother, had many friends among those of his own profession in Cumberland, and without exposing himself to so much danger as his sister seemed to apprehend, he trusted he might be able to discover some traces of Darsie Latimer. He himself rode back to Dumfries, having left with Miss Geddes his direction in that place, and an earnest request that she would forward thither whatever information she might obtain from her brother.

On Fairford's return to Dumfries, he employed the brief interval which remained before dinner-time, in writing an account of what had befallen Latimer, and of the present uncertainty of his condition, to Mr. Samuel Griffiths, through whose hands the remittances for his friend's service had been regularly made, desiring he would instantly acquaint him with such parts of his history as might direct him in the search which he was about to institute through the border counties, and which he pledged himself not to give up until he had obtained news of his friend, alive or dead. The young lawyer's mind felt easier when he had despatched this letter. He could not conceive any reason why his friend's life should be aimed at; he knew Darsie had done nothing by which his liberty could be legally affected; and although, even of late years, there had been singular histories of men and women also, who had been trepanned, and concealed in solitudes and distant islands, in order to serve some temporary purpose, such violences had been chiefly practised by the rich on the poor, and by the strong on the feeble; whereas, in the present case, this Mr. Herries, or Redgauntlet, being amenable, for more reasons than one, to the censure of the law, must be the weakest in any struggle in which it could be appealed to. It is true that his friendly anxiety whispered, that the very cause which rendered this oppressor less formidable, might make him more desperate. Still, recalling his language, so strikingly that of the gentleman, and even of the man of honour, Alan Fairford concluded, that though, in his feudal pride, Redgauntlet might venture on the deeds of violence exercised by the aristocracy in other times, he could not be capable of any action of deliberate atrocity. And in these convictions he went to dine with Provost Crosbie, with a heart more at ease than might have been expected.*

CHAPTER XI.

FIVE minutes had elapsed after the town-clock struck two, before Alan Fairford, who had made a small detour to put his letter into the post-box, reached the mansion of Mr. Provost Crosbie, and was at once greeted by the voice of that civic dignitary, and the rural dignitary his visitor, as by the voices of men impatient for their dinner.

"Come away, Mr. Fairford—the Edinburgh man is later than ours," said the Provost.

And, "Come away, young gentleman," said the Laird; "I remember your father weel, at the Cross thirty years ago—I reckon you are as late in Edinburgh as at London, four o'clock hours—eh?"

"Not quite so degenerate," replied Fairford; "so certainly many Edinburgh people are so ill-advised as to postpone their dinner till three, that they may have full time to answer their London correspondents."

* Scotland, in its half civilized state, exhibited too many examples of the exertion of arbitrary force and violence, rendered easy by the dominion which lairds exerted over their tenants and chiefs over their clans. The captivity of Lady Grange, in the desolate cliffs of Saint Kilda, is in the recollection of every one. At the supposed date of the novel also, a man of the name of Merrilees, a tanner in Leith, absconded from his country to escape his creditors; and after having slain his own married dog, and put a bit of red cloth in its mouth, as if it had died in a contest with soldiers, and involved his own existence in as much mystery as possible, made his escape into Yorkshire. How he was detected by persons sent in search of him, to whom he gave a portentous account of his having been carried off and concealed in various places. Mr. Merrilees was, in short, a kind of male Elizabeth Canning, but did not trespass on the public credulity quite so long.

"London correspondents!" said Mr. Maxwell, "and pray, what the devil have the people of Auld Reekie to do with London correspondents?"

"The tradesmen must have their goods," said Fairford.

"Can they not buy our own Scottish manufactures, and put their customers' pockets in a more patriotic manner?"

"Then the ladies must have fashions," said Fairford.

"Can they not bush the plaid over their heads, as their mothers did? A tartan skirt, and once a year a new cockerhony from Paris, should serve a Quaker. But ye have not many of them left, I think—Marshall, Airley, Winton, Wemyss, Balmerino, all passed and gone—ay, ay, the counterpane and bed of quality will scarce take up too much of your hall-room floor with their quality hoops now a days."

"There is no want of crowding, however," said Fairford; "they begin to talk of a new Assembly-Room."

"A new Assembly-Room?" said the old Jacobite Laird—"Umph—I mind quartering three hundred men in the old Assembly-Room?—But come, come, I'll ask no more questions—the answers all smell of new lords new lands, and do but spoil my appetite, which were a pity, since here comes Mrs. Croshaw to my own smitten steady."

It was even so. Mrs. Croshaw had been absent, for some time, "on hospitable errand," a duty which she did not conceive herself exempted from, either by the dignity of her husband's rank in the municipality, or the splendour of her dress with gown, or even by the more highly prized lustre of her birth; for she was born a Maxwell, and allied, as her husband of an informed his friends, to several of the best families in the county. She had been handmaiden, and was still a partly good-looking woman of her years, and though her step into the kitchen had somewhat lightened her complexion, it was no more than a moment's touch of rouge might have done.

The Provost was certainly proud of his lady, not alone and he was afraid of her, for, of the females of the Redgauntlet family there went a rumour, that, ally where they would, there was a gray mare as sure to be in the stable of their husbands, as there is a white horse in Wouvermans picture. The great dame, too, was supposed to have brought a species of politics into Mr. Croshaw's household along with her, and the Provost's enemies at the Council-table of the burgh used to observe, that he uttered there more a bold heresie against the Pretender, and in favour of King George and government, of which he dared not have pronounced a syllable in his own bedchamber; and that, in fact, his wife's predominating influence had now and then occasioned his acting, or hearing to act, in a manner very different from his general professions of zeal for Revolution principles. If this was in any respect true it was certain, on the other hand, that Mrs. Croshaw, in all external appearance, seemed to acknowledge the "lawful way and right supremacy" of the head of the house, and if she did not in truth reverence her husband, she at least appeared to do so.

Then slowly came forward Mr. Maxwell (a counsellor of course) with cordishy, and Fairford with civility, answering, at the same time, with respect, to the general complaints of the Provost, that dinner was not coming up. "But since you changed poor Peter MacAlpin, that used to take care of the town-clock, ay dear, it has never gone well a single day."

"Poor MacAlpin, my dear," said the Provost, "made himself too busy for a person in office, and drank healths and so forth, which it became no mean to drink or to pledge, for less one that is in power of doing a servant of the public. I understand that he lent the music-halls to Edinburgh, for playing 'Ower the water to Charlie,' upon the tenth of June. He is a black sherry, and deserves no encouragement."

"Not a bad tune, though, after all," said Summerrum, and, turning to the window, he half hummed, half whistled the air in question, then sang the last verse aloud:

"Oh I had wad my Charlie's name,
Though some there be that alight him;
But ah to see the dail gang home
Wi' a' the Whigs before him!
O'er the water, and o'er the sea,
And o'er the water to Charlie;
Come o'er, come o'er, we'll gather, and go,
And live or die with Charlie."

Mrs. Croshaw smiled furiously on the Laird, wearing an aspect at the same time of deep submission; while the Provost, not choosing to hear his visitor's ditty, took a turn through the room, in unquestioned dignity and independence of authority.

"Awful, awful, my dear," said the lady, with a quiet smile of submission, "ye ken them matters best, and you will do your pleasure—they are for above my head, only I thought over the town-clock, and ye might of your niece he got up so regular as a clock with it. I Peter MacAlpin gets his office back again. The town-clock and can neither work nor wait, but he is the only hand to set a clock."

It is not to be supposed, however, that, notwithstanding this submission which, probably, the fair Cassandra had the full means of accomplishing, it was not till the second evening day thereafter that the machinery of the Jacobite clock began to move again, and he was more more removed to his occupation of fixing the town's time, and the Provost a dinner hour.

Upon the present occasion the dinner passed pleasantly away. Summerrum talked and jested with the easy indifference of a man who holds himself superior to his company. He was indeed an important person, as was testified by his portly appearance; he had laced with point d'Espagne, his coat and waistcoat once richly embroidered, though now almost threadbare; the splendour of his solitaire, and local ruffles, though the first was sorely creased, and the other pulled; not to forget the length of his silver-haired rapier. His wit, or rather humour, bordered on the sarcastic, and intimated a discontented man; and although he showed no disposition when the Provost attempted a repartee, yet it seemed that he permitted it upon mere suffrance, as a fencing-master, engaged with a pupil, will sometimes permit the tyre to hit him, solely by way of encouragement. The Laird's own jests, in the mean while, were eminently successful, not only with the Provost and his lady, but with the red-checked and red ribboned servant-maid who waited at table, and who could scarce perform her duty with propriety, so effectual were the explosions of Summerrum. Alan Fairford alone was unmoved among all this mirth, which was the less wonderful, that besides the important subject which occupied his thoughts, most of the Laird's good things consisted in sly allusions to little parochial or family incidents, with which the Edinburgh visitor was totally unacquainted; so that the laughter of the party sounded in his ear like the idle crackling of thorns under the pot, with this difference, that they did not accompany or second any such useful operation as the boiling thereof.

Fairford was glad when the cloth was withdrawn; and when Provost Croshaw (not without some points of advice from his lady, touching the precise mixture of the ingredients) had accomplished the compounding of a noble bowl of punch, at which the old Jacobite's eyes seemed to glimmer, the glasses were pushed round, filled and withdrawn each by its owner, when the Provost emphatically named the toast, "The King," with an important look to Fairford, which seemed to say, "You can have no doubt whom I mean, and therefore there is no occasion to particularise the individual."

Summerrum repeated the toast with a sly wink to the lady, while Fairford drank his glass in silence.

"Well, young advocate," said the landed proprietor, "I am glad to see there is some shame, if there is little honesty, left in the Faculty. Some of your black-gowns, now-a-days, have as little of the one as of the other."

* That week in these days, he with his mother-in-law the Laird's lady who brought north to a small east coast, and men are all alive who recollect when it came down with only one man, the Laird's lady, addressed to the manager of the Edinburgh Loan Company.

"At least, sir," replied Mr. Fairford, "I am so much of a lawyer as not willingly to enter into disputes which I am not retained to support—it would be but throwing away both time and argument."

"Come, come," said the lady, "we will have no argument in this house about Whig or Tory—the Provost kens what he maun say, and I ken what he should think; and for a' that has come and gane yet, there may be a time coming when honest men may say what they think, whether they be Provosts or not."

"D'ye hear that, Provost?" said Summertrees; "your wife's a witch, man; you should nail a horse-shoe on your chamber-door—Ha, ha, ha!"

This sally did not take quite so well as former efforts of the Laird's wit. The lady drew up, and the Provost said half aside, "The sooth boud is nae boud.* You will find the horseshoe hissing hot, Summertrees."

"You can speak from experience, doubtless, Provost," answered the Laird; "but I crave pardon—I need not tell Mrs. Crosbie that I have all respect for the auld and honourable House of Redgauntlet."

"And good reason ye have, that are sae sib to them," quoth the lady, "and kend weel baith them that are here, and them that are gane."

"In troth, and ye may say sae, madam," answered the Laird; "for poor Harry Redgauntlet that suffered at Carlisle, was hand and glove with me; and yet we parted on short leave-taking."

"Ay, Summertrees," said the Provost; "that was when you played Cheat-the-woodie, and gat the by-name of Pate-in-Peril. I wish you would tell the story to my young friend here. He likes weel to hear of a sharp trick, as most lawyers do."

"I wonder at your want of circumspection, Provost," said the Laird,—much after the manner of a singer, when declining to sing the song that is quivering upon his tongue's very end. "Ye should mind there are some auld stories that cannot be ripped up again with entire safety to all concerned. Tace is Latin for a candle."

"I hope," said the lady, "you are not afraid of any thing being said out of this house to your prejudice, Summertrees? I have heard the story before; but the oftener I hear it, the more wonderful I think it."

"Yes, madam; but it has been now a wonder of more than nine days, and it is time it should be ended," answered Maxwell.

Fairford now thought it civil to say, "that he had often heard of Mr. Maxwell's wonderful escape, and that nothing could be more agreeable to him than to hear the right version of it."

But Summertrees was obdurate, and refused to take up the time of the company with such "auld world nonsense."

"Weel, weel," said the Provost, "a wilful man maun hae his way.—What do your folk in the county think about the disturbances that are beginning to spunk out in the colonies?"

"Excellent, sir, excellent. When things come to the worst they will mend; and to the worst they are coming.—But as to that nonsense ploy of mine, if ye insist on hearing the particulars,"—said the Laird, who began to be sensible that the period of telling his story gracefully was gliding fast away.

"Nay," said the Provost, "it was not for myself, but this young gentleman."

"Aweel, what for should I not pleasure the young gentleman?—I'll just drink the honest folk at hame and abroad, and deil ane else. And then—but you have heard it before, Mrs. Crosbie?"

"Not so often as to think it tiresome, I assure ye," said the lady; and without further preliminaries, the Laird addressed Alan Fairford.

"Ye have heard of a year they call the forty-five, young gentleman; when the Southrons' heads made their last acquaintance with Scottish claymores? There was a set of rampaging chields in the country then that they called rebels—I never could find out what for—Some men should have been wi' them that never came, Provost—Skye and the Bush about Traquair for that, ye ken—Weel, the job was settled at last. Cloured crowns were plenty, and razed necks came into fashion. I dinna mind very weel what I was doing, swaggering about the country with dirk and pistol at my belt for five or six months, or thereaway; but I had a weary waking out of a wild dream. Then did I find myself on foot in a misty morning, with my hand, just for fear of going astray, linked into a handcuff, as they call it with poor Harry Redgauntlet's fastened into the other; and there we were, trudging along, with about a score more that had thrust their horns ower deep in the bog, just like ourselves, and a sergeant's guard of redcoats with twa file of dragoons, to keep all quiet, and give us heart to the road. Now, if this mode of travelling was not very pleasant, the object did not particularly recommend it; for you understand, young man, that they did not trust these poor rebel bodies to be let by juries of their ain kindly countrymen, though we would have thought they would have found Whigs enough in Scotland to hang us all; but they believe to trounce us away to be tried at Carlisle, where the folk had been so frightened, that had you brought whole Highland clan at once into the court, they would have put their hands upon their een, and cried 'hang them a', just to be quit of them."

"Ay, ay," said the Provost, "that was a snell an' I grant ye."

"Snell!" said his wife, "snell! I wish they had passed it had the jury I would recommend them to."

"I suppose the young lawyer thinks it all very right," said Summertrees, looking at Fairford—"an old lawyer might have thought otherwise. However the cudgel was to be found to beat the dog, and they chose a heavy one. Well, I kept my spirits better than my companion, poor fellow; for I had the luck to have neither wife nor child to think about, and Harry Redgauntlet had both one and t'other.—You have seen Harry, Mrs. Crosbie?"

"In troth have I," said she, with the sigh which we give to early recollections, of which the objects no more. "He was not so tall as his brother, and a gentler lad every way. After he married the great English fortune, folk called him less of a Scot than Edward."

"Folk lee'd, then," said Summertrees; "poor Harry was none of your bold-speaking, razed reivers, that talk about what they did yesterday, or what they will do to-morrow: it was when something was to do at the moment that you should have looked at Harry Redgauntlet. I saw him at Culloden, when all was lost, doing more than twenty of these bleezing braggarts, till the very soldiers that took him, cried not to hurt him—for all somebody's orders, Provost—for he was the bravest fellow of them all. Weel, as I went by the side of Harry, and felt him raise my hand up in the mist of the morning as if he wished to wipe his eye—for he had not the freedom without my leave—my very heart was like to break for him, poor fellow. In the mean while, I had been trying and trying to make my hand as fine as a lady's, to see if I could slip it out of my iron wrist-band. You may think," he said, laying his broad bony hand on the table, "I had work enough with such a shoulder of mutton fist; but if you observe the shackle-bones are of the largest, and so they were obliged to keep the handcuff wide; at length I got my hand slipped out, and slipped in again: and poor Harry was sae deep in his ain thoughts, I could not make him sensible what I was doing."

"Why not?" said Alan Fairford, for whom the tale began to have some interest.

"Because there was an unchancy beast of a dragoon riding close beside us on the other side; and if I had led him into my confidence as well as Harry, it would not have been long before a pistol-ball slipped through my bonnet.—Well, I had little for it but to do the best I could for myself; and, by my conscience, it was time, when the gallows was staring me in the face. We were to halt for breakfast at Moffat. Well did I know the moors we were marching over, having hunted and hunted on every acre of ground in very different times. So I waited, you see, till I was on the edge of Errichstone brake—Ye have the place they call the Marjane's Pen-stand, because the Annandale launs used to put their stolen cattle in there?"

Fairford estimated his ignorance.

"Ye must have seen it as ye came this way; it looks as if four hills were laying their heads together, to shut out daylight from the dark hollow space between them. A d—d deep, black, blackguard-looking ghyss of a hole it is, and goes straight down from the road side, as perpendicular as it can do, to be a heathery brake. At the bottom, there is a small bit of a break, that you would think could hardly find its way out from the hills that are so closely jammed round it."

"A bad pass indeed," said Alan.

"You may say that," continued the Laird. "And as it was, sir, it was my only chance; and though my very flesh creeped when I thought what a roundle I was going to get, yet I kept my heart up all the time. And so as when we came on the edge of this Pen-stand of the Johnstones, I slipped out my hand from the handcuff, crept to Harry Gauntlet. 'Follow me!'—whisked under the belly of the dragon horse—flung my plaid round me, with the speed of lightning—threw myself on my side for there was no keeping my feet and down the hole hurled I over heather and fern, and blackberries, like a barrel down Chalmers's Close in Auld Rhu. Oh—sir I never could help laughing when I think how the accounted rideouts must have been hunched, for the most thing, as I said, thick, they had little notion, I take it, that they were on the verge of such a dilemma. I was half way down—for rowing is faster work than running—ere they could get at their arms, and then it was flash, flash, flash—rap, rap, rap—from the edge of the road; but my head was too jumbled to think any thing either of that or the hard knocks I got among the stones. I kept my senses together, a hell has been thought wonderful by all that ever saw the place; and I helped myself with my hands as gallantly as I could, and to the bottom I came. There I lay for half a moment, but the thoughts of a gallows is worth all the mile and great horrors in the world, for bringing a man to himself. Up I sprang, like a four-year-old colt. All the hills were printing round with me, like so many great big humming tops. But there was no time to think of that neither, more especially as the mist had risen a little with the fring. I could see the villains like so many crabs on the edge of the brake; and I reckon that they saw me; for some of the launs were beginning to crawl down the hill, but later could wince in their red cloaks, coming free a field preening, then such a sample had as I was. Accordingly they soon began to stop and lose their purses. Good-even to you, gentlemen, thought I, if that is to be the gate of it. If you have any farther word with me, you must come as far as Carnefrae-gauna. And as off I set and never back went faster over the brake than I did; and I never stopped till I had put three waters, reasonably deep, as the season was rainy, half-a-dozen mountains, and a few thousand acres of the worst moss and bog in Scotland, between me and my friends the redcoats."

"It was that job which got you the name of Pate-in-Peril," said the Provost, filling the glasses, and exclaiming with great emphasis, while his guest, much animated with the recollections which the exploit excited, looked round with an air of triumph for sympathy and applause.—"Here is to your good health; and may you never put your neck to such a venture again."

"Humph!—I do not know," answered Summergreen. "I am not like to be tempted with another opportunity.—Yet who knows?" And then he made a deep pause.

"May I ask what became of your friend, sir?" said Alan Fairford.

"Ah, poor Harry?" said Summergreen. "I'll tell you what, sir, it takes time to make up one's mind to such a venture, as my friend the Provost calls it; and I was told by Ned Marjane, who was next file to us, but had the luck to escape the gallows by some slight-of-hand trick or other, that upon my breaking off, poor Harry stood like one motionless, although all our brethren in captivity made as much tumult as they could, to distract the attention of the soldiers. And you he did at last; but he did not leave the ground, and either from confusion, or because he judged the descent altogether perpendicular, he fell up the hill to the left, instead of going down or away, and so was easily pursued and taken. If he had followed my example, he would have found enough among the shepherds to hide him, and shed him, as they did me, on leamral crosses and heathy cushion, till better days come round again."

"He suffered then for his share in the insurrection?" said Alan.

"You may swear that," said Summergreen. "His blood was too red to be spared when that sort of point was in request. He suffered, sir, as you call it—that is, he was murdered in cold blood, with many a pretty fellow besides. Well, we may have our day next, what is friend is not forgotten—they think on all dead and buried. Let—Here he filled his glass, and muttering some indistinct denunciations, drank it off and assumed his usual manner, which had been a little disturbed towards the end of the narrative."

"What became of Mr. Redgauntlet's child?" said Fairford.

"Master Redgauntlet?—He was Sir Henry Redgauntlet, as his son, if the child now lives, will be Sir Arthur—I called him Harry from infancy, and Redgauntlet, as the chief of his name—His proper name was Sir Henry Redgauntlet."

"It is now, therefore, so dead?" said Alan Fairford.

"It is a pity so brave a line should draw to a close. He has left a brother," said Summergreen, "Edward Hugh Redgauntlet, who has now the reputation of the family. And well it is, for though he is inferior in many respects, he will keep up the name of the house better than a boy bred up amongst those better Whigs, the relations of his elder brother Sir Henry's lady. Then they are on no good terms with the Redgauntlet late-better Whigs they are, as you say. It was a runaway match between Sir Henry and his lady. Poor thing, they would not allow her to see him when in confinement—they had even the manners to leave him without pecuniary assistance; and as all his own property was seized upon and sold, he would have wanted common necessaries but for the attachment of a fellow who was a fiddler—a blind man—I have seen him with Sir Henry myself, back before the affair broke out and when it was going on. I have heard that he fiddled in the streets of Carlisle, and earned what money he got to his master, while he was confined in the castle."

"I do not believe a word of it," said Mrs. Crookin, kindling with indignation. "A Redgauntlet would have died twenty times before he had touched a fiddler's wages."

"Hush!—hush!—all nonsense and pride," said the Laird of Summergreen. "Successful days will out-dry puddings, cousin Crookin—ye little know what your friends were obliged to do you time for a

"As a gentleman of the northern name was engaged in the affair of 715, and with some difficulty was saved from the gallows by the intervention of the Duke of Buccleuch and his son-in-law, the Duke of Devonshire, who was then a young man, and the object of her affection, and was the first of the rank which he had run, and the trouble she had taken in her demand, wound up her letters by stating, that in case of such calamity again, he was not to repeat her name in the streets. As it pleased your Grace," said the Duke of Devonshire, "I beg I am too old to see another opportunity."

"Blessed Meriton!—The Duke of Devonshire has died of dyspepsia, and by the hand of the butcher. In political economy it is said to feed with little scraps."

* The corpse of a Jacobite gentleman who on the road to Carlisle to take his trial for his share in the affair of 1745, lay in the edge of Errichstone brake in the edge of the Annandale launs. The distance of time makes some indistinctness of recollection, but it is believed the fact came out afterwards, or something.

sowp of brose, or a bit of bannock.—G—d, I carried a cutler's wheel for several weeks, partly for need, and partly for disguise—there I went bizz—bizz—whizz—zizz, at every auld wife's door; and if ever you want your shears sharpened, Mrs. Crosbie, I am the lad to do it for you, if my wheel was but in order."

"You must ask my leave first," said the Provost; "for I have been told you had some queer fashions of taking a kiss instead of a penny, if you liked your customer."

"Come, come, Provost," said the lady, rising, "if the maist gets abune the meal with you, it is time for me to take myself away—And you will come to my room, gentlemen, when you want a cup of tea."

Alan Fairford was not sorry for the lady's departure. She seemed too much alive to the honour of the house of Redgauntlet, though only a fourth cousin, not to be alarmed by the inquiries which he proposed to make after the whereabouts of its present head. Strange confused suspicions arose in his mind, from his imperfect recollection of the tale of Wandering Willie, and the idea forced itself upon him, that his friend Darsie Latimer might be the son of the unfortunate Sir Henry. But before indulging in such speculations, the point was, to discover what had actually become of him. If he were in the hands of his uncle, might there not exist some rivalry in fortune, or rank, which might induce so stern a man as Redgauntlet to use unfair measures towards a youth whom he would find himself unable to mould to his purpose? He considered these points in silence, during several revolutions of the glasses as they wheeled in galaxy round the bowl, waiting until the Provost, agreeably to his own proposal, should mention the subject for which he had expressly introduced him to Mr. Maxwell of Summertrees.

Apparently the Provost had forgot his promise, or at least was in no great haste to fulfil it. He debated with great earnestness upon the stamp act, which was then impending over the American colonies, and upon other political subjects of the day, but said not a word of Redgauntlet. Alan soon saw that the investigation he meditated must advance, if at all, on his own special motion, and determined to proceed accordingly.

Acting upon this resolution, he took the first opportunity afforded by a pause in the discussion of colonial politics, to say, "I must remind you, Provost Crosbie, of your kind promise to procure some intelligence upon the subject I am so anxious about."

"Gadso!" said the Provost, after a moment's hesitation, "it is very true.—Mr. Maxwell, we wish to consult you on a piece of important business. You must know—indeed I think you must have heard, that the fishermen at Brokenburn, and higher up the Solway, have made a raid upon Quaker Geddes's stake-nets, and levelled all with the sands."

"In troth I heard it, Provost, and I was glad to hear the scoundrels had so much pluck left, as to right themselves against a fashion which would make the upper heritors a sort of clocking-hens, to hatch the fish that folk below them were to catch and eat."

"Well, sir," said Alan, "that is not the present point. But a young friend of mine was with Mr. Geddes at the time this violent procedure took place, and he has not since been heard of. Now, our friend, the Provost, thinks that you may be able to advise."

Here he was interrupted by the Provost and Summertrees speaking out both at once, the first endeavouring to disclaim all interest in the question, and the last to evade giving an answer.

"No think!" said the Provost; "I never thought twice about it, Mr. Fairford; it was neither fish, nor flesh, nor salt herring of mine."

"And I able to advise!" said Mr. Maxwell of Summertrees; "what the devil can I advise you to do, excepting to send the bellman through the town to cry your lost sheep, as they do spaniel dogs or stray ponies?"

"With your pardon," said Alan, calmly, but resolutely, "I must ask a more serious answer."

"Why, Mr. Advocate," answered Summertrees, "I thought it was your business to give advice to the lieges, and not to take it from poor stupid country gentlemen."

"If not exactly advice, it is sometimes our duty to ask questions, Mr. Maxwell."

"Ay, sir, when you have your bag-wig and your gown on, we must allow you the usual privilege of both gown and petticoat, to ask what questions you please. But when you are out of your canonicals the case is altered. How come you, sir, to suppose that I have any business with this riotous proceeding, or should know more than you do what happened there? The question proceeds on an uncivil supposition."

"I will explain," said Alan, determined to give Mr. Maxwell no opportunity of breaking off the conversation. "You are an intimate of Mr. Redgauntlet—he is accused of having been engaged in this affray, and of having placed under forcible restraint the person of my friend, Darsie Latimer, a young man of property and consequence, whose fate I am here for the express purpose of investigating. This is the plain state of the case; and all parties concerned,—your friend, in particular,—will have reason to be thankful for the temperate manner in which it is my purpose to conduct the matter, if I am treated with proportionate frankness."

"You have misunderstood me," said Maxwell, with a tone changed to more composure; "I told you I was the friend of the late Sir Henry Redgauntlet, who was executed, in 1745, at Hairbie, near Carisle, but I know no one who at present bears the name of Redgauntlet."

"You know Mr. Herricks of Birrenswark," said Alan, smiling, "to whom the name of Redgauntlet belongs?"

Maxwell darted a keen reproachful look towards the Provost, but instantly smoothed his brow, and changed his tone to that of confidence and candour.

"You must not be angry, Mr. Fairford, that the poor persecuted nonjurors are a little upon the quire when such clever young men as you are making inquiries after us. I myself now, though I am quite out of the scrape, and may cock my hat at the Cross as I best like, sunshine or moonshine, have been yet so much accustomed to walk with the lap of my cloak cast over my face, that, faith, if a redcoat walk suddenly up to me, I wish for my wheel and whet-stone again for a moment. Now Redgauntlet, poor fellow, is far worse off—he is, you may have heard, still under the lash of the law,—the mark of the beast is still on his forehead, poor gentleman,—and that makes me cautious—very cautious—which I am sure there is no occasion to be towards you, as no-one of your appearance and manners would wish to trepan a gentleman under misfortune."

"On the contrary, sir," said Fairford, "I wish to afford Mr. Redgauntlet's friends an opportunity to get him out of the scrape, by procuring the instant liberation of my friend Darsie Latimer. I will engage, that if he has sustained no greater bodily harm than a short confinement, the matter may be passed over quietly, without inquiry; but to attain this end, so desirable for the man who has committed a great and recent infraction of the laws, which he had before grievously offended, very speedy reparation of the wrong must be rendered."

Maxwell seemed lost in reflection, and exchanged a glance or two, not of the most comfortable or congratulatory kind, with his host the Provost. Fairford rose and walked about the room, to allow them an opportunity of conversing together; for he was in hopes that the impression he had visibly made upon Summertrees was likely to ripen into something favourable to his purpose. They took the opportunity, and engaged in whispers to each other, eagerly and reproachfully on the part of the Laird, while the Provost answered in an embarrassed and apologetical tone. Some broken words of the conversation reached Fairford, whose presence they seemed to forget, as he stood at the bottom of the room, apparently intent upon examining the figures upon a fine Indian screen, a present to the Provost from his brother, captain of a vessel in the Company's service. What he overheard made it evident that his errand, and the obstinacy with which he pursued it, occasioned altercation between the whisperers.

Maxwell at length let out the words, "A good fright; and so send him home with his tail scalded, like a dog that has come a privateering on strange premises."

The Provost's negative was strongly interposed—"Not to be thought of"—"making bad worse"—"my situation"—"my utility"—"you cannot conceive how obstinate—just like his father."

They then whispered more closely, and at length the Provost raised his drooping crest, and spoke in a cheerful tone. "Come, sit down to your glass, Mr. Fairford: we have laid our heads together, and you shall see it will not be our fault if you are not quite pleased, and Mr. Darrie Latimer let loose to take his fiddle under his neck again. But Summertrees thinks it will require you to put yourself into some bodily risk, which maybe you may not be so keen of."

"Gentlemen," said Fairford, "I will not certainly shun any risk by which my object may be accomplished; but I bind it on your consciences—on yours, Mr. Maxwell, as a man of honour and a gentleman; and on yours, Provost, as a magistrate and a loyal subject, that you do not mislead me in this matter."

"Nay, as for me," said Summertrees, "I will tell you the truth at once, and fairly own that I can certainly find you the means of seeing Redgauntlet, poor man; and that I will do, if you require it, and conjure him also to treat you as your errand requires; but poor Redgauntlet is much changed—indeed, to say truth, his temper never was the best in the world; however, I will warrant you from any very great danger."

"I will warrant myself from such," said Fairford, "by carrying a proper force with me."

"Indeed," said Summertrees, "you will do no such thing; for, in the first place, do you think that we will deliver up the poor fellow into the hands of the Philistines, when, on the contrary, my only reason for furnishing you with the clew I am to put into your hands, is to settle the matter amicably on all sides? And secondly, his intelligence is so good, that were you coming near him with soldiers, or constables, or the like, I shall answer for it, you will never lay salt on his tail."

Fairford mused for a moment. He considered, that to gain sight of this man, and knowledge of his friend's condition, were advantages to be purchased at every personal risk; and he saw plainly, that were he to take the course most safe for himself, and call in the assistance of the law, it was clear he would either be deprived of the intelligence necessary to guide him, or that Redgauntlet would be apprized of his danger, and might probably leave the country, carrying his captive along with him. He therefore repeated, "I put myself on your honour, Mr. Maxwell; and I will go alone to visit your friend. I have little doubt I shall find him amenable to reason; and that I shall receive from him a satisfactory account of Mr. Latimer."

"I have little doubt that you will," said Mr. Maxwell of Summertrees; "but still I think it will be only in the long run, and after having sustained some delay and inconvenience. My warrant goes no farther."

"I will take it as it is given," said Alan Fairford. "But let me ask, would it not be better, since you value your friend's safety so highly, and surely would not willingly compromise mine, that the Provost or you should go with me to this man, if he is within any reasonable distance, and try to make him hear reason?"

"Me!—I will not go my foot's length," said the Provost; "and that, Mr. Alan, you may be well assured of, Mr. Redgauntlet is my wife's fourth cousin, that is undeniable; but were he the last of her kin and mine both, it would ill befit my office to be communing with rebels."

"Ay, or drinking with nonjurors," said Maxwell, filling his glass. "I would as soon expect to have met Claverhouse at a field-preaching. And as for myself, Mr. Fairford, I cannot go, for just the opposite reason. It would be infra dig. in the Provost of this most flourishing and loyal town to associate with Redgauntlet; and for me, it would be noctitur a socio. There would be post to London, with the tidings that two such Jacobites as Redgauntlet and I had met on a braced—the Habeas Corpus would be suspended—same would sound a charge from Carlisle to the Land's-End—and who knows but the very wind of the rumour might blow my estate from between my fingers, and my body over Errickstane-brae again? No, no; bide a gliff—I will go into the Provost's closet, and write a letter to Redgauntlet, and direct you how to deliver it."

"There is pen and ink in the office," said the Provost, pointing to the door of an inner apartment, in which he had his walnut-tree desk, and east-country cabinet.

"A pen that can write, I hope?" said the old Laird.

"It can write and spell baith,—in right hands," answered the Provost as the Laird retired and shut the door behind him.

CHAPTER XII.

THE room was no sooner deprived of Mr. Maxwell of Summertrees's presence, than the Provost looked very warily above, beneath, and around the apartment, hitched his chair towards that of his remaining guest, and began to speak in a whisper which could not have startled "the smallest mouse that creeps on floor."

"Mr. Fairford," said he, "you are a good lad; and, what is more, you are my auld friend your father's son. Your father has been agent for this burgh for years, and has a good deal to say with the council; so there have been a sort of obligations between him and me; it may have been now on this side and now on that; but obligations there have been. I am but a plain man, Mr. Fairford; but I hope you understand me?"

"I believe you mean me well, Provost; and I am sure," replied Fairford, "you can never better show your kindness than on this occasion."

"That's it—that's the very point I would be at, Mr. Alan," replied the Provost; "besides, I am, as becomes well my situation, a staunch friend to Kirk and King, meaning this present establishment in church and state; and so, as I was saying, you may command my best—advice."

"I hope for your assistance and co-operation also," said the youth.

"Certainly, certainly," said the wary magistrate. "Well, now, you see one may love the Kirk, and yet not ride on the rigging of it; and one may love the King, and yet not be cramming him eternally down the throat of the unhappy folk that may chance to like another King better. I have friends and connexions among them, Mr. Fairford, as your father may have clients—they are flesh and blood like ourselves, these poor Jacobite bodies—sons of Adam and Eve, after all; and therefore—I hope you understand me?—I am a plain-spoken man."

"I am afraid I do not quite understand you," said Fairford; "and if you have any thing to say to me in private, my dear Provost, you had better come quickly out with it, for the Laird of Summertrees must finish his letter in a minute or two."

"Not a bit, man—Pate is a lang-headed fellow, but his pen does not clear the paper as his greyhound does the Tinwald-furs. I gave him a wiper about that, if you noticed; I can say any thing to Pate-in-Peril—Indeed, he is my wife's near kinsman."

"But your advice, Provost," said Alan, who perceived that, like a shy horse, the worthy magistrate always started off from his own purpose just when he seemed approaching to it.

"Weel, you shall have it in plain terms, for I am a plain man.—Ye see, we will suppose that any friend like yourself were in the deepest hole of the Nith, and making a sprattle for your life. Now you see, such being the case, I have little chance of helping you, being a fat, short-armed man, and no swimmer."

too young a man yet for stoup and bicker; but I hope you will not tell the Edinburgh fine folk that the Provost has scrimped you of your cogie, as the sang says?"

"I am much obliged for the Provost's kindness, and yours, madam," replied Alan; "but the truth is, I have still a long ride before me this evening, and the sooner I am on horseback the better."

"This evening?" said the Provost, anxiously; "had you not better take daylight with you to-morrow morning?"

"Mr. Fairford will ride as well in the cool of the evening," said Sunnertrees, taking the word out of Alan's mouth.

The Provost said no more, nor did his wife ask any questions, nor testify any surprise at the suddenness of their guest's departure.

Having drank tea, Alan Fairford took leave with the usual ceremony. The Laird of Sunnertrees seemed studious to prevent any further communication between him and the Provost, and remained lounging on the landing-place of the stair while they made their adieus—heard the Provost ask if Alan proposed a speedy return, and the latter reply, that his stay was uncertain, and witnessed the parting shake of the hand, which, with a pressure more warm than usual, and a tremulous, "God bless and prosper you!" Mr. Crosbie bestowed on his young friend. Maxwell even strolled with Fairford as far as the George, although resisting all his attempts at further inquiry into the affairs of Redgauntlet, and referring him to Tom Trumbull, alias Turnpenny, for the particulars which he might find it necessary to inquire into.

At length Alan's hack was produced; an animal long in neck, and high in bone, accoutred with a pair of saddle-bags containing the rider's travelling wardrobe. Proudly surmounting his small stock of necessities, and no way ashamed of a mode of travelling which a modern Mr. Silvertongue would consider as the last of degradations, Alan Fairford took leave of the old Jacobite, Pate-in-Peril, and set forward on the road to the royal burgh of Annan. His reflections during his ride were none of the most pleasant. He could not disguise from himself that he was venturing rather too rashly into the power of outlawed and desperate persons; for with such only, a man in the situation of Redgauntlet could be supposed to associate. There were other grounds for apprehension. Several marks of intelligence betwixt Mrs. Crosbie and the Laird of Sunnertrees had not escaped Alan's acute observation; and it was plain that the Provost's inclinations towards him, which he believed to be sincere and good, were not firm enough to withstand the influence of this league between his wife and friend. The Provost's adieus, like Macbeth's amen, had stuck in his throat, and seemed to intimate that he apprehended more than he dare give utterance to.

Laying all these matters together, Alan thought, with no little anxiety, on the celebrated lines of Shakespeare,

— "A drop,
That in the ocean seeks another drop," &c.

But pertinacity was a strong feature in the young lawyer's character. He was, and always had been, totally unlike the "horse hot at hand," who tires before noon through his own over eager exertions in the beginning of the day. On the contrary, his first efforts seemed frequently inadequate to accomplishing his purpose, whatever that for the time might be; and it was only as the difficulties of the task increased, that his mind seemed to acquire the energy necessary to combat and subdue them. If, therefore, he went anxiously forward upon his uncertain and perilous expedition, the reader must acquit him of all idea, even in a passing thought, of the possibility of abandoning his search, and resigning Darsie Latimer to his destiny.

A couple of hours riding brought him to the little town of Annan, situated on the shores of the Solway, between eight and nine o'clock. The sun had set, but the day was not yet ended; and when he had alighted and seen his horse properly cared for at the principal inn of the place, he was readily directed to Mr. Maxwell's friend, old Tom Trumbull, with whom every body seemed well acquainted. He endeavoured to fish out from the lad that acted as a guide, something of this man's situation and profession; but the general expressions of "a very decent man"—"a very honest body"—"weel to pass in the world," and such like, were all that could be extracted from him; and while Fairford was following up the investigation with closer interrogatories, the lad put an end to them by knocking at the door of Mr. Trumbull, whose decent dwelling was a little distance from the town, and considerably nearer to the sea. It was one of a little row of houses running down to the water-side, and having gardens and other accommodations behind. There was heard within the uplifting of a Scottish psalm; and the boy saying, "They are at exercise, sir," gave intimation they might not be admitted till prayers were over.

When, however, Fairford repeated the summons with the end of his whip, the singing ceased, and Mr. Trumbull himself, with his psalm-book in his hand, kept open by the insertion of his forefinger between the leaves, came to demand the meaning of this unseasonable interruption.

Nothing could be more different than his whole appearance seemed to be from the confidant of a desperate man, and the associate of outlaws in their unlawful enterprises. He was a tall, thin, bony figure, with white hair combed straight down on each side of his face, and an iron-gray hue of complexion; where the lines or rather, as Quin said of Macklin, the cordage, of his countenance were so sternly adapted to a devotional and even ascetic expression, that they left no room for any indication of reckless daring, or sly dissimulation. In short, Trumbull appeared a perfect specimen of the rigid old Covenanter, who said only what he thought right, acted on no other principle but that of duty, and, if he committed errors, did so under the full impression that he was serving God rather than man.

"Do you want me sir?" he said to Fairford, whose guide had slunk to the rear, as if to escape the rebuke of the severe old man,— "We were engaged, and it is the Saturday night."

Alan Fairford's preconceptions were so much deranged by this man's appearance and manner that he stood for a moment bewildered, and would as soon have thought of giving a cant pass-word to a clergyman descending from the pulpit, as to the respectable father of a family just interrupted in his prayers for and with the objects of his care. Hastily concluding Mr. Maxwell had passed some idle jest on him, or rather that he had mistaken the person to whom he was directed, he asked if he spoke to Mr. Trumbull.

"To Thomas Trumbull," answered the old man— "What may be your business, sir?" And he glanced his eye to the book he held in his hand, with a sigh like that of a saint desirous of dissolution.

"Do you know Mr. Maxwell of Sunnertrees?" said Fairford.

"I have heard of such a gentleman in the countryside, but have no acquaintance with him," answered Mr. Trumbull; "he is, as I have heard, a Papiet; for the whore that sitteth on the seven hills ceaseth not yet to pour forth the cup of her abomination on these parts."

"Yet he directed me hither, my good friend," said Alan. "Is there another of your name in this town of Annan?"

"None," replied Mr. Trumbull, "a ~~ince~~ worthy father was removed; he was indeed a shining light.— I wish you good-even, sir."

"Stay one single instant," said Fairford; "this is a matter of life and death."

"Not more than the casting the burden of our sins where they should be laid," said Thomas Trumbull, about to shut the door in the inquirer's face.

"Do you know," said Alan Fairford, "the Laird of Redgauntlet?"

"Now Heaven defend me from treason and rebellion!" exclaimed Trumbull. "Young gentleman, you are importunate. I live here among my own people, and do not consort with Jacobites and mass-mongers."

He seemed about to shut the door, but did not shut it, a circumstance which did not escape Alan's notice.

"Mr. Redgauntlet is sometimes," he said, "called Herries of Birrenswark; perhaps you may know him under that name."

"Friend, you are uncivil," answered Mr. Trumbull; "honest men have enough to do to keep one name undefiled. I ken nothing about those who have two. Good-even to you, friend."

He was now about to slam the door in his visiter's face without further ceremony, when Alan, who had observed symptoms that the name of Redgauntlet did not seem altogether so indifferent to him as he pretended, arrested his purpose by saying, in a low voice, "At least you can tell me what age the moon is?"

The old man started, as if from a trance, and, before answering, surveyed the querist with a keen penetrating glance, which seemed to say, "Are you really in possession of this key to my confidence, or do you speak from mere accident?"

To this keen look of scrutiny, Fairford replied by a smile of intelligence.

The iron muscles of the old man's face did not, however, relax, as he dropped, in a careless manner, the countersign, "Not light enough to land a cargo."

"Then plague of all Aberdeen Almanacks!"

"And plague of all fools that waste time," said Thomas Trumbull. "Could you not have said as much at first?—And standing wasting time, and encouraging lookers-on, in the open street too? Come in by—in by."

He drew his visiter into the dark entrance of the house, and shut the door carefully; then putting his head into an apartment which the murmurs within announced to be filled with the family, he said aloud, "A work of necessity and mercy—Malachi, take the book—you will sing six double verses of the hundred and nineteen—and you may lecture out of the Lamentations. And, Malachi,"—this he said in an under tone,—“see you give them a screed of doctrine that will last them till I come back; or else these inconsiderate lads will be out of the house, and away to the public, wasting their precious time, and, it may be, putting themselves in the way of missing the morning tide."

An articulate answer from within intimated Malachi's acquiescence in the commands imposed; and Mr. Trumbull, shutting the door, muttered something about fast bind, fast find, turned the key, and put it into his pocket; and then bidding his visiter have a care of his steps, and make no noise, he led him through the house, and out at a back-door, into a little garden. Here a plaited alley conducted them, without the possibility of their being seen by any neighbour, to a door in the garden-wall, which being opened, proved to be a private entrance into a three-stalled stable; in one of which was a horse, that whinnied on their entrance. "Hush, hush!" cried the old man, and presently seconded his exhortations to silence by throwing a handful of corn into the manger, and the horse soon converted his acknowledgement of their presence into the usual sound of munching and grinding his provender.

As the light was now failing fast, the old man, with much more alertness than might have been expected from the rigidity of his figure, closed the window-shutters in an instant, produced phosphorus and matches, and lighted a stable-lantern, which he placed on the coal bin, and then addressed Fairford. "We are private here, young man; and as some time has been wasted already, you will be so kind as to tell me what is your errand. Is it about the way of business, or the other job?"

"My business with you, Mr. Trumbull, is to request you will find me the means of delivering this letter, from Mr. Maxwell of Summertrees to the Laird of Redgauntlet."

"Humph—fashious job!—Pate Maxwell will still be the auld man—always Pate-in-Peril—Craig-in-Peril, for what I know. Let me see the letter from him."

He examined it with much care, turning it up and down, and looking at the seal very attentively. "All's right, I see; it has the private mark for haste and speed. I bless my Maker that I am no great man, or great man's fellow; and so I think no more of these passages than just to help them forward in the way of business. You are an utter stranger in these parts, I warrant?"

Fairford answered in the affirmative.

"Ay—I never saw them make a wiser choice—I must call some one to direct you what to do—Stay, we must go to him, I believe. You are well recommended to me, friend, and doubtless trust; otherwise you may see more than I would like to show, or am in the use of showing in the common line of business."

Saying this, he placed his lantern on the ground, beside the post of one of the empty stalls, drew up a small spring-bolt which secured it to the floor, and then forcing the post to one side, discovered a small trap-door. "Follow me," he said, and dived into the subterranean descent to which this secret aperture gave access.

Fairford plunged after him, not without apprehensions of more kinds than one, but still resolved to prosecute the adventure.

The descent, which was not above six feet, led to a very narrow passage, which seemed to have been constructed for the precise purpose of excluding every one who chanced to be an inch more in girth than was his conductor. A small vaulted room, of about eight feet square, received them at the end of this lane. Here Mr. Trumbull left Fairford alone, and returned for a instant, as he said, to shut his concealed trap-door.

Fairford liked not his departure, as it left him a utter darkness; besides that his breathing was much affected by a strong and stifling smell of spirits, and other articles of a savour more powerful than agreeable to the lungs. He was very glad, therefore, when he heard the returning steps of Mr. Trumbull, who, when once more by his side, opened a strong, though narrow door in the wall, and conveyed Fairford to an immense magazine of spirit-casks, and other articles of contraband trade.

There was a small light at the end of this range of well-stocked subterranean vaults, which, upon a low whistle, began to flicker and move towards them. An undefined figure, holding a dark lantern, with the light averted, approached them, whom Mr. Trumbull thus addressed:—"Why were you not at work on Job; and this Saturday at e'en?"

"Swanston was loading the Jenny, sir; and I stayed to serve out the article."

"True—a work of necessity, and in the way of business. Does the Jumping Jenny sail this tide?"

"Ay, ay, sir; she sails for"—

"I did not ask you where she sailed for, Job," said the old gentleman, interrupting him. "I thank my Maker, I know nothing of their meetings or outgoings. I sell my article fairly and in the ordinary way of business; and I wash my hands of every thing else. But what I wished to know is, whether the gentleman called the Laird of the Solway Lakes is on the other side of the Border even now?"

"Ay, ay," said Job, "the Laird is something on my own line, you know—a little contraband or so. There is a statute for him—But no matter; he took the sands after the splore at the Quaker's fish-trap yonder; for he has a loyal heart the Laird, and is always true to the country-side. But avast—a snug here?"

So saying, he suddenly turned on Alan Fairford: the light side of the lantern he carried, which, by the transient gleam which it threw in passing on the man who bore it, saw a huge figure, upwards of six feet high, with a rough hairy cap on his head, and a set of features corresponding to his bulky frame. He thought also he observed pistols at his belt.

"I will answer for this gentleman," said Mr. Trumbull; "he must be brought to speech of the Laird."

"That will be kittle steering," said the subordinate personage; "for I understood that the Laird and his folk were no sooner on the other side than the last sharks were on them, and some mounted lobsters from Carlisle; and so they were obliged to split and squander. There are new brooms out to sweep the country of them they say; for the brush was a hard one; and they say there was a lad drowned;—he was not one of the Laird's gang, so there was the less matter."

"Peace! prithce, peace, Job Rutledge," said honest, pacific Mr. Trumbull. "I wish thou couldst remember, man, that I desire to know nothing of your roars and splores, your brooms and brushes. I dwell here among my own people; and I sell my commodity to him who comes in the way of business; and so wash my hands of all consequences, as becomes a quiet subject and an honest man. I never take payment, save in ready money."

"Ay, ay," muttered he with the lantern, "your worship, Mr. Trumbull, understands that in the way of business."

"Well, I hope you will one day know, Job," answered Mr. Trumbull, "the comfort of a conscience void of offence, and that fears neither gauger nor collector, neither excise nor customs. The business is to pass this gentleman to Cumberland upon earnest business, and to procure him speech with the Laird of the Solway Lakes—I suppose that can be done? Now I think Nanty Ewart, if he sails with the brig this morning tide, is the man to set him forward."

"Ay, ay, truly as he," said Job; "never man knew the border, dale and fell, pasture and ploughland, better than Nanty; and he can always bring him to the Laird, too, if you are sure the gentleman's right. But indeed that's his own look-out; for were he the best man in Scotland, and the chairman of the d—d Board to boot, and had fifty men at his back, he were as well not visit the Laird for any thing but good. As for Nanty, he is word and blow, a d—d deal fiercer than Christie Nixon that they keep such a din about. I have seen them both tried, by—"

Fairford now found himself called upon to say something; yet his feelings, upon finding himself thus completely in the power of a canting hypocrite, and of his retainer, who had so much the air of a determined ruffian, joined to the strong and abominable fume which they smothered up with indifference, while it almost deprived him of respiration, combined to render utterance difficult. He stated, however, that he had no evil intentions towards the Laird, as they called him, but was only the bearer of a letter to him on particular business, from Mr. Maxwell of Summertrees.

"Ay, ay," said Job, "that may be well enough; and if Mr. Trumbull is satisfied that the serve is right, why, we will give you a cast in the Jumping Jenny this tide, and Nanty Ewart will put you on a way of finding the Laird, I warrant you."

"I may for the present return, I presume, to the inn where I have left my horse?" said Fairford.

"With pardon," replied Mr. Trumbull, "you have been over far ben with us for that; but Job will take you to a place where you may sleep rough till he calls you. I will bring you what little baggage you can need—for those who go on such errands must not be dainty. I will myself see after your horse, for a merciful man is more fit to his beast—a matter too often forgotten in our way of business."

"Wiv, Master Trumbull," replied Job, "you know that when we are cased, it's no time to shorten sail, and so the boys deride whig and spur." He stopped in his speech, observing the old man had vanished through the door by which he had entered. "That's always the way with old Turpenny," he said to Fairford; "he cares for nothing of the trade but the profit—now, de me, if I don't think the fun of it is better worth while. But come along, my fine chap; I must stow you away in safety until it is time to go aboard."

FAIRFORD followed his gruff guide among a labyrinth of barrels and puncheons, on which he had more than once like to have broken his nose, and from thence into what, by the glimpse of the passing lantern upon a desk and writing materials, seemed to be a small office for the despatch of business. Here there appeared no exit; but the smuggler, or smuggler's ally, availing himself of a ladder, seven feet from the ground, and Fairford, still following Job, was involved in another tortuous and dark passage, which involuntarily reminded him of Peter Peables's lawsuit. At the end of this labyrinth, when he had little guess where he had been conducted, and was, according to the French phrase, totally desorienté, Job suddenly set down the lantern, and availing himself of the flame to light two candles which stood on the table, asked if Alan would choose any thing to eat, recommending, at all events, a slug of brandy, to keep out the night air. Fairford declined both, but inquired after his baggage.

"The old master will take care of that himself," said Job Rutledge; and drawing back in the direction in which he had entered, he vanished from the further end of the apartment, by a mode which the candles, still shedding an imperfect light, gave Alan no means of ascertaining. Thus the adventurous young lawyer was left alone in the apartment to which he had been conducted by so singular a passage.

In this condition, it was Alan's first employment to survey, with some accuracy, the place where he was; and accordingly, having trimmed the lights, he walked slowly round the apartment, examining its appearance and dimensions. It seemed to be such a small dining-parlour as is usually found in the house of the better class of artisans, shopkeepers, and such persons, having a recess at the upper end, and the usual furniture of an ordinary description. He found a door, which he endeavoured to open, but it was locked on the outside. A corresponding door on the same side of the apartment admitted him into a closet, upon the front shelves of which were punch-bowls, glasses, tea-cups, and the like, while on one side was hung a horseman's great-coat of the coarsest materials, with two great horse-pistols peeping out of the pocket, and on the floor stood a pair of well-spattered jack-boots, the usual equipment of the time, at least for long journeys.

Not greatly liking the contents of the closet, Alan Fairford shut the door, and resumed his scrutiny round the walls of the apartment, in order to discover the mode of Job Rutledge's retreat. The secret passage was, however, too artificially concealed, and the young lawyer had nothing better to do than to meditate on the singularity of his present situation. He had long known that the excise laws had occasioned an active contraband trade betwixt Scotland and England, which then, as now, existed, and will continue to exist, until the utter abolition of the wretched system which establishes an inequality of duties betwixt the different parts of the same kingdom; a system, be it said in passing, mightily resembling the conduct of a pugilist, who should tie up one arm that he might fight the better with the other. But Fairford was unprepared for the expensive and regular establishments by which the illicit traffic was carried on, and could not have conceived that the capital employed in it should have been adequate to the erection of these extensive buildings, with all their contrivances for secrecy of communication. He was musing on these circumstances, not without some anxiety for the progress of his own journey, when suddenly, as he lifted his eyes, he discovered old Mr. Trumbull at the upper end of the apartment, bearing in one hand a small bundle, in the other his dark lantern, the light of which, as he advanced, he directed full upon Fairford's countenance.

Though such an apparition was exactly what he expected, yet he did not see the grim, stern old man present himself thus suddenly without emotion; especially when he recollected, what to a youth of his pious education was peculiarly shocking, that the grizzled hypocrite was probably that instant arisen from his knees to Heaven, for the purpose of engaging in the mysterious transactions of a desperate and illegal trade.

The old man accustomed to judge with ready sharpness of the physiognomy of those with whom he had business, did not fail to remark something like agitation in Fairford's demeanour. "Have ye taken the rue?" said he. "Will ye take the sheaf from the mare, and give up the venture?"

"Never!" said Fairford, firmly, stimulated at once by his natural spirit, and the recollection of his friend; "never, while I have life and strength to follow it out!"

"I have brought you," said Trumbull, "a clean shirt and some stockings, which is all the baggage you can conveniently carry, and I will cause one of the lads lend you a horseman's coat, for it is ill sailing or riding without one; and, touching your valise, it will be as safe in my poor house, were it full of the gold of Ophir, as if it were in the depth of the mine."

"I have no doubt of it," said Fairford.

"And now," said Trumbull, again, "I pray you to tell me by what name I am to name you to Nanty [which is Antony] Ewart?"

"By the name of Alan Fairford," answered the young lawyer.

"But that," said Mr. Trumbull, in reply, "is your own proper name and surname."

"And what other should I give?" said the young man; "do you think I have any occasion for an alias? And, besides, Mr. Trumbull," added Alan, thinking a little railleury might intimate confidence of spirit, "you blessed yourself, but a little while since, that you had no acquaintance with those who defiled their names so far as to be obliged to change them."

"True, very true," said Mr. Trumbull; "nevertheless, young man, my gray hairs stand unreprieved in this matter; for, in my line of business, when I sit under my vine and my fig-tree, exchanging the strong waters of the north for the gold which is the price thereof, I have, I thank Heaven, no disguises to keep with any man, and wear my own name of Thomas Trumbull, without any chance that the same may be polluted. Whereas, thou, who art to journey in miry ways, and amongst a strange people, mayst do well to have two names, as thou hast two shirts, the one to keep the other clean."

Here he emitted a chuckling grunt, which lasted for two vibrations of the pendulum exactly, and was the only approach towards laughter in which old Turnpenny, as he was nicknamed, was ever known to indulge.

"You are witty, Mr. Trumbull," said Fairford; "but jests are no arguments—I shall keep my own name."

"At your own pleasure," said the merchant; "there is but one name which," &c. &c. &c.

We will not follow the hypocrite through the impious cant which he added, in order to close the subject.

Alan followed him, in silent abhorrence to the recess in which the beaufet was placed, and which was so artificially made as to conceal another of those traps with which the whole building abounded. This concealment admitted them to the same winding passage by which the young lawyer had been brought thither. The path which they now took amid these mazes, differed from the direction in which he had been guided by Rutledge. It led upwards, and terminated beneath a garret window. Trumbull opened it, and with more agility than his age promised, clambered out upon the leads. If Fairford's journey had been hitherto in a stifled and subterranean atmosphere, it was now open, lofty, and airy enough; for he had to follow his guide over leads and slates, which the old smuggler traversed with the dexterity of a cat. It is true his course was facilitated by knowing exactly where certain stepping-places and holdfasts were placed, of which Fairford could not so readily avail himself; but, after a difficult and somewhat perilous progress along the roofs of two or three houses, they at length descended by a skylight into a garret room, and from thence by the stairs into a public-house; for such it appeared by the ringing of bells, whistling for waiters and attendance, bawling of "House, house, here!" chorus of sea songs, and the like noises.

Having descended to the second story, and entered a room there, in which there was a light, old Mr. Trumbull rung the bell of the apartment thrice, with an interval betwixt each, during which, he told deliberately the number twenty. Immediately after the third ringing the landlord appeared, with stealthy step, and an appearance of mystery on his buxom visage. He greeted Mr. Trumbull, who was his landlord as it proved, with great respect, and expressed some surprise at seeing him so late, as he termed it, "on Saturday at e'en."

"And I Robin Hastie," said the landlord to the tenant, "am more surprised than pleased, to hear the muckle din in your house, Robie, so near the honourable Sabbath; and I must mind you, that it is contravening the terms of your tack, which stipulate, that you should shut your public on Saturday at nine o'clock, at latest."

"Yes, sir," said Robin Hastie, no way alarmed at the gravity of the rebuke, "but you must take tent that I have admitted naebody but you, Mr. Trumbull, (who by the way admitted yourself,) since nine o'clock; for the most of the folk have been here for several hours about the lading, and so on, of the brig. It is not full tide yet, and I cannot put the men out into the street. If I did, they would go to some other public and their souls would be nae the better, and my purse muckle the waur; for how am I to pay the rent, if I do not sell the liquor?"

"Nay, then," said Thomas Trumbull, "if it is a work of necessity, and in the honest independent way of business, no doubt there is balm in Gilead. But prithee, Robin, wilt thou see if Nanty Ewart be as most likely, amongst these unhappy toppers; and let him step this way cannily, and speak to me and this young gentleman. And it's dry talking, Robin—you must minister to us a bowl of punch—ye ken my gage."

"From a mutchkin to a gallon, I ken your honour's taste, Mr. Thomas Trumbull," said mine host; "and ye shall hang me over the sign-post if there be a drop mair lemon or a curn less sugar than just suits you. There are three of you—you will be for the auld Scots peremptory pint-stoup* for the success of the voyage?"

"Better pray for it than drink for it, Robin," said Mr. Trumbull. "Yours is a dangerous trade, Robin; it hurts mony a ane—baith host and guest. But ye will get the blue bowl, Robin—the blue bowl—that will sloken all their drouth, and prevent the auld repetition of whipping for an eke of a Saturday at e'en. Ay, Robin it is a pity of Nanty Ewart—Nanty likes the turning up of his little finger unco weel, and we maunna stint him, Robin, so as we leave him sense to steer by."

"Nanty Ewart could steer through the Pentland Frith though he were as drunk as the Baluc Ocran," said Robin Hastie; and instantly tripping down stairs, he speedily returned with the materials for what he called his broust, which consisted of two English quarts of spirits, in a huge blue bowl, with all the ingredients for punch, in the same formidable proportion. At the same time he introduced Mr. Antony or Nanty Ewart, whose person, although he was a good deal flustered with liquor, was different from what Fairford expected. His dress was what is emphatically termed the shabby genteel—a frock with tarnished lace—a small cocked-hat, ornamented in a similar way—a scarlet waistcoat, with faded embroidery, breeches of the same, with silver knee-bands, and he wore a smart hanger and a pair of pistols in a sullied sword-belt.

"Here I come, patron," he said, shaking hands with Mr. Trumbull. "Well, I see you have got some gog aboard."

"It is not my custom, Mr. Ewart," said the old gentlemen, "as you well know, to become a chamberer or carouser thus late on Saturday at e'en; but I wanted to recommend to your attention a young friend."

*The Scottish pint of liquid measure comprehends four English measures of the same denomination. The fact is well-known of my poor countryman, who, driven to extremity by the railleury of the Southern, on the small denomination of the Scottish coin, at length answered, "Ay, ay! But the deil is them that has the least pint-stoup."

of ours, that is going upon a something particular journey, with a letter to our friend the Laird, from Pat-in-Peril, as they call him."

"Ay—indeed?—he must be in high trust for so young a gentleman.—I wish you joy, air," bowing to Fairford. "By'r Lady, as Shakspeare says, you are bringing up a neck to a fair end.—Come, patron, we will drink to Mr. What-shall-call-um—What is his name?—Did you tell me?—And have I forgot it already?"

"Mr. Alan Fairford," said Trumbull.

"Ay, Mr. Alan Fairford—a good name for a fair trader—Mr. Alan Fairford; and may he be long withheld from the topmost round of ambition, which I take to be the highest round of a certain ladder."

While he spoke, he seized the punch ladle, and began to fill the glasses. But Mr. Trumbull arrested his hand, until he had, as he expressed himself, sanctified the liquor by a long grace; during the pronouncement of which, he shut indeed his eyes, but his nostrils became dilated, as if he were snuffing up the fragrant beverage with peculiar complacency.

When the grace was at length over, the three friends sat down to their beverage, and invited Alan Fairford to partake. Anxious about his situation, and disgusted as he was with his company, he craved, and with difficulty obtained permission, under the allegation of being fatigued, heated, and the like, to stretch himself on a couch which was in the apartment, and attempted at least to procure some rest before high water, when the vessel was to sail.

He was at length permitted to use his freedom, and stretched himself on the couch, having his eyes for some time fixed on the jovial party he had left, and straining his ears to catch if possible a little of their conversation. This he soon found was to no purpose; for what did actually reach his ears was disguised so completely by the use of cant words, and the thieves Latin called slang, that even when he caught the words, he found himself as far as ever from the sense of their conversation. At length he fell asleep.

It was after Alan had slumbered for three or four hours, that he was awakened by voices bidding him rise up and prepare to be jogging. He started up accordingly, and found himself in presence of the same party of boon companions, who had just despatched their huge bowl of punch. To Alan's surprise, the liquor had made but little innovation on the brains of men, who were accustomed to drink at all hours, and in the most inordinate quantities. The landlord indeed spoke a little thick, and the texts of Mr. Thomas Trumbull stumbled on his tongue; but Nanty was one of those toppers, who, becoming early what bon vivants term flustered, remain whole nights and days at the same point of intoxication; and, in fact, as they are seldom entirely sober, can be as rarely seen absolutely drunk. Indeed, Fairford, had he not known how Ewart had been engaged whilst he himself was asleep, would almost have sworn when he awoke, that the man was more sober than when he first entered the room.

He was confirmed in this opinion when they descended below, where two or three sailors and ruffian-looking fellows awaited their commands. Ewart took the whole direction upon himself, gave his orders with briefness and precision, and looked to their being executed with the silence and celerity which that peculiar crisis required. All were now dismissed for the brig, which lay, as Fairford was given to understand, a little farther down the river, which is navigable for vessels of light burden, till almost within a mile of the town.

When they issued from the inn, the landlord bid them good-by. Old Trumbull walked a little way with them, but the air had probably considerable effect on the state of his brain; for, after reminding Alan Fairford that the next day was the honourable Sabbath, he became extremely excursive in an attempt to exhort him to keep it holy. At length, being perhaps sensible that he was becoming unintelligible, he thrust a volume into Fairford's hand—hiccupping at the same time—"Good book—good book—fine hymn-book—fit for the honourable Sabbath, whilk awaits us to-morrow morning."—Here the iron tongue of time told five from the town steeple of Annan, to the further confusion of Mr. Trumbull's already disordered ideas. "Ay? is Sunday come and gone already?—Heaven be praised! Only it is a marvel the afternoon is sae dark for the time of the year—Sabbath has slipped ower quietly, but we have reason to bless ourselfs it has not been altogether misemployed. I heard little of the preaching—a cauld moralist, I doubt, served that out—but, eh—the prayer—I mind it as if I had said the words mysell."—Here he repeated one or two petitions, which were probably a part of his family devotions, before he was summoned forth to what he called the way of business. "I never remember a Sabbath pass so cannily off in my life."—Then he recollected himself a little, and said to Alan, "You may read that book, Mr. Fairford, to-morrow, all the same, though it be Monday; for, you see, it was Saturday when we were together, and now it's Sunday, and it's dark night—so the Sabbath has slipped clean away through our fingers, like water through a sieve, which abideth not; and we have to begin again to-morrow morning, in the weariful, base, mean, earthly employments, whilk are unworthy of an immortal spirit—always excepting the way of business."

Three of the fellows were now returning to the town, and, at Ewart's command, they cut short the patriarch's exhortation, by leading him back to his own residence. The rest of the party then proceeded to the brig, which only waited their arrival to get under weigh and drop down the river. Nanty Ewart betook himself to steering the brig, and the very touch of the helm seemed to dispel the remaining influence of the liquor which he had drunk, since, through a troublesome and intricate channel, he was able to direct the course of his little vessel with the most perfect accuracy and safety.

Alan Fairford, for some time, availed himself of the clearness of the summer morning to gaze on the dimly seen shores betwixt which they glided, becoming less and less distinct as they receded from each other, until at length, having adjusted his little bundle by way of pillow, and wrapt around him the great-coat with which old Trumbull had equipped him, he stretched himself on the deck, to try to recover the slumber out of which he had been awakened. Sleep had scarce begun to settle on his eyes, ere he found something stirring about his person. With ready presence of mind he recollected his situation, and resolved to show no alarm until the purpose of this became obvious; but he was soon relieved from his anxiety, by finding it was only the result of Nanty's attention to his comfort, who was wrapping around him, as softly as he could, a great boat-cloak, in order to defend him from the morning air.

"Thou art but a cockerel," he muttered, "but 'twere pity thou wert knocked off the perch before seeing a little more of the sweet and sour of this world—though, faith, if thou hast the usual luck of it, the best way were to leave thee to the chance of a seasoning fever."

These words, and the awkward courtesy with which the skipper of the little brig tucked the sea-coat round Fairford, gave him a confidence of safety which he had not yet thoroughly possessed. He stretched himself in more security on the hard planks, and was speedily asleep, though his slumbers were feverish and unrefreshing.

It has been elsewhere intimated that Alan Fairford inherited from his mother a delicate constitution, with a tendency to consumption; and, being an only child, with such a cause for apprehension, care, to the verge of effeminacy, was taken to preserve him from damp beds, wet feet, and those various emergencies, to which the Caledonian boys of much higher birth, but more active habits, are generally accustomed. In man, the spirit sustains the constitutional weakness, as in the winged tribes the feathers bear aloft the body. But there is a bound to these supporting qualities; and as the pinions of the bird must at length grow weary, so the vis animi of the human struggler becomes broken down by continued fatigue.

When the voyager was awakened by the light of the sun now riding high in Heaven, he found himself eagerly, and with so much appearance of being refreshed, that Nanty Ewart swore he would have some too, and only laced it, as his phrase went, with a single glass of brandy.*

CHAPTER XIV.

WE left Alan Fairford on the deck of the little smuggling brig, in that disconsolate situation, when sickness and nausea attack a heated and fevered frame, and an anxious mind. His share of sea-sickness, however, was not so great as to engross his sensations entirely, or altogether to divert his attention from what was passing around. If he could not delight in the swiftness and agility with which the "little frigate" walked the waves, or amuse himself by noticing the beauty of the sea-views around him, where the distant Skiddaw raised his brow, as if in defiance of the clouded eminence of Criffel, which lorded it over the Scottish side of the estuary, he had spirits and composure enough to pay particular attention to the master of the vessel, on whose character his own safety in all probability was dependent.

Nanty Ewart had now given the helm to one of his people, a bald-pated, grizzled old fellow, whose whole life had been spent in evading the revenue laws, with now and then the relaxation of a few months' imprisonment, for deforcing officers, resisting seizures, and the like offences.

Nanty himself sat down by Fairford, helped him to his tea, with such other refreshments as he could think of, and seemed in his way sincerely desirous to make his situation as comfortable as things admitted. Fairford had thus an opportunity to study his countenance and manners more closely.

It was plain, Ewart, though a good seaman, had not been bred upon that element. He was a reasonably good scholar, and seemed fond of showing it, by recurring to the subject of Sallust and Juvenal; while, on the other hand, sea-phrases seldom chequered his conversation. He had been in person what is called a smart little man; but the tropical sun had burnt his originally fair complexion to a dusty red; and the bile which was diffused through his system, had stained it with a yellowish black—what ought to have been the white part of his eyes, in particular, had a hue as deep as the topaz. He was very thin, or rather emaciated, and his countenance, though still indicating alertness and activity, showed a constitution exhausted with excessive use of his favourite stimulus.

"I see you look at me hard," said he to Fairford. "Had you been an officer of the d—d customs, my terriers' backs would have been up." He opened his breast, and showed Alan a pair of pistols disposed between his waistcoat and jacket, placing his finger at the same time upon the cock of one of them. "But come, you are an honest fellow, though you're a close

* I am sorry to say, that the modes of concealment described in the imaginary premises of Mr. Trumbull, are of a kind which have been common on the frontiers of late years. The neighbourhood of two nations having different laws, though united in government, still leads to a multitude of transgressions on the border, and extreme difficulty in apprehending delinquents. About twenty years since, as far as my recollection serves, there was along the frontier an organized gang of coiners, forgers, smugglers, and other malefactors, whose operations were conducted on a scale not inferior to what is here described. The chief of the party was one Richard Mendham, a carpenter, who rose to opulence, although ignorant even of the arts of reading and writing. But he had found a short road to wealth, and had taken singular measures for conducting his operations. Amongst these, he found means to build, in the suburb of Berwick called Spittal, a street of small houses, as if for the investment of property. He himself inhabited one of these; another, a species of public-house, was open to his confederates, who held secret and unsuspected communication with him by crossing the roofs of the intervening houses, and descending by a trap-stair, which admitted them into the alcove of the diningroom of Dick Mendham's private mansion. A vault, too, beneath Mendham's stable, was accessible in the manner mentioned in the novel. The post of one of the stalls turned round on a bolt being withdrawn, and gave admittance to a subterranean place of concealment for contraband and stolen goods, to a great extent. Richard Mendham, the head of this very formidable conspiracy, which involved malefactors of every kind, was tried and executed at Jedburgh, where the author was present as Sheriff of Selkirkshire. Mendham had previously been tried, but escaped by want of proof and the ingenuity of his counsel.

one. I dare say you think me a queer customer; but I can tell you, they that see the ship leave harbour, know but little of the seas she is to sail through. My father, honest old gentleman, never would have thought to see me master of the Jumping Jenny."

Fairford said, it seemed very clear indeed that Mr. Ewart's education was far superior to the line he at present occupied.

"O, Criffel to Solway Moss!" said the other. "Why, man, I should have been an expounder of the word, with a wig like a snow-wreath, and a stipend like—like—like a hundred pounds a-year, I suppose. I can spend thrice as much as that, though, being such as I am." Here he sung a scrap of an old Northumbrian ditty, mimicking the burr of the natives of that county:—

"Willy Foster's gone to sea,
Siller buckles at his knee,
He'll come back and marry me—
Canny Willy Foster."

"I have no doubt," said Fairford, "your present occupation is more lucrative; but I should have thought the church might have been more"——

He stopped, recollecting that it was not his business to say any thing disagreeable.

"More respectable, you mean, I suppose?" said Ewart, with a sneer, and squirting the tobacco-juice through his front teeth; then was silent for a moment, and proceeded in a tone of candour which some internal touch of conscience dictated. "And so it would, Mr. Fairford—and happier, too, by a thousand degrees—though I have had my pleasures too. But there was my father, (God bless the old man!) a true chip of the old Presbyterian block, walked his parish like a captain on the quarter-deck, and was always ready to do good to rich and poor—Off went the laird's hat to the minister, as fast as the poor man's bonnet. When the eye saw him—Pshaw! what have I to do with that now?—Yes, he was, as Virgil hath it, 'Vir sapientia et pietate gravis.' But he might have been the wiser man, had he kept me at home, when he sent me at nineteen to study Divinity at the head of the highest stair in the Covenant-Close. It was a cursed mistake in the old gentleman. What though Mrs. Cantrips of Kittlebasket (for she wrote herself no less) was our cousin five times removed, and took me on that account to board and lodging, at six shillings, instead of seven shillings a-week? it was a d—d bad saving, as the case proved. Yet her very dignity might have kept me in order: for she never read a chapter excepting out of a Cambridge Bible, printed by Daniel, and bound in embroidered velvet. I think I see it at this moment! And on Sundays, when we had a quart of twopenny ale, instead of buttermilk, to our porridge, it was always served up in a silver posset-dish. Also she used silver-mounted spectacles, whereas even my father's were cased in mere horn. These things had their impression at first, but we get used to grandeur by degrees. Well, sir!—Gad, I can scarce get on with my story—it sticks in my throat—must take a trifle to wash it down.—Well, this dame had a daughter—Jess Cantrips, a black-eyed, bouncing wench—and, as the devil would have it, there was the d—d five-story stair—her foot was never from it, whether I went out or came home from the Divinity Hall. I would have eschewed her, sir—I would, on my soul; for I was as innocent a lad as ever came from Laminermuir; but there was no possibility of escape, retreat, or flight, unless I could have got a pair of wings, or made use of a ladder seven stories high, to scale the window of my attic. It signifies little talking—you may suppose how all this was to end—I would have married the girl, and taken my chance—I would, by Heaven! for she was a pretty girl, and a good girl, till she and I met; but you know the old song, 'Kirk would not let us be.' A gentleman, in my case, would have settled the matter with the Kirk-treasurer for a small sum of money; but the poor stibbler, the penniless dominie, having married his cousin of Kittlebasket, must next have proclaimed her frailty to the whole parish, by mounting the throne of Presbyterian penance, and proving, as Othello says, 'his love a whore,' in face of the whole congregation.

"In this extremity I dared not stay where I was, and so thought to go home to my father. But first I got Jack Hadaway, a lad from the same parish, and who lived in the same infernal stair, to make some inquiries how the old gentleman had taken the matter. I soon, by way of answer, learned, to the great increase of my comfortable reflections, that the good old man made as much clamour, as if such a thing as a man's eating his wedding dinner without saying grace had never happened since Adam's time. He did nothing for six days but cry out, 'Ichabod, Ichabod, the glory is departed from my house!' and on the seventh he preached a sermon, in which he enlarged on this incident as illustrative of one of the great occasions for humiliation, and causes of national defection. I hope the course he took comforted himself—I am sure it made me ashamed to show my nose at home. So I went down to Leith, and, exchanging my hoddin gray coat of my mother's spinning for such a jacket as this, I entered my name at the rendezvous as an able-bodied landsman, and sailed with the tender round to Plymouth, where they were fitting out a squadron for the West Indies. There I was put aboard the Fearnought, Captain Daredevil—among whose crew I soon learned to fear Satan, (the terror of my early youth,) as little as the toughest Jack on board. I had some qualms at first, but I took the remedy" (tapping the case-bottle) "which I recommended to you, being as good for sickness of soul as for sickness of the stomach—What, you won't?—very well, I must, then—here is to ye."

"You would, I am afraid, find your education of little use in your new condition?" said Fairford.

"Pardon me, sir," resumed the Captain of the Jumping Jenny; "my handful of Latin, and small pinch of Greek, were as useless as old junk, to be sure; but my reading, writing, and accounting, stood me in good stead, and brought me forward. I might have been schoolmaster—ay, and master, in time; but that valiant liquor, rum, made a conquest of me rather too often, and so, make what sail I could, I always went to leeward. We were four years broiling in that blasted climate, and I came back at last with a little prize-money.—I always had thoughts of putting things to rights in the Covenant-Close, and reconciling myself to my father. I found out Jack Hadaway, who was Tuptowing away with a dozen of wretched boys, and a fine string of stories he had ready to regale my ears withal. My father had lectured on what he called 'my falling away,' for seven Sabbaths, when, just as his parishioners began to hope that the course was at an end, he was found dead in his bed on the eighth Sunday morning. Jack Hadaway assured me, that if I wished to atone for my errors, by undergoing the fate of the first martyr, I had only to go to my native village, where the very stones of the street would rise up against me as my father's murderer. Here was a pretty item—well, my tongue clove to my mouth for an hour, and was only able at last to utter the name of Mrs. Cantrips. O this was a new theme for my Job's comforter. My sudden departure—my father's no less sudden death—had prevented the payment of the arrears of my board and lodging—the landlord was a haberdasher, with a heart as rotten as the muslin wares he dealt in. Without respect to her age, or gentle kin, my Lady Kittlebasket was ejected from her airy habitation—her porridge-pot, silver posset-dish, silver-mounted spectacles, and Daniel's Cambridge Bible, sold, at the Cross of Edinburgh, to the cadie who would bid highest for them, and she herself driven to the work-house, where she got in with difficulty, but was easily enough lifted out, at the end of the month, as dead as her friends could desire. Merry tidings this to me, who had been the d—d" (he paused a moment) "origo mali—Gad, I think my confession would sound better in Latin than in English!

"But the best jest was behind—I had just power to stammer out something about Jess—by my faith he had an answer! I had taught Jess one trade, and, like a prudent girl, she had found out another for herself; unluckily, they were both contraband, and Jess Cantrips, daughter of the Lady Kittlebasket, had the honour to be transported to the plantations, for street-walking and pocket-picking, about six months before I touched shore."

He changed the bitter tone of affected pleasantry into an attempt to laugh; then drew his swarthy hand across his swarthy eyes, and said in a more natural accent, "Poor Jess!"

There was a pause—until Fairford, pitying the poor man's state of mind, and believing he saw something in him that, but for early error and subsequent profligacy, might have been excellent and noble, helped on the conversation by asking, in a tone of commiseration, how he had been able to endure such a load of calamity.

"Why, very well," answered the seaman; "exceedingly well—like a tight ship in a brisk gale.—Let me recollect.—I remember thanking Jack, very composedly, for the interesting and agreeable communication; I then pulled out my canvass pouch, with my hoard of moldores, and taking out two pieces I bid Jack keep the rest till I came back, as I was for a cruise about Auld Reekie. The poor devil looked anxiously, but I shook him by the hand and ran down stairs, in such confusion of mind, that notwithstanding what I had heard, I expected to meet Jess at every turning.

"It was market-day, and the usual number of rogues and fools were assembled at the Cross. I observed every body looked strange on me, and I thought some laughed. I fancy I had been making great faces enough, and perhaps talking to myself. When I saw myself used in this manner, I held out my clenched fists straight before me, stooped my head, and, like a ram when he makes his race, darted right down the street, scattering groups of weather-beaten lairds and perriwigged burghesses, and bearing down all before me. I heard the cry of 'Seize the madman!' echoed, in Celtic sounds, from the City Guard, with 'Cease ta matman!'—but pursuit and opposition were in vain. I pursued my career; the smell of the sea, I suppose, led me to Leith, where soon after, I found myself walking very quietly on the shore, admiring the tough round and sound carriage of the vessels, and thinking how a loop, with a man at the end of one of them, would look, by way of tassel.

"I was opposite to the rendezvous, formerly the place of refuge—in I bolted—found one or two acquaintances, made half-a-dozen new ones—drank for two days—was put aboard the tender—off to Portsmouth—then landed at the Haslar hospital, and a fine hissing-hot fever. Never mind—I got better—nothing can kill me—the West Indies were my lot again, for since I did not go where I deserved in the next world, I had something as like such quarters as can be had in this—black devils for inhabitants—flames and earthquakes, and so forth, for your entertainment. Well, brother, something or other I did or said—I can't tell what—How the devil should I? I was as drunk as David's sow, you know?—But I was punished, my lad—made to kiss the wench who never speaks but when she scolds, and that's the gunner's daughter, comrade. Yes, the minister's son of—no matter where—has the cat's scratches on his back! This roused me—and when we were ashore with the boat, I gave three inches of the dirk, after a stout tussle, to the fellow I blained most, and so took the bush for it. There were plenty of wild fags along shore—and, I don't care who knows—I went on the account, look you—sailed under the black flag and marrow-bones—was a good friend to the sea and an enemy to all that sailed on it."

Fairford, though uneasy in his mind at finding himself, a lawyer, so close to a character so lawless, thought it best, nevertheless, to put a good face on the matter, and asked Mr. Ewart, with as much unconcern as he could assume, "whether he was fortunate as a rover?"

"No, no—d—n it, no," replied Nanty; "the devil's crumb of butter was ever churned that would stick upon my bread. There was no order among us—that was captain to-day, was swabber to-morrow; and as for plunder—they say old Avery, and one or two close hunks, made money; but in my time it went as it came: and reason good, for if a fellow had saved five dollars, his throat would have been cut in his hammock. And then it was a cruel, bloody work—Pah—we'll say no more about it. I broke with them at last, for what they did on board of a bit of a snow—no matter what it was—bad enough, since it frightened me—I took French leave, and came in upon the proclamation, so I am free of all that business. And here I sit, the skipper of the Jumping Jenny—a nut-shell of a thing, but goes through the water like a dolphin. If it were not for yon hypocritical scoundrel at Annan, who has the best end of the profit, and takes none of the risk, I should be well enough—as well as I want to be. Here is no lack of my best friend,”—touching his case-bottle;—“but, to tell you a secret, he and I have got so used to each other, I begin to think he is like a professed joker, that makes your sides sore with laughing. If you see him but now and then; but if you take up house with him, he can only make your head stupid. But I warrant the old fellow is doing the best he can for me, after all.”

“And what may that be?” said Fairford.

“He is kidding me,” replied Nanty Ewart; “and I am only sorry he is so long about it.”

So saying, he jumped on his feet, and tripping up and down the deck, gave his orders with his usual clearness and decision, notwithstanding the considerable quantity of spirits which he had contrived to swallow while recounting his history.

Although far from feeling well, Fairford endeavoured to rouse himself and walk to the head of the brig, to enjoy the beautiful prospect, as well as to take some note of the course which the vessel held. To his great surprise, instead of standing across to the opposite shore from which she had departed, the brig was going down the Frith, and apparently steering into the Irish sea. He called to Nanty Ewart, and expressed his surprise at the course they were pursuing, and asked why they did not stand straight across the Frith for some port in Cumberland.

“Why, this is what I call a reasonable question, now,” answered Nanty; “as if a ship could go as straight to its port, as a horse to the stable, or a free-trader could sail the Solway as securely as a King’s cutter! Why, I’ll tell ye, brother, if I do not see a smoke on Bowness, that is the village upon the head-land yonder, I must stand out to sea for twenty-four hours at least, for we must keep the weather-gage if there are hawks abroad.”

“Why then, and in that case, I must keep off till night, and then run you, with the kegs and the rest of the lumber, ashore at Skumbiness.”

“And then I am to meet with this same Laird whom I have the letter for?” continued Fairford.

“That,” said Ewart, “is thereafter as it may be; the ship has its course—the fair-trader has his port—but it is not so easy to say where the Laird may be found. But he will be within twenty miles of us, off or on—and it will be my business to guide you to him.”

Fairford could not withstand the passing impulse of terror which crossed him, when thus reminded that he was so absolutely in the power of a man, who, by his own account, had been a pirate, and who was at present, in all probability, an outlaw as well as a contraband trader. Nanty Ewart guessed the cause of his involuntary shuddering.

“What the devil should I gain,” he said, “by passing so poor a card as you are?—Have I not had ace of trumps in my hand, and did I not play it fairly? Ay, I say the Jumping Jenny can run in other wares as well as kegs. Put zigzag and tee to Ewart, and see how that will spell. I’ve taken me now?”

“Now, by Jove!” said Nanty Ewart, “thou art either the deepest or the shallowest fellow I ever met with—or you are not right after all. I wonder where Summertrees could pick up such a tender along-shore. Will you let me see his letter?”

Fairford did not hesitate to gratify his wish, which, he was aware, he could not easily resist. The master of the Jumping Jenny looked at the direction very attentively, then turned the letter to and fro, and examined each flourish of the pen, as if he were judging of a piece of ornamental manuscript; then handed it back to Fairford, without a single word of remark.

“Am I right now?” said the young lawyer.

“Why, for that matter,” answered Nanty, “the letter is right, sure enough; but whether you are right or not, is your own business, rather than mine.”—And, striking upon a flint with the back of a knife, he kindled a cigar as thick as his finger, and began to smoke away with great perseverance.

Alan Fairford continued to regard him with a melancholy feeling divided betwixt the interest he took in the unhappy man, and a not unnatural apprehension for the issue of his own adventure.

Ewart, notwithstanding the stupefying nature of his pastime, seemed to guess what was working in his prisoner’s mind; for, after they had remained some time engaged in silently observing each other, he suddenly dashed his cigar on the deck, and said to him, “We’ll then, if you are sorry for me, I am sorry for you. Don’t me, if I have cared a button for man or mother’s son, since two years since, when I had another peep of Jack Hadaway. The fellow was got as fat as a Norway whale—married to a great Dutch-bault quon that had brought him six children. I believe he did not know me, and thought I was come to rob his house; however, I made up a poor face, and told him who I was. Poor Jack would have given me shelter and clothes, and began to tell me of the mortgages that were in bank, when I wanted them. Lord, he changed his note when I told him what my life had been, and only wanted to pay me my cash and get rid of me. I never saw so terrified a visage. I burst out a-laughing in his face, told him it was all a humbug, and that the mortgages were all his own, henceforth and for ever, and so ran off. I caused one of our people to lend him a bag of tea and a keg of brandy, before I left—poor Jack! I think you are the second person these ten years, that has cared a tobacco-stopper for Nanty Ewart.”

“Perhaps, Mr. Ewart,” said Fairford, “you live chiefly with men too deeply interested for their own immediate safety, to think much upon the distress of others?”

“I really am not in such secrets as you seem to allude to,” said Fairford; and, determined at the same time to avail himself as far as possible of Nanty’s communicative disposition, he added, with a smile, “And if I were, I should not hold it prudent to make them much the subject of conversation. But I am sure, so sensible men as Summertrees and the Laird may correspond together with all freedom to the state.”

“I take you, framer—I take you,” said Nanty Ewart, upon whom, at length, the liquor and tobacco-smoke began to make considerable innovation. “As to what gentlemen may or may not correspond about, why we may permit the question, as the old Professor used to say at the Hall; and as to Summertrees, I will say nothing, knowing him to be an old fox. But I say that this fellow the Laird is a fine brat in the country; that he is stirring up all the honest fellows who should be drinking their brandy quietly, by telling them stories about the rangers and the forty-five; and that he is trying to turn all waters into his own mill-race, and to set his sails to all winds. And because the London people are roaring about for some pinches of their own, he thinks to win them to his turn with a wet finger. And he gets encouragement from some, because they want a spell of money from him; and from others, because they fought for the cause once and are ashamed to go back, and others, because they have nothing to lose; and others because they are disappointed fools. But if he has brought you, or any one I say not whom, into this scrape, with the hope of doing any good, he's a d-d duncy-duck, and that's all I can say for him, and you are goose, which is worse than being duncy-ducks, or lame-ducks either. And so here is to the prosperity of King George the Third, and the true Presbyterian religion, and confusion to the Pope, the Devil, and the Pretender!—I'll tell you what, Mr. Fairbairn, I am but tenth owner of this bit of a craft, the Jumping Jenny—but tenth owner—and must sail her by my owners' directions. But if I were whole owner I would not have the brig be made a ferry boat for your Jacobitical, orthodox Papish rill rill, Mr. Fairport—I would not, by my soul, they should walk the plank, by the gun-gal I have seen better men do when I sailed under the Whar-d'ye-callum colours. But being contraband goods, and on board my vessel, and I with my sailing orders in my hand, why I am to forward them as a present—I say, John Roberts, keep her up a bit with the helm. And so, Mr. Fairweather, what I do is—the d-d villain Turnpenny says—all in the way of business."

He had been speaking with difficulty for the last five minutes, and now at length dropped on the deck, partly silenced by the quantity of spirits which he had swallowed, but without having shown any glimpse of the gravity, or even of the extravagance, of intemperance.

The old sailor stepped forward and flung a one-crown piece the slumberer's shoulder, and added, looking at Fairford, "Pity of him he should have this fault; for without it, he would have been as clever a fellow as ever trode a plank with ox leather."

"And what are we to do now?" said Fairford.

"Stand off and on, to be sure, till we see the signal, and then obey orders."

So saying, the old man turned to his duty and left the passenger to amuse himself with his own musings. Presently afterward a light column of smoke was seen rising from the little headland.

"I can tell you what we are to do now, master," said the sailor. "We'll stand out to sea, and then run in again with the evening tide, and make Shinburness; or, if there's not light, we can run into the Wampool river, and put you ashore about Kirkbride or Leatha, with the long-boat."

Fairford, unwell before, felt this destination condemned him to an agony of many hours, which his disordered stomach and aching head were ill able to endure. There was no remedy, however, but patience, and the recollection that he was suffering in the cause of friendship. As the sun rose high, he became worse. His sense of smell appeared to acquire a most high degree of acuteness, for the mere purpose of inhaling and distinguishing all the various odours with which he was surrounded, from that of pitch, to all the complicated smells of the hold. His heart, too, throbbled under the heat, and he felt as if in full progress towards a high fever.

The seamen, who were civil and attentive, considering their calling, observed his distress, and contrived to make an evening out of an odd one, while another compounded some lemonade, the only liquor which their passenger could be prevailed upon to touch. After drinking it off, he obtained, but could not be said to enjoy, a few hours of troubled slumber.

CHAPTER XV.

ALAN FAIRFORD'S spirit was more ready to sustain labour than his frame was adequate to support it. In spite of his exertions, when he awoke, after five or six hours slumber, he found that he was so much debilitated by dreams in his head, and pains in his limbs, that he could not raise himself without assistance. He looked with some pleasure that they were now running right for the Wampool river, and that he would be put on shore in a very short time. The vessel accordingly lay to, and presently showed a light in her cabin, which was hourly answered by signals from on shore. Men and horses were seen to come down the broken path which leads to the shore; the latter all properly tackled for carrying their loading. Twenty fishing boats were pulled astern at once, and crowded round the brig with much clamour, laughter, cursing, and jesting. Amid all this apparent confusion there was the essential regularity. Nanty Ewart again walked his quarter-deck as if he had never tasted spirits in his life, and the necessary orders with precision, and saw them executed with punctuality. In half an hour the loading of the brig was in a great measure disposed of; the boats, in a quarter of an hour more, it was loaded on the beach, and another interval of about the same duration was sufficient to distribute it on the various strings of pack-horses which waited for that purpose, and which instantly dispersed, each on its own proper adventure. More mystery was observed in loading the ship's boat with a quantity of small barrels, which seemed to contain ammunition. This was not done until the commercial customers had been dismissed; and it was not until this was performed that Ewart proposed to Alan, so he lay stunned with pain and noise to accompany him ashore.

It was with difficulty that Fairford could get on the side of the vessel, and he could not cast himself on the stern of the boat without assistance from the captain and his people. Nanty Ewart, who was nothing in this world than an ordinary fit of excitement, applied the usual topics of consolation. He assured his passenger that he would be quite well by and by, when he had been half an hour on terra firma, and that he hoped to drink a can and smoke a pipe with him at Father Crackenthorp's, for all that he felt a little out of the way for riding the water horse.

"Who is Father Crackenthorp?" said Fairford, though scarcely able to articulate the question.

"As honest a fellow as I of a thousand," answered Nanty. "Ah, how much good brandy he and I have made little of in our day! By my soul, Mr. Fairford, he is the prince of thinkers, and the father of the free trade—not a stinky hypocritical devil like old Turnpenny. He'll drink drunk on other folk's cost, and thinks it as when he has to pay for it—'a real hearty old cock'—the sharks have been at all about him this many a day; but Father Crackenthorp knows how to turn his side—never a warrant but he hears of it before the ink is dry. He is done up with head-broth and constable. The King's Esquires could not bribe a man to inform against him if any such rascal were to cast up, why he won't miss his own best morning or be sent to work there in the Galley. He is a gentleman,* though he keeps a public; but, indeed, that is only for convenience, and to excuse his having cellars and fish about him, his wife is a canny woman, and his daughter Doll too. God, you'll be in port there till you get round again, and I'll keep my word with you, and bring you to speech of the Lord. God, the only trouble I shall have is to get you out of the house, for Doll is a rare wench, and my dame a funny old am and Father Crackenthorp the rarest companion. He'll drink you a bottle of rum or brandy without starting, but never wet his lips with that same fishy stuff that the canting old scoundrel Turnpenny has brought into fashion. He is a gentleman, even such of him, old Crackenthorp; in his own way this; and besides, he has a share in the Jumping Jenny and many a moonlight outfit besides. He can give Doll a pretty penny, if he likes the light for her that would turn in with her for life."

In the midst of this prolix panegyric on Father Crackenthorp, the boat touched the beach, the rowers backed their oars to keep her astern, while the shore-floes jumped into the surf, and, with the usual dratery began to hand the barrels ashore.

"Up with them higher on the beach, my hearties," exclaimed Nanty Ewart—"High and dry—high and dry—this gear will not stand wetting. Now, out with our spare hand here—high and dry with him too. What's that?—the galloping of horse! Oh, I hear the jingle of the packsaddles—they are our own folk."

By this time all the boat's load was ashore, consisting of the little barrels; and the boat's crew, standing to their arms, ranged themselves in front, waiting the advance of the horses which came clattering along the beach. A man, overgrown with corpulence, who might be distinguished in the moonlight, panting with his own exertions, appeared at the head of the cavalcade, which consisted of horses linked together, and accommodated with packsaddles, and chains for securing the kegs, which made a dreadful clattering.

"How now, Father Crackenthorp?" said Ewart—"Why this hurry with your horses?—We mean to stay a night with you, and taste your old brandy, and my dame's home-brewed. This signal is up, man, and all is right."

"All is wrong, Captain Nanty," cried the man to whom he spoke; "and you are the lad that is like to find it so, unless you bundle off—there are new brooms bought at Carlisle yesterday to sweep the country of you and the like of you—so you were better be jogging inland."

"How many rogues are the officers?—If not more than ten, I will make fight."

"The devil you will!" answered Crackenthorp. "You were better not, for they have the bloody-backed dragoons from Carlisle with them."

"Nay, then, said Nanty, "we must make sail.—Come, Master Fairlord, you must mount and ride.—He does not hear me—he has fainted, I believe—What the devil shall I do?—Father Crackenthorp, I must leave this young fellow with you till the gale blows out—hark ye—goes between the Laird and the t'other old one; he can neither ride nor walk—I must send him up to you."

"Send him up to the gallows!" said Crackenthorp; "there is Quartermaster Thwacker, with twenty men, up yonder; an he had not some kindness for Doll, I had never got hither for a start—but you must get off, or they will be here to seek us, for his orders are woundy particular; and these kegs contain worse than whisky—a hanging matter, I take it."

"I wish they were at the bottom of Wampool river, with them they belong to," said Nanty Ewart. "But they are part of cargo, and what to do with the poor young fellow?"

"Why, many a better fellow has roughed it on the grass, with a cloak o'er him," said Crackenthorp. "If he hath a fever, nothing is so cooling as the night air."

"Yes, he would be cold enough in the morning, no doubt; but it's a kind heart, and shall not cool so soon, if I can help it," answered the captain of the Jumping Jenny.

"Well, Captain, an ye will risk your own neck for another man's, why not take him to the old girls at Fairladies?"

"What, the Miss Arthurets!—The Papist jades! But never mind; it will do—I have known them take in a whole sloop's crew that were stranded on the sands."

"You may run some risk, though, by turning up to Fairladies; for I tell you they are all up through the country."

"Never mind—I may chance to put some of them down again," said Nanty, cheerfully.—"Come, lads, bustle to your tackle. Are you all loaded?"

"Ay, ay, Captain; we will be ready in a jiffy," answered the gang.

"D—n your captains!—Have you a mind to have me hanged if I am taken?—All's hail-fellow, here."

"A sup at parting," said Father Crackenthorp, extending a flask to Nanty Ewart.

"Not the twentieth part of a drop," said Nanty. "No Dutch courage for me—my heart is always high enough when there's a chance of fighting; besides, if I live drunk, I should like to die sober.—Here, old Jephson—you are the best-natured brute amongst them—get the lad between us on a quiet horse, and we will keep him upright, I warrant."

As they raised Fairford from the ground, he groaned heavily, and asked faintly where they were taking him to.

"To a place where you will be as snug and quiet as a mouse in his hole," said Nanty, "if so be that we can get you there safely.—Good by, Father Crackenthorp—poison the quartermaster, if you can."

The loaded horses then sprang forward at a hard trot, following each other in a line, and every second horse being mounted by a stout fellow in a smock-frock, which served to conceal the arms with which most of these desperate men were provided. Ewart followed in the rear of the line, and, with the occasional assistance of old Jephson, kept his young charge erect in the saddle. He groaned heavily from time to time; and Ewart, more moved with compassion for his situation than might have been expected from his own habits, endeavoured to amuse him and comfort him, by some account of the place to which they were conveying him—his words of consolation being, however, frequently interrupted by the necessity of calling to his people, and many of them being lost amongst the rattling of the barrels, and clinking of the tackle and small chains by which they are secured on such occasions.

"And you see, brother, you will be in safe quarters at Fairladies—good old scrambling house—good old maids enough, if they were not Papists.—Hollo, you Jack Lowther; keep the line, can't ye, and shut your rattle-trap, you broth of a—! And so, being of a good family, and having enough, the old lasses have turned a kind of saints, and nuns, and so forth. The place they live in was some sort of a nun-shop long ago, as they have them still in Flanders; so folk call them the Vestals of Fairladies—that may be or may not be; and I care not whether it be or no.—Blinkinsop, hold your tongue, and be d—d!—And so, betwixt great alms and good dinners, they are well thought of by rich and poor, and their trucking with Papists is looked over. There are plenty of priests, and stout young scholars, and such like, about the house—it's a hive of them—More shame that government send dragoons out after a few honest fellows that bring the old women of England a drop of brandy, and let these ragamuffins smuggle in as much papistry and—Hark!—was that a whistle?—No, it's only a plover. You, Jem Collier, keep a look-out a-head—we'll meet them at the High Whins, or Brotthole bottom, or nowhere. Go a furlong a-head, I say, and look sharp.—These Miss Arthurets feed the hungry, and clothe the naked, and such like acts—which my poor father used to say were filthy rags, but he dressed himself out with as many of them as most folk.—D—n that stumbling horse! Father Crackenthorp should be d—d himself for putting an honest fellow's neck in such jeopardy."

Thus, and with much more to the same purpose, Nanty ran on, increasing, by his well-intended annoyance, the agony of Alan Fairford, who, tormented by racking pain along the back and loins, which made the rough trot of the horse torture to him, had his aching head still further rendered and split by the hoarse voice of the sailor, close to his ear. Perfectly passive, however, he did not even essay to give any answer; and indeed his own bodily distress was now so great and engrossing, that to think of his situation was impossible, even if he could have mended it by doing so.

Their course was inland; but in what direction, Alan had no means of ascertaining. They passed at first over heaths and sandy downs; they crossed more than one brook, or beck, as they are called in that country—some of them of considerable depth—and at length reached a cultivated country, divided, according to the English fashion of agriculture, into very small fields or closes, by high banks, overgrown with underwood, and surmounted by hedge-row trees, amongst which winded a number of impracticable and complicated lanes, where the boughs projecting from the embankments on each side, intercepted the light of the moon, and endangered the safety of the horsemen. But, through this labyrinth the experience of the guides conducted them without a blunder, and without even the slackening of their pace. In many places, however, it was impossible for three men to ride abreast; and therefore the burden of supporting Alan Fairford fell alternately to old Jephson, and to Nanty; and it was with much difficulty that they could keep him upright in his saddle.

At length when his powers of sufferance were quite worn out, and he was about to implore them to leave him to his fate in the first cottage or shed—or under a haystack or a hedge—or any where, so he was left at ease, Collier, who rode a-head, passed back the word that they were at the avenue to Fairladies—“Was he to turn up?”

Committing the charge of Fairford to Jephson, Nanty dashed up to the head of the troop, and gave his orders.—“Who knows the house best?”

“Sam Skelton’s a Catholic,” said Lowther.

“A d—d bad religion,” said Nanty, of whose Presbyterian education, a hatred of Popery seemed to be the only remnant. “But I am glad there is one amongst us, any how.—You, Sam, being a Papist, know Fairladies, and the old maidens, I dare say; so do you fall out of the line, and wait here with me; and do you Collier, carry on to Walinford bottom, then turn down the beck till you come to the old mill, and Goodman Grist the Miller or old Peel-the-Causeway, will tell you where to stow; but I will be up with you before that.”

The string of loaded horses then struck forward at their former pace, while Nanty, with Sam Skelton, waited by the road-side till the rear came up, when Jephson and Fairford joined them, and, to the great relief of the latter, they began to proceed at an easier pace than formerly, suffering the gang to precede them, till the clatter and clang attending their progress began to die away in the distance. They had not proceeded a pistol-shot from the place where they parted, when a short turning brought them in front of an old mouldering gate-way, whose heavy pinnacles were decorated in the style of the seventeenth century, with clumsy architectural ornaments; several of which had fallen down from decay, and lay scattered about, no further care having been taken than just to remove them out of the direct approach to the avenue. The great stone pillars, glimmering white in the moonlight, had some fanciful resemblance to supernatural apparitions, and the air of neglect all around, gave an uncomfortable idea of the habitation to those who passed its avenue.

“There used to be no gate here,” said Skelton, finding their way unexpectedly stopped.

“But there is a gate now, and a porter too,” said a rough voice from within. “Who be you, and what do you want at this time of night?”

“We want to come to speech of the ladies—of the Miss Arthurets,” said Nanty; “and to ask lodging for a sick man.”

“There is no speech to be had of the Miss Arthurets at this time of night, and you may carry your sick man to the doctor,” answered the fellow from within, gruffly; “for as sure as there is savour in salt, and scent in rosemary, you will get no entrance—put your pipes up and be jogging on.”

“Why, Dick Gardener,” said Skelton, “be thou then turned porter?”

“What, do you know who I am?” said the domestic sharply.

“I know you, by your by-word,” answered the other; “What, have you forgot little Sam Skelton, and the brock in the barrel?”

“No, I have not forgotten you,” answered the acquaintance of Sam Skelton; “but my orders are peremptory to let no one up the avenue this night, and therefore”——

“But we are armed, and will not be kept back,” said Nanty. “Hark ye, fellow, were it not better for you to take a guinea and let us in, than to have us break the door first, and thy pate afterwards? for I won’t see my comrade die at your door—be assured of that.”

“Why, I dunna know,” said the fellow; “but what cattle were those that rode by in such hurry?”

“Why, some of our folk from Bowness, Stoniecul-trum, and thereby,” answered Skelton; “Jack Lowther, and old Jephson, and broad Will Lamplugh, and such like.”

“Well,” said Dick Gardener, “as sure as there is savour in salt, and scent in rosemary, I thought it had been the troopers from Carlisle and Wigton, and the sound brought my heart to my mouth.”

“Had thought thou wouldst have known the clatter of a cask from the clash of a broadsword, as well as e’er a quaffer in Cumberland,” answered Skelton.

“Come, brother, less of your jaw, and more of your legs, if you please,” said Nanty; “every moment we stay is a moment lost. Go to the ladies, and tell them that Nanty Ewart, of the Jumping Jenny, has brought a young gentleman, charged with letters from Scotland, to a certain gentleman of consequence in Cumberland—that the soldiers are out, and the gentleman is very ill, and if he is not received at Fairladies, he must be left either to die at the gate, or to be taken with all his papers about him, by the redcoats.”

Away ran Dick Gardener with this message; and in a few minutes, lights were seen to flit about, which convinced Fairford, who was now, in consequence of the halt, a little restored to self-possession, that they were traversing the front of a tolerably large mansion-house.

“Why, then,” said the person addressed, “I shall owe him just such a licking as thou, old Jephson, hadst from Dan Cooke, and will pay as duly and truly as he did.”

The old man was about to make an angry reply, when his doubts were silenced by the return of Dick Gardener who announced that Miss Arthuret was coming herself as far as the gateway to speak with them.

Nanty Ewart cursed, in a low tone, the suspicion of old maids and the churlish scruples of Catholics that made so many obstacles to helping a fellow-creature, and wished Miss Arthuret a hearty rheumatism or toothache as the reward of her excursion; but the lady presently appeared, to cut short farther grumbling. She was attended by a waiting-maid with a lantern, by means of which she examined the party on the outside, as closely as the imperfect light, and the spars of the newly-erected gate, would permit.

“I am sorry we have disturbed you so late, Madam Arthuret,” said Nanty; “but the case is this”——

“Holy Virgin,” said she “why do you speak so loud? Pray, are you not the Captain of the Saint Genevieve?”

“Why, ay, ma’am,” answered Ewart, “they call the brig so at Dunkirk, sure enough; but along shore here, they call her the Jumping Jenny.”

“You brought over the holy Father Buonaventura, did you not?”

“Ay, ay, madam, I have brought over enough o them black cattle,” answered Nanty.

“Fie! fie! friend,” said Miss Arthuret; “it is a pity that the saints should commit these good men to heretic’s care.”

“Why, no more they would, ma’am,” answered Nanty, “could they find a Papish lubber that knew the coast as I do; then I am trusty as steel to owners and always look after cargo—live lumber, or dead flesh or spirits, all is one to me; and your Catholics have such d—d large hoods, with pardon, ma’am, that they can sometimes hide two faces under them. But here is a gentleman dying, with letters about him from the Laird of Summertrees to the Laird of the Lochs, as they call him, along Solway, and every minute he lies here is a nail in his coffin.”

“Saint Mary! what shall we do?” said Miss Arthuret; “we must admit him, I think, at all risks. You, Richard Gardener, help one of these men to carry the gentleman up to the Place; and you, Solby, see him lodged at the end of the long gallery.—You are a heretic, Captain, but I think you are trusty, and I know you have been trusted—but if you are imposing on me”——

“Not I, madam—never attempt to impose on ladies of your experience—my practice that way has been al-among the young men.—Come, charity, Mr. Fairford—you will be taken good care of—try to walk.”

Alan did so, and, refreshed by his bath, declared himself able to walk to the house with the sole assistance of the gardener.

“Why, that’s hearty. Thank thee, Dick, for lending him thine arm,”—and Nanty slipped into his hand the guinea he had promised.—“Farewell then, Mr. Fairford, and farewell, Madam Arthur, for I have been too long here.”

So saying, he and his two companions threw themselves on horseback, and went off at a gallop. Yet, even above the clatter of their hoofs did the mourning Nanty halloo out the old halloo—

“A lovely lass to a fair man.
To cushion a morning’s nap;
‘In what way dost thou go to bed?’
‘Come, tell me most secretly!’
‘Alas! my flesh I dare not touch—
But my lips be loved me dearly!’”

“Holy Virgin!” exclaimed Miss Seraphina, as the unhallowed sounds reached her ears; “what profane heathens be these men, and what frights and pinches we be put to among them!” The saints be good to us, what a night has this been!—the like never seen at Fairladies—Help me to make fast the gate, Richard, and thou shalt come down again to wait on it, lest there come more unseemly visitors. Not that you are unwelcome young gentlemen, for it is sufficient that you need such assistance as we can give you, to make you welcome to Fairladies—only, another time would have done as well—but, hem! I dare say it is all for the best. The avenue is none of the smoothest, for, look to your feet. Richard Gardener should have had it mown and levelled, but he was obliged to go on a pilgrimage to Saint Winifred’s Well, in Wales.”—(Here Dick gave a short dry cough, which, as if he had found it betrayed some internal feeling a little at variance with what the lady said, he converted into a muttered Santo Winifred, ora pro nobis. Miss Arthur, mean time, proceeded.)—“We never interfere with our servants’ vows or penances, Master Fairford—I know a very worthy father of your name, perhaps a relation—I say, we never interfere with our servants’ vows. Our Lady forbid they should not know some difference between our service and a heretic’s.—Take care, or, you will fall if you have not a care. Alas! by night and day there are many stumbling-blocks in our paths!”

With more talk to the same purpose, all of which tended to show a charitable, and somewhat silly woman, with a strong inclination to her superstitious devotion, Miss Arthur entertained her new guest, an stumbling at every obstacle which the devotion of his guide, Richard, had left in the path, he at last, by ascending some stone steps, decorated on the side with griffins, or some such heraldic animals, attained a terrace extending in front of the Place of Fairladies, an old-fashioned gentleman’s house of some consequence, with its range of notched gable-ends and narrow windows, relieved by here and there an old turret about the size of a pepper box. The door was locked, during the brief absence of the mistress, a dim light glimmered through the cracked door of the hall, which opened beneath a huge stone porch, loaded with peacocks and other creptures. All the windows were dark as pitch.

“Who is there?” was answered from within; “is it you, sister Seraphina?”

“Yes, yes, undo the door; do you not know my voice?”

“No doubt, sister,” said Angeline, undoing bolt and bar; “but you know our charge, and the ceremony is watchful to surprise us—needs’trud’lar corners, such the doorway.—Whom have you brought here? Oh, sister, what have you done?”

“It is a young man,” said Seraphina, hastening to interrupt her sister’s remonstrance, “a relation, I believe, of our worthy Father Fairford, left at the gate by the captain of that blessed vessel the Saint Catherine—almost dead—and charged with despatches to”——

She lowered her voice as she mounted over the last words.

“Say, then, there is no help,” said Angeline; “but it is unlucky.”

During this dialogue between the vestals of Fairladies, Dick Gardener deposited his burden in a chair, where the young lady, after a moment of hesitation, expressing a becoming reluctance to touch the hand of a stranger put her finger and thumb upon Fairford’s wrist, and counted his pulse.

“There is fever here, sister,” she said; “Richard must call Ambrose, and we must send some of the footmen.”

Ambrose arrived presently, a pliable and respectable-looking old servant, bred in the family, and who had risen from rank to rank in the Arthurian service, till he was become half-physician, half-almoner, half-butler and entire governor, that is, when the Father Confessor, who frequently reared him of the folds of government, chanced to be abroad. Under the direction, and with the assistance of this venerable personage, the unlucky Alan Fairford was conveyed to a decent apartment at the end of a long gallery, and, to his inexpressible relief, consigned to a comfortable bed. He did not attempt to resist the prescription of Mr. Ambrose, who not only prevented him with the proposed draught, but proceeded so far as to take a considerable quantity of blood from him, by which lost operation he probably did his patient much service.

On the next morning, when Fairford awoke, after a very refreshing slumber, in which were mingled many wild dreams of his father, and of Dame Lapine, of the damsel in the green mantle, and the vestals of Fairladies, of drinking small beer with Nanty Kwart, and being immersed in the Solway with the Jumping Jenny—he found himself in an condition to dispute the order of Mr. Ambrose, that he should keep his bed, from which, indeed, he could not have raised himself without assistance. He became sensible that his anxiety and his constant efforts for some days past, had done too much for his health, and that, whatever might be his impatience, he could not proceed in his undertaking until his strength was re-established.

In the mean while, no better quarters could have been found for an invalid. The attendants spoke under their breath, and moved only on tiptoe—nothing was done unless par ordonnance du medecin—Esculapius reigned paramount in the presence of Fairladies. Once a-day, the ladies came in great state to wait upon him, and inquire after his health, and it was then that Alan’s natural civility, and the thankfulness which he expressed for their timely and charitable assistance, raised him considerably in their esteem. He was on the third day removed to a better apartment than that in which he had been at first accommodated. When he was permitted to drink a glass of wine, it was of the first quality, one of those curious old-fashioned cob-webbed bottles being produced on the occasion, which are only to be found in the crypts of old country seats, where they may have lurked undisturbed for more than half a century.

But however delightful a residence for an invalid, Fairladies, as its present inmate became soon aware, was not so agreeable to a convalescent. When he dragged himself to the window as soon as he could crawl from bed, behold it was closely grated, and commanded no view except of a little paved court. This was nothing remarkable, most old Border-houses having their windows so secured, but when Fairford observed, that whenever entered or left the room, always locked the door with great care and circumspection, and some proposals which he made to take a walk in the gallery, or even in the garden, were as coldly received, both by the ladies and their prime minister, Mr. Ambrose, that he saw plainly such an extension of his privileges as a guest would not be permitted.

Anxious to ascertain whether this extensive hospitality would permit him his proper privilege of free-egentry, he announced to this important functionary, with grateful thanks for the care with which he had been attended, his purpose to leave Fairford's next morning, requesting only, as a continuance of the favours with which he had been loaded, the loan of a horse to the next town; and, assuring Mr. Ambrose that his gratitude would not be limited by such a trifling stipulation, he slipped three guineas into his hand, by way of securing his proposal. The fingers of that worthy domestic closed as naturally upon the honorarium, as if a degree in the learned faculty had given him a right to clutch it; but his answer concerning Alan's proposed departure was at first evasive, and when he was pushed, it amounted to a peremptory assurance that he could not be permitted to depart to-morrow; it was as much as his life was worth, and his ladies would not authorize it.

"I know how much my own life is worth," said Alan; "and I do not value it in comparison to the business which requires my instant attention."

Receiving still no satisfactory answer from Mr. Ambrose, Fairford thought it best to state his resolution to the ladies themselves, in the most measured, respectful, and grateful terms; but such as expressed a firm determination to depart on the morrow or next day at farthest. After some attempts to induce him to stay, on the alleged score of health, which were as unavailing as the arguments which were only used to delay his departure, Fairford plainly told them that he was intrusted with despatches of consequence to the gentleman known by the name of Herbert, Bridgman, and the Lord of the Larches, and that it was matter of life and death to deliver them early.

"I dare say, Sister Angelica," said the elder Miss Arthur, "that the gentleman is honest; and if he is really a relation of Father Fairford, we can run no risk."

"Jose Maria!" exclaimed the younger. "Oh, Sister Seraphina! Pardon me—Vade retro—get thee behind me!"

"Well, well; but sister—Sister Angelica—let me speak with you in the gallery."

As the ladies rustled in their silks and satins, and it was a good half hour ere they rustled in again, with impatience and awe on their countenances.

"To tell you the truth, Mr. Fairford, the cause of our desire to delay you is—there is a religious gentleman in this house at present!"

"A most excellent person indeed!"—and the sister Angelica.

"An amiable of his Master?" echoed Seraphina,—"and we should be glad that, for conscience' sake, you would hold some discourse with him before your departure."

"Oh!" thought Fairford, "the murder is out—here is a design of conversion—I must not affront the good old ladies, but I shall soon send off the priest, I think."—He then answered aloud, "that he should be happy to converse with any friend of theirs—that in religious matters he had the greatest respect for every modification of Christianity, though, he must say, his belief was made up to that in which he had been educated; nevertheless, if his seeing the religious person they recommended could in the least show his respect."

"It is not quite that," said Sister Seraphina, "although I am sure the day is too short to hear him—Father Buonaventura, I mean—speak upon the conduct of our male, but"

"Come, come, sister Seraphina," said the younger, "it is needless to talk so much about it. His—his Eminence—I mean Father Buonaventura—will himself explain what he wants the gentlemen to know."

"His Eminence," said Fairford, surprised—"is that gentleman as high in the Catholic Church?"

"The title is given only to Cardinals, I think."

"He is not a Cardinal as yet," answered Seraphina; "but I assure you, Mr. Fairford, he is as high in rank as he is eminently endowed with good gifts, and"

"Come away," said Sister Angelica. "Holy Virgin, how you do talk!—What has Mr. Fairford to do with Father Buonaventura's rank?—Only, as you will remember that the Father has been always accustomed to be treated with the most profound deference;—indeed!"

"Come away, sister," said Sister Seraphina, on her turn, "who talks now, I pray you? Mr. Fairford will know how to comport himself."

"And we had best both leave the room," said the younger lady, "for here his Eminence comes."

She lowered her voice to a whisper as she pronounced the last words; and as Fairford was about to reply, by assuring her that any friend of his should be treated by him with all the courtesy he could expect, she imposed silence on him, by holding up her finger.

A solemn and stately step was now heard in the gallery; it might have proclaimed the approach of merely of a bishop or cardinal, but of the Sovereign Pontiff himself. Nor could the sound have been more respectfully listened to by the two ladies, had it announced that the Head of the Church was approaching in person. They drew themselves like statues on duty, one on each side of the door by which the long gallery communicated with Fairford's apartment, and stood there immovable, and with countenances expressive of the deepest reverence.

The approach of Father Buonaventura was so slow, that Fairford had time to notice all that did to marvel in his mind what wily and ambitious priest could have contrived to subject his worthy but unassuming hostess to such superstitious trammels. Father Buonaventura's entrance and appearance to some degree accounted for the whole.

He was a man of middle life, about forty or upwards; but either care, or fatigue, or indulgence, had brought on the appearance of premature old age, and given to his fine features a cast of seriousness even sadness. A noble countenance, however, all removed, and though his complexion was sallow, and wrinkles stamped upon his brow in many a melancholy fold, still the lofty forehead, the full and well-opened eye, and the well-formed nose, showed how handsome in better days he must have been. He was tall, but lost the advantage of his height by stooping; and the cane which he wore always in his hand, and occasionally used, as well as his air though majestic past, seemed to intimate that his form and limbs felt already some touch of infirmity. The colour of his hair could not be described according to the fashion, he wore a perwig. He wore handsomely, though gravely dressed in a suit of black, and had a cockade in his hat; circumstances which did not surprise Fairford, who knew that military distinctions were very often assumed by the many priests, whose visits to England, or rather whose subjection to them to legal penalties.

As this stately person entered the apartment of the two ladies facing inward, like soldiers on their knees when about to salute a superior officer dropped at either hand of the Father a courtesy so profound, that the deep genuflection which performed the salute went down to the very floor, nay, through a set of trapdoor had opened for the descent of the dame who performed this act of reverence.

The Father seemed accustomed to such deep profound as it was; he turned his person a little at first towards one sister, and then towards the other, with a gracious inclination of his head which certainly did not amount to a bow, he acknowledged their courtesy. But he passed forward without addressing them, and seemed by doing so, to mean that their presence in the apartment was unnecessary.

They accordingly glided out of the room, walking backwards, with hands clasped and eyes all upwards, as if imploring blessings on the religious man whom they venerated so highly. The door of the apartment was shut after them, but as Fairford had perceived that there were one or two men in the gallery, and that, contrary to what he had before observed, the door, though shut, was not locked on the outside.

"Can the good souls apprehend danger from me?"

as the god of their shiboleth?" thought Fairford. But he had no time to make further observations, for the stranger had already reached the middle of the apartment.

Fairford rose to receive him respectfully, but as he fixed his eyes on the visitor, he thought that the latter avoided his looks. His reasons for remaining anonymous were enough to account for this, and Fairford bent over to relieve him, by looking downwards in his turn; but when again he raised his face, he found the broad light eye of the stranger as fixed on him, that he was almost put out of countenance by the steadiness of his gaze. During this time they remained standing.

"Take your seat, sir," said the Father; "you have been an invalid."

He spoke with the tone of one who desires an inferior to be seated in his presence, and his voice was full and melodious.

Fairford, somewhat surprised to find himself over-awed by the air of superiority, which could be only properly exercised towards one over whom religion gave the speaker influence, sat down at his bidding, as if moved by springs, and was at a loss how to assert the feeling of equality on which he felt that they ought to stand. The stranger kept the advantage which he had obtained.

"Your name, sir, I am informed, is Fairford?" said the Father.

Alan answered by a bow.

"Called to the Scottish bar," continued his visitor. "There is, I believe, in the West, a family of birth and rank called Fairford of Fairford."

Alan thought this a strange observation from a foreign ecclesiastic, as his name intimated Father Duonaventure to be, but only answered, he believed there was such a family.

"Do you count kindred with them, Mr. Fairford?" continued the inquirer.

"I have not the honour to lay such a claim," said Fairford. "My father's industry has raised his family from a low and obscure situation—I have no hereditary claim to distinction of any kind.—May I ask the cause of these inquiries?"

"You will learn it presently," said Father Duonaventure, who had given a dry and dissatisfied look at the young man's acknowledging a plebeian descent. He then motioned him to be silent, and proceeded with his queries.

"Although not of condition, you are, doubtless, by acquisitions and education, a man of honour and a gentleman?"

"I hope so, sir," said Alan, colouring with discomposure. "I have not been accustomed to have it questioned."

"Patience, young man," said the unperturbed questioner—"we are on serious business, and no idle epigrams must prevent its being discussed seriously.—You are probably aware, that you speak to a person persecuted by the severe and unjust laws of the present government?"

"I am aware of the statute 1793, chapter 2," said Alan, "banishing from the realm Priests and traffickers—Popists, and punishing by death, on summary conviction, any such person who being so banished, should return. The English law, I believe, is equally severe. But I have no means of knowing you, sir, who be one of those persons, and I think your prudence strongly recommends to you to keep your own counsel."

"It is sufficient, sir; and I have no apprehensions of any dangerous consequences from your having seen me in this house," said the Priest.

"Assuredly no," said Alan. "I consider myself as consecrated for my life to the Matrimony of Fairford; and it would be a vile requital on my part to pry into your secrets, or make known what I may have seen or heard in this hospitable roof. If I were to meet the same person in such a situation, he should, even at the risk of a little stretch to my loyalty, be free from any danger from my indiscretion."

The Pretender? said the Priest, with some angry emphasis, but immediately softened his tone and said, "No doubt, however, that person is a pretender; and some people think his pretensions are not ill founded. But before running into politics, give me leave to say, that I am surprised to find a gentleman of your opinions in habits of intimacy with Mr. Maxwell of Summertree and Mr. Radmund, and the wisdom of conducting the intercourse between them."

"Pardon me, sir," replied Alan Fairford; "I do not aspire to the honour of being reputed their confidant or go-between. My concern with those gentlemen is limited to one matter of business, deeply interesting to me, because it concerns the safety—perhaps the life—of my dearest friend."

"Would you have any objections to intrust me with the cause of your journey?" said Father Duonaventure. "My advice may be of service to you, and my influence with one or both those gentlemen is considerable."

Fairford hesitated a moment, and hastily revolving all circumstances, concluded that he might perhaps derive some advantage from prostituting the passage, while, on the other hand, he endangered nothing by communicating to him the occasion of his journey. He, therefore, after stating shortly, that he hoped Mr. Duonaventure would render him the same confidence which he required on his part, gave a short account of Dame Latimer—of the mystery which hung over his family—and of the disaster which had befallen him. Finally of his own resolution to seek for his friend, and to deliver him, at the peril of his own life.

The Catholic Priest, whose manner it seemed to be to avoid all conversation which did not arise from his own express motion, made no remarks upon what he had heard, but only asked one or two abrupt questions, where Alan's narrative appeared less clear to him, then rising from his seat, he took two turns through the apartment, muttering between his teeth, with emphasis, the word "Madmen." But apparently he was in the habit of keeping all violent emotions under restraint, for he presently addressed Fairford with the most perfect indifference.

"If," said he, "you thought you could do so without breach of confidence, I wish you would have the goodness to show me the letter of Mr. Maxwell of Summertree. I desire to look particularly at the address."

Seeing no cause to decline this extension of his confidence, Alan, without hesitation, put the letter into his hand. Having turned it round as old Trumbull and Nanty Ewart had formerly done, and, like them, having examined the address with much minuteness, he asked whether he had observed these words, pointing to a pencil writing upon the under side of the letter. Fairford answered in the negative, and, looking at the letter read with surprise, "Cave ne inferas Halcyonem adferre," a caution which coincided exactly with the Provost's admonition, that he would do well to inspect the letter of which he was bearer, that he was about to spring up and attempt an escape, he knew not wherefore or from whom.

"But still young man," said the Father, with the same tone of authority which reigned in his whole manner, although mingled with sisterly courtesy. "You are in no danger—my character shall be a pledge for your safety. By whom do you suppose these words have been written?"

Fairford could have answered, "by Nanty Ewart," for he remembered seeing that person scribble something with a pencil, although he was not well enough to observe with accuracy where, or upon what. But not knowing what suspicious, or what worse consequences, the seaman's interest in his affairs might draw upon him, he judged it best to answer that he knew not the hand.

Father Duonaventure was again silent for a moment or two, which he employed in surveying the letter with the strictest attention, then strayed to the window, as if to examine the address and writing of the envelope with the assistance of a stronger light, and Alan Fairford beheld him, with no less astonishment than high displeasure, covertly and deliberately break the seal, open the letter, and peruse the contents.

"Stop, sir, hold!" he exclaimed, so soon as his astonishment permitted him to express his resentment in words—"by what right do you dare"—

"Peace, young gentleman," said the Father, repelling him with a wave of his hand; "be assured I do not act without warrant—nothing can pass betwixt Mr. Maxwell and Mr. Redgauntlet that I am not fully entitled to know."

"It may be so," said Alan, extremely angry; "but though you may be these gentlemen's father confessor, you are not mine; and in breaking the seal of a letter intrusted to my care, you have done me"—

"No injury, I assure you," answered the unperturbed priest; "on the contrary, it may be a service."

"I desire no advantage at such a rate, or to be obtained in such a manner," answered Fairford; "restore me the letter instantly, or"—

"As you regard your own safety," said the priest, "forbear all injurious expressions, and all menacing gestures. I am not one who can be threatened or insulted with impunity; and there are enough within hearing to chastise any injury or affront offered to me, in case I may think it unbecoming to protect or avenge myself with my own hand."

In saying this, the Father assumed an air of such fearlessness and calm authority, that the young lawyer, surprised and overawed, forbore, as he had intended, to snatch the letter from his hand, and confined himself to bitter complaints of the impropriety of his conduct, and of the light in which he himself must be placed to Redgauntlet, should he present him a letter with a broken seal.

"That," said Father Buonaventure, "shall be fully cared for. I will myself write to Redgauntlet, and enclose Maxwell's letter, provided always you continue to desire to deliver it, after perusing the contents."

He then restored the letter to Fairford, and, observing that he hesitated to peruse it, said emphatically, "Read it, for it concerns you."

This recommendation, joined to what Provost Crosbie had formerly recommended, and to the warning, which he doubted not that Nanty intended to convey by his classical allusion, decided Fairford's resolution. "If these correspondents," he thought, "are conspiring against my person, I have a right to counterplot them; self-preservation, as well as my friend's safety, require that I should not be too scrupulous."

So thinking, he read the letter, which was in the following words:—

"DEAR RUGGED AND DANGEROUS,

"WILL you never cease meriting your old nickname? You have springed your dottrel, I find, and what is the consequence?—why, that there will be hue and cry after you presently. The bearer is a pert young lawyer, who has brought a formal complaint against you, which, luckily, he has preferred in a friendly court. Yet, favourable as the judge was disposed to be, it was with the utmost difficulty that cousin Jenny and I could keep him to his tackle. He begins to be timid, suspicious, and intractable, and I fear Jenny will soon bend her brows on him in vain. I know not what to advise—the lad who carries this is a good lad—active for his friend—and I have pledged my honour he shall have no personal ill-usage—Pledged my honour, remark these words, and remember I can be rugged and dangerous as well as my neighbours. But I have not insured him against a short captivity, and as he is a stirring active fellow, I see no remedy but keeping him out of the way till this business of the good Father B—is safely blown over, which God send it were!—Always thine, even should I be once more

CRAIG-IN-PERIL."

"What think you, young man, of the danger you have been about to encounter so willingly?"

"As strangely," replied Alan Fairford, "as of the extraordinary means which you have been at present pleased to use for the discovery of Mr. Maxwell's purpose."

"Trouble not yourself to account for my conduct," said the Father; "I have a warrant for what I do, and fear no responsibility. But tell me what is your present purpose."

"I should not perhaps name it to you, whose own safety may be implicated."

"I understand you," answered the Father; "you would appeal to the existing government?—That can at no rate be permitted—we will rather detain you at Fairladies by compulsion."

"You will probably," said Fairford, "first weigh the risk of such a proceeding in a free country."

"I have incurred more formidable hazard," said the priest, smiling; "yet I am willing to find a milder expedient. Come; let us bring the matter to a compromise."—And he assumed a conciliating graciousness of manner, which struck Fairford as being rather too condescending for the occasion; "I presume you will be satisfied to remain here in seclusion for a day or two longer, provided I pass my solemn word to you, that you shall meet with the person whom you seek after—meet with him in perfect safety, and I trust, in good health, and be afterwards both at liberty to return to Scotland, or dispose of yourselves as each of you may be minded?"

"I respect the verbum sacerdotis as much as can reasonably be expected from a Protestant," answered Fairford; "but, methinks, you can scarce expect me to repose so much confidence in the word of an unknown person, as is implied in the guarantee which you offer me."

"I am not accustomed, sir," said the Father, in a very haughty tone, "to have my word disputed. But," he added, while the angry hue passed from his cheek after a moment's reflection, "you know me not and ought to be excused. I will repose more confidence in your honour than you seem willing to repose mine; and since we are so situated that one must rely upon the other's faith, I will cause you to be presently at liberty, and furnished with the means of delivering your letter as addressed, provided that now, knowing the contents, you think it safe for yourself to execute the commission."

Alan Fairford paused. "I cannot see," he at length replied, "how I can proceed with respect to the accomplishment of my sole purpose, which is the liberation of my friend, without appealing to the law, and obtaining the assistance of a magistrate. If I present the singular letter of Mr. Maxwell, with the contents of which I have become so unexpectedly acquainted, I shall only share his captivity."

"And if you apply to a magistrate, young man, you will bring ruin on these hospitable ladies, to whom, in all human probability, you owe your life. You cannot obtain a warrant for your purpose, without giving a clear detail of all the late scenes through which you have passed. A magistrate would oblige you to give a complete account of yourself before arming you with his authority against a third party; and in giving such an account, the safety of these ladies will necessarily be compromised. A hundred spies have had, and still have, their eyes upon this mansion; but God will protect his own."—He crossed himself devoutly, and then proceeded.—"You can take an hour to think of your best plan, and I will pledge myself to forward it thus far, provided it be not asking you to rely more on my word than your prudence can warrant. You shall go to Redgauntlet.—I name him plainly, to show my confidence in you—and you shall deliver him this letter of Mr. Maxwell's, with one from me, in which I will enjoin him to set your friend at liberty, or at least to make no attempts upon your own person, either by detention or otherwise. If you can trust me thus far," he said with a proud emphasis on the words, "I will on my side see you depart from this place with the most perfect confidence that you will not return armed with powers to drag its inmates to destruction. You are young and inexperienced—bred to a profession which sharpens suspicion, and gives false views of human nature. I have seen much of the world, and have known better than most men, how far mutual confidence is requisite in managing affairs of consequence."

He spoke with an air of superiority, even of authority, by which Fairford, notwithstanding his own internal struggles, was silenced and overawed so much, that it was not till the Father had turned to leave the apartment that he found words to ask him what the consequences would be, should he decline to depart on the terms proposed.

"You must then, for the safety of all parties, remain for some days an inhabitant of Fairladies, where we have the means of detaining you, which self-preservation will in that case compel us to make use of. Your captivity will be short; for matters cannot long remain as they are—The cloud must soon rise, or it must sink upon us for ever.—Benedicite!"

With these words he left the apartment.

Fairford, upon his departure, felt himself much at a loss what course to pursue. His line of education, as well as his father's tenets in matters of church and state, had taught him a holy horror for Papists, and a devout belief in whatever had been said of the punic faith of Jesuits, and of the expedients of mental reservation, by which the Catholic priests in general were supposed to evade keeping faith with heretics. Yet there was something of majesty, depressed indeed, and overclouded, but still grand and imposing, in the manner and words of Father Buonaventure, which it was difficult to reconcile with those preconceived opinions which imputed subtlety and fraud to his sect and order. Above all, Alan was aware, that if he accepted not his freedom upon the terms offered him, he was likely to be detained by force; so that, in every point of view, he was a gainer by adopting them.

A qualm, indeed, came across him, when he considered as a lawyer, that this Father was, probably, in the eye of law, a traitor; and that there was an ugly crime on the Statute Book, called Misprision of Treason. On the other hand, whatever he might think or suspect, he could not take upon him to say that the man was a priest, whom he had never seen in the dress of his order, or in the act of celebrating mass; so that he felt himself at liberty to doubt of that, respecting which he possessed no legal proof. He therefore arrived at the conclusion, that he would do well to accept his liberty, and proceed to Redgauntlet under the guarantee of Father Buonaventure, which he scarce doubted would be sufficient to save him from personal inconvenience. Should he once obtain speech of that gentleman, he felt the same confidence as formerly, that he might be able to convince him of the rashness of his conduct, should he not consent to liberate Darsie Latimer. At all events, he should learn where his friend was, and how circumstanced.

Having thus made up his mind, Alan waited anxiously for the expiration of the hour which had been allowed him for deliberation. He was not kept on the tenter-hooks of impatience an instant longer than the appointed moment arrived, for, even as the clock struck, Ambrose appeared at the door of the gallery, and made a sign that Alan should follow him. He did so, and after passing through some of the intricate avenues common in old houses, was ushered into a small apartment, commodiously fitted up, in which he found Father Buonaventure reclining on a couch, in the attitude of a man exhausted by fatigue or indisposition. On a small table beside him, a silver embossed salver sustained a Catholic book of prayer, a small flask of medicine, a cordial, and a little tea-cup of old china. Ambrose did not enter the room—he only bowed profoundly, and closed the door with the least possible noise, so soon as Fairford had entered.

"Sit down, young man," said the Father, with the same air of condescension which had before surprised, and rather offended Fairford. "You have been ill, and I know too well by my own case, that indisposition requires indulgence.—Have you," he continued, so soon as he saw him seated, "resolved to remain, or to depart?"

"To depart," said Alan, "under the agreement that you will guarantee my safety with the extraordinary person who has conducted himself in such a lawless manner towards my friend, Darsie Latimer."

"Do not judge hastily, young man," replied the Father. "Redgauntlet has the claims of a guardian over his ward, in respect to the young gentleman, and a right to dictate his place of residence, although he may have been injudicious in selecting the means by which he thinks to enforce his authority."

"His situation as an attainted person abrogates such rights," said Fairford, hastily.

"Surely," replied the priest, smiling at the young lawyer's readiness, "in the eye of those who acknowledge the justice of the attainder—but that do not I. However, sir, here is the guarantee—look at its contents, and do not again carry the letters of Uriah."

Fairford read these words:—

"GOOD FRIEND,

"We send you hither a young man desirous to know the situation of your ward, since he came under your paternal authority, and hopeful of dealing with you for having your relative put at large. This we recommend to your prudence, highly disapproving, at the same time, of any force or coercion, when such can be avoided, and wishing, therefore, that the bearer's negotiation may be successful. At all rates, however, the bearer hath our pledged word for his safety and freedom, which, therefore, you are to see strictly observed, as you value our honour and your own. We farther wish to converse with you, with as small loss of time as may be, having matters of the utmost confidence to impart. For this purpose we desire you to repair hither with all haste, and thereupon we bid you heartily farewell.

"You will understand, sir," said the Father, when he saw that Alan had perused his letter, "that, by accepting charge of this missive, you bind yourself to try the effect of it before having recourse to any legal means, as you term them, for your friend's release."

"There are a few ciphers added to this letter," said Fairford, when he had perused the paper attentively,—"may I inquire what their import is?"

"They respect my own affairs," answered the Father, briefly; "and have no concern whatever with yours."

"It seems to me, however," replied Alan, "natural to suppose"—

"Nothing must be supposed incompatible with my honour," replied the priest, interrupting him; "when such as I am confer favours, we expect that they shall be accepted with gratitude, or declined with thankful respect—not questioned or discussed."

"I will accept your letter, then," said Fairford, after a minute's consideration, "and the thanks you expect shall be most liberally paid, if the result answer what you teach me to expect."

"God only commands the issue," said Father Buonaventure. "Man uses means.—You understand, that, by accepting this commission, you engage yourself in honour to try the effect of my letter upon Mr. Redgauntlet, before you have recourse to informations or legal warrants?"

"I hold myself bound, as a man of good faith and honour, to do so," said Fairford.

"Well, I trust you," said the Father. "I will now tell you, that an express, despatched by me last night, has, I hope, brought Redgauntlet to a spot many miles nearer this place, where he will not find it safe to attempt any violence on your friend, should he be rash enough to follow the advice of Mr. Maxwell of Summertrees rather than my commands. We now understand each other."

He extended his hand towards Alan, who was about to pledge his faith in the usual form by grasping it with his own, when the Father drew back hastily. Ere Alan had time to comment upon this repulse, a small side-door, covered with tapestry, was opened; the hangings were drawn aside, and a lady, as if by sudden apparition, glided into the apartment. It was neither of the Miss Arthurets, but a woman in the prime of life, and in the full-blown expansion of female beauty, tall, fair, and commanding in her aspect. Her locks, of paly gold, were taught to fall over a brow, which, with the stately glance of the large, open, blue eyes, might have become Juno herself; her neck and bosom were admirably formed, and of a dazzling whiteness. She was rather inclined to embonpoint, but not more than became her age, of apparently thirty years. Her step was that of a queen, but it was of Queen Vashti, not Queen Esther—the bold and commanding, not the retiring beauty.

Father Buonaventure raised himself on the couch, angrily, as if displeased by this intrusion. "How now, madam," he said, with some sternness; "why have we the honour of your company?"

"Because it is my pleasure," answered the lady, composedly.

"Your pleasure, madam?" he repeated in the same angry tone.

"My pleasure, sir," she continued, "which always keeps exact pace with my duty. I had heard you were unwell—let me hope it is only business which produces this seclusion."

"I am well," he replied; "perfectly well, and I thank you for your care—but we are not alone, and this young man"—

"That young man?" she said, bending her large and serious eye on Alan Fairford, as if she had been for the first time aware of his presence—"may I ask who he is?"

"Another time, madam; you shall learn his history after he is gone. His presence renders it impossible for me to explain farther."

"After he is gone may be too late," said the lady; "and what is his presence to me, when your safety is at stake? He is the heretic lawyer whom those silly fools, the Arthurets, admitted into this house, at a time when they should have let their own father knock at the door in vain, though the night had been a wild one. You will not surely dismiss him?"

"Your own impatience can alone make that step perilous," said the Father; "I have resolved to take it—do not let your indiscreet zeal, however excellent its motive, add any unnecessary risk to the transaction."

"Even so?" said the lady, in a tone of reproach, yet mingled with respect and apprehension. "And thus you will still go forward, like a stag upon the hunter's snares, with undoubting confidence, after all that has happened?"

"Peace, madam," said Father Buonaventure, rising up; "be silent, or quit the apartment; my designs do not admit of female criticism."

To this peremptory command the lady seemed about to make a sharp reply; but she checked herself, and pressing her lips strongly together, as if to secure the words from bursting from them which were already formed upon her tongue, she made a deep reverence, partly as it seemed in reproach, partly in respect, and left the room as suddenly as she had entered it.

The Father looked disturbed at this incident, which he seemed sensible could not but fill Fairford's imagination with an additional throng of bewildering suspicions; he bit his lip, and muttered something to himself as he walked through the apartment; then suddenly turned to his visitor with a smile of much sweetness, and a countenance in which every rougher expression was exchanged for those of courtesy and kindness.

"The visit we have been just honoured with, my young friend, has given you," he said, "more secrets to keep than I would have wished you burdened with. The lady is a person of condition—of rank and fortune—but nevertheless, is so circumstanced, that the mere fact of her being known to be in this country, would occasion many evils. I should wish you to observe secrecy on this subject, even to Redgauntlet or Maxwell, however much I trust them in all that concerns my own affairs."

"I can have no occasion," replied Fairford, "for holding any discussion with these gentlemen, or with any others, on the circumstance which I have just witnessed—it could only have become the subject of my conversation by mere accident, and I will now take care to avoid the subject entirely."

"You will do well, sir, and I thank you," said the Father, throwing much dignity into the expression of obligation which he meant to convey. "The time may perhaps come when you will learn what it is to have obliged one of my condition. As to the lady, she has the highest merit, and nothing can be said of her justly which would not redound to her praise. Nevertheless—in short, sir, we wander at present as in a morning mist—the sun will, I trust, soon rise and dispel it, when all that now seems mysterious will be fully revealed—or it will sink into rain," he added, in a solemn tone, "and then explanation will be of little consequence.—Adieu, sir; I wish you well."

He made a graceful obeisance, and vanished through the same side-door by which the lady had entered; and Alan thought he heard their voices high in dispute in the adjoining apartment.

Presently afterwards, Ambrose entered, and told him that a horse and guide waited him beneath the terrace.

"The good Father Buonaventure," added the butler, "has been graciously pleased to consider your situation, and desired me to inquire whether you have any occasion for a supply of money?"

"Make my respects to his reverence," answered Fairford, "and assure him I am provided in that particular. I beg you also to make my acknowledgments to the Miss Arthurets, and assure them that their kind hospitality, to which I probably owe my life, shall be remembered with gratitude as long as that life lasts. You yourself, Mr. Ambrose, must accept of my kindest thanks for your skill and attention."

Mid these acknowledgments they left the house, descended the terrace, and reached the spot where the gardener, Fairford's old acquaintance, waited for him, mounted upon one horse, and leading another.

Bidding adieu to Ambrose, our young lawyer mounted, and rode down the avenue, often looking back to the melancholy and neglected dwelling in which he had witnessed such strange scenes, and musing upon the character of its mysterious inmates, especially the noble and almost regal seeming priest, and the beautiful but capricious dame who, if she was really Father Buonaventure's penitent, seemed less docile to the authority of the church, than Alan conceived, the Catholic discipline permitted. He could not indeed help being sensible that the whole deportment of these persons differed much from his preconceived notions of a priest and devotee. Father Buonaventure, in particular, had more natural dignity and less art and affectation in his manner, than accorded with the idea which Calvinists were taught to entertain of that wily and formidable person, a Jesuitical missionary.

While reflecting on these things, he looked back frequently at the house, that Dick Gardener, a forward, talkative fellow, who began to tire of silence at length said to him, "I think you will know Fairford's when you see it again, sir?"

"I dare say I shall, Richard," answered Fairford, good-humouredly. "I wish I knew as well where I am to go next. But you can tell me, perhaps?"

"Your worship should know better than I," said Dick Gardener; "nevertheless, I have a notion you are going where all you Scotsmen should be sent, whether you will or no."

"Not to the devil, I hope, good Dick?" said Fairford.

"Why, no. That is a road which you may mark as heretics; but as Scotsmen, I would only send you three-fourths of the way—and that is back to Scotland again—always craving your honour's pardon."

"Does our journey lie that way?" said Fairford.

"As far as the water side," said Richard. "I am to carry you to old Father Crackenthorp's, and as you are within a spit and a stride of Scotland, as the saying is. But mayhap you may think twice of going thither, for all that; for Old England is fat feeding ground for north-country cattle."

CHAPTER XVII.

NARRATIVE OF DARSIE LATIMER.

Our history must now, as the old romancers were to say, "leave to tell" of the quest of Alan Fairford, and instruct our readers of the adventures which befell Darsie Latimer, left as he was in the precarious custody of his self-named tutor, the Laird of the Lochs of Solway, to whose arbitrary pleasure he found it necessary for the present to conform himself.

In consequence of this prudent resolution, and although he did not assume such a disguise without some sensations of shame and degradation. Darsie permitted Cristal Nixon to place over his face, and secure by a string, one of those silk masks which ladies frequently wore to preserve their complexions, when exposed to the air during long turns on horseback. He remonstrated somewhat more vehemently against the long riding-skirt, which converted his person from the waist into the female guise, but was obliged to concede this point also.

The metamorphosis was then complete; for the fair reader must be informed, that in those rude times, the ladies, when they honoured the masculine dress by assuming any part of it, wore just such hats, coats, and waistcoats, as the male animals themselves made use of, and had no notion of the elegant compromise betwixt male and female attire, which has now acquired par excellence, the name of a habit. Trolloping things our mothers must have looked, with long square-cut coats, lacking collars, and with waistcoats plentifully surcharged with a length of pocket, which hung far downwards from the middle. But then they had some advantage from the splendid colours, lace, and gay embroidery, which masculine attire then exhibited; and, as happens in many similar instances, the finery of the materials made amends for the want of symmetry and grace of form in the garments themselves. But this is a digression.

In the court of the old mansion, half manor-place, half farm-house, or rather a decayed manor-house, converted into an abode for a Cumberland tenant, stood several saddled horses. Four or five of them were mounted by servants or inferior retainers, all of whom were well-armed with sword, pistol, and carbine. But two had riding furniture for the use of females—the one being accoutred with a side-saddle, the other with a pillion attached to the saddle.

Darsie's heart beat quicker within him; he easily comprehended that one of these was intended for his own use; and his hopes suggested that the other was designed for that of the fair Green-Mantle, whom, according to his established practice, he had adopted for the queen of his affections, although his opportunities of holding conversation with her had not exceeded the length of a silent supper on one occasion, and the going down a country-dance on another. This, however, was no unwonted mood of passion with Darsie Latimer, upon whom Cupid was used to triumph only in the degree of a Mahratta conqueror, who overruns a province with the rapidity of lightning, but finds it impossible to retain it beyond a very brief space. Yet this new love was rather more serious than the scarce skinned-up wounds which his friend Fairford used to ridicule. The damsel had shown a sincere interest in his behalf; and the air of mystery with which that interest was veiled, gave her, to his lively imagination, the character of a benevolent and protecting spirit, as much as that of a beautiful female.

At former times, the romance attending his short-lived attachments had been of his own creating, and had disappeared soon as ever he approached more closely to the object with which he had invested it. On the present occasion, it really flowed from external circumstances, which might have interested less susceptible feeling, and an imagination less lively than that of Darsie Latimer, young, inexperienced, and enthusiastic as he was.

He watched, therefore, anxiously to whose service the palfrey bearing the lady's saddle was destined. But ere any female appeared to occupy it, he was himself summoned to take his seat on the pillion behind Cristal Nixon, amid the grins of his old acquaintance Jan, who helped him to horse, and the unrestrained laughter of Cicely, who displayed on the occasion a case of teeth which might have rivalled ivory.

Latimer was at an age when being an object of general ridicule even to clowns and milkmaids, was not a matter of indifference, and he longed heartily to have laid his horse-whip across Jan's shoulders. That, however, was a solacement of his feelings which was not at the moment to be thought of; and Cristal Nixon presently put an end to his unpleasant situation, by ordering the riders to go on. He himself kept the centre of the troop, two men riding before and two behind him, always, as it seemed to Darsie, having their eye upon him, to prevent any attempt to escape. He could see from time to time, when the straight line of the road, or the advantage of an ascent permitted him, that another troop of three or four riders followed them at about a quarter of a mile's distance, amongst whom he could discover the tall form of Redgauntlet, and the powerful action of his gallant black horse. He had little doubt that Green-Mantle made one of the party, though he was unable to distinguish her from the others.

In this manner they travelled from six in the morning until nearly ten of the clock, without Darsie's exchanging a word with any one; for he loathed the very idea of entering into conversation with Cristal Nixon, against whom he seemed to feel an instinctive aversion; nor was that domestic's saturnine and sullen disposition such as to have encouraged advances, had he thought of making them.

At length the party halted for the purpose of refreshment; but as they had hitherto avoided all villages and inhabited places upon their route, so they now stopped at one of these large ruinous Dutch barns, which are sometimes found in the fields, at a distance from the farm-houses to which they belong. Yet in this desolate place some preparations had been made for their reception. There were in the end of the barn, racks filled with provender for the horses, and plenty of provisions for the party were drawn from the trusses of straw, under which the baskets that contained them had been deposited. The choicest of these were selected and arranged apart by Cristal Nixon, while the men of the party threw themselves upon the rest, which he abandoned to their discretion. In a few minutes afterwards the rearward party arrived and dismounted, and Redgauntlet himself entered the barn with the green-mantled maiden by his side. He presented her to Darsie with these words:—

"It is time you two should know each other better. I promised you my confidence, Darsie, and the time is come for reposing it. But first we will have our breakfast; and then, when once more in the saddle, I will tell you that which it is necessary that you should know. Salute Lilius, Darsie."

The command was sudden, and surprised Latimer, whose confusion was increased by the perfect ease and frankness with which Lilius offered at once her check and her hand, and pressing his, as she rather took it than gave her own, said very frankly, "Dearest Darsie, how rejoiced I am that our uncle has at last permitted us to become acquainted!"

Darsie's head turned round; and it was perhaps well that Redgauntlet called on him to sit down, as even that movement served to hide his confusion. There is an old song which says—

— "When ladies are willing,
A man can but look like a fool;"

And on the same principle Darsie Latimer's looks at this unexpected frankness of reception, would have formed an admirable vignette for illustrating the passage. "Dearest Darsie," and such a ready, nay, eager salute of lip and hand!—It was all very gracious, no doubt—and ought to have been received with much gratitude; but, constituted as our friend's temper was, nothing could be more inconsistent with his tone of feeling. If a hermit had proposed to him to club for a pot of beer, the illusion of his reverend sanctity could not have been dispelled more effectually than the divine qualities of Green-Mantle faded upon the ill-imagined frank-heartedness of poor Lilius. Vexed with her forwardness, and affronted at having once more cheated himself, Darsie could hardly help muttering two lines of the song we have already quoted:

"The fruit that must fall without shaking Is rather too mellow for me."

And yet it was pity of her too—she was a very pretty young woman—his fancy had scarce overrated her in that respect—and the slight disarrangement of the beautiful brown locks which escaped in natural ringlets from under her riding-hat, with the bloom which exercise had brought into her cheek, made her even more than usually fascinating. Redgauntlet modified the sternness of his look when it was turned towards her, and, in addressing her, used a softer tone than his usual deep bass. Even the grim features of Cristal Nixon relaxed when he attended on her, and it was then, if ever, that his misanthropical visage expressed some sympathy with the rest of humanity.

"How can she," thought Latimer, "look so like an angel, yet be so mere a mortal after all?—How could so much seeming modesty have so much forwardness of manner, when she ought to have been most reserved? How can her conduct be reconciled to the grace and ease of her general deportment?"

The confusion of thoughts which occupied Darsie's imagination, gave to his looks a disordered appearance, and his inattention to the food which was placed before him, together with his silence and absence of mind, induced Lilius solicitously to inquire, whether he did not feel some return of the disorder under which he had suffered so lately. This led Mr. Redgauntlet, who seemed also lost in his own contemplations, to raise his eyes, and join in the same inquiry with some appearance of interest. Latimer explained to both, that he was perfectly well.

"It is well it is so," answered Redgauntlet; "for we have that before us which will brook no delay from indisposition—we have not, as Hotspur says, leisure to be sick."

Lilius, on her part, endeavoured to prevail upon Darsie to partake of the food which she offered him, with a kindly and affectionate courtesy, corresponding to the warmth of the interest she had displayed at their meeting; but so very natural, innocent, and pure in its character, that it would have been impossible for the vainest coxcomb to have mistaken it for coquetry, or a desire of captivating a prize so valuable as his affections. Darsie, with no more than the reasonable share of self-opinion common to most youths when they approach twenty-one, knew not how to explain her conduct.

Sometimes he was tempted to think that his own merits had, even during the short intervals when they had seen each other, secured such a hold of the affections of a young person, who had probably been bred up in ignorance of the world and its forms, that she was unable to conceal her partiality. Sometimes he suspected that she acted by her guardian's order, who, aware that he, Darsie, was entitled to a considerable fortune, might have taken this bold stroke to bring about a marriage betwixt him and so near a relative.

But neither of these suppositions was applicable to the character of the parties. Miss Lilius's manners, however soft and natural, displayed in their ease and versatility considerable acquaintance with the habits of the world, and in the few words she said during the morning repast, there were mingled a shrewdness and good sense, which could scarce belong to a Miss capable of playing the silly part of a love-smitten maiden so broadly. As for Redgauntlet, with his stately bearing, his fatal frown, his eye of threat and of command, it was impossible, Darsie thought, to suspect him of a scheme having private advantage for its object;—he could as soon have imagined Cassius picking Cæsar's pocket, instead of drawing his poniard on the Dictator.

While he thus mused, unable either to eat, drink, or answer to the courtesy of Lilius, she soon ceased to speak to him, and sat silent as himself.

They had remained nearly an hour in their halting-place, when Redgauntlet said aloud, "Look out, Cristal Nixon. If we hear nothing from Fairladies, we must continue our journey."

Cristal went to the door, and presently returned and said to his master, in a voice as harsh as his features, "Gilbert Gregson is coming, his horse as white with foam as if a fiend had ridden him."

Redgauntlet threw from him the plate on which he had been eating, and hastened towards the door of the barn, which the courier at that moment entered; a smart jockey with a black velvet hunting-cap, and a broad belt drawn tight round his waist, to which was secured his express-bag. The variety of mud with which he was splashed from cap to spur, showed he had had a rough and rapid ride. He delivered a letter to Mr. Redgauntlet, with an obeisance, and then retired to the end of the barn, where the other attendants were sitting or lying upon the straw, in order to get some refreshment.

Redgauntlet broke the letter open with haste, and read it with anxious and discomposed looks. On a second perusal, his displeasure seemed to increase, his brow darkened, and was distinctly marked with the fatal sign peculiar to his family and house. Darsie had never before observed his frown bear such a close resemblance to the shape which tradition assigned it.

Redgauntlet held out the open letter with one hand, and struck it with the forefinger of the other, as, in a suppressed and displeased tone, he said to Cristal Nixon, "Countermanded—ordered northward once more!—Northward, when all our hopes lie to the south—a second Derby direction, when we turned our back on glory, and marched in quest of ruin!"

Cristal Nixon took the letter and ran it over, then returned it to his master with the cold observation, "a female influence predominates."

"But it shall predominate no longer," said Redgauntlet; "it shall wane as ours rises in the horizon. Mean while, I will on before—and you, Cristal, will bring the party to the place assigned in the letter. You may now permit the young persons to have unserved communication together; only mark that you watch the young man closely enough to prevent his escape, if he should be idiot enough to attempt it, but not approaching so close as to watch their free conversation."

"I care naught about their conversation," said Nixon, surlily.

"You hear my commands, Lilius," said the Laird, turning to the young lady. "You may use my permission and authority to explain so much of our family matters as you yourself know. At our next meeting I will complete the task of disclosure, and I trust I shall restore one Redgauntlet more to the bosom of our ancient family. Let Latimer, as he calls himself, have a horse to himself; he must for some time retain his disguise.—My horse—my horse!"

In two minutes they heard him ride off from the door of the barn, followed at speed by two of the armed men of his party.

The commands of Cristal Nixon, in the mean while, put all the remainder of the party in motion, but the Laird himself was long out of sight ere they were in readiness to resume their journey. When at length they set out, Darsie was accommodated with a horse and side-saddle, instead of being obliged to resume his place on the pillion behind the detestable Nixon. He was obliged, however, to retain his riding skin, and to reassume his mask. Yet notwithstanding this disagreeable circumstance, and although he observed that they gave him the heaviest and slowest horse of the party, and that, as a farther precaution against escape, he was closely watched on every side, yet none in company with the pretty Lilius was an advantage which overbalanced these inconveniences.

It is true, that this society, to which that very morning he would have looked forward as a glimpse of heaven, had, now that it was thus unexpectedly indulged, something much less rapturous than he had expected.

It was in vain that, in order to avail himself of a situation so favourable for indulging his romantic composition, he endeavoured to coax back, if I may so express myself, that delightful dream of ardent and tender passion; he felt only such a confusion of ideas at the difference between the being whom he had imagined, and her with whom he was now in contact, that it seemed to him like the effect of witchcraft. What most surprised him was, that this sudden disappearance should have died away so rapidly, notwithstanding that the maiden's personal beauty was even greater than he had expected—her demeanour, unless it should be deemed over kind towards himself, as graceful and becoming as he could have fancied it, even in his gayest dreams. It were judging hardly of him to suppose that the mere belief of his having attracted her affections more easily than he expected, was the cause of his ungratefully undervaluing a prize too lightly won, or that his transient passion played around his heart with the flitting radiance of a wintry sunbeam flashing against an icicle, which may brighten it for a moment, but cannot melt it. Neither of these was precisely the case, though such fickleness of disposition might also have some influence in the change.

The truth is, perhaps, that the lover's pleasure, like that of the hunter, is in the chase, and that the brightest beauty loses half its merit, as the fairest flower its perfume when the willing hand can reach it too easily. There must be doubt—there must be danger—there must be difficulty, and if, as the poet says, the course of ardent affection never does run smooth, it is perhaps because, without some intervening obstacle, that which is called the romantic passion of love, in its high poetical character and coloring, can hardly have an existence,—any more than there can be a current in a river, without the stream being narrowed by steep banks, or checked by opposing rocks.

Let not those, however, who enter into a union for life without those embarrassments which delight a Darns Laurier or a Lydia Langrish, and which are perhaps necessary to excite an enthusiastic passion in breasts more firm than theirs, sugar words of their future happiness, because their own alliance is formed under calmer auspices. Mutual esteem, an intimate knowledge of each other's character, even, as in this case, undug by the mine of too partial passion—a suitable proportion of parties in rank and fortune, in taste and pursuits—are more frequently found in a marriage of reason, than in a union of romantic attachment; where the imagination, which probably created the virtue and accomplishments with which it invested the beloved object, is frequently afterwards employed in magnifying the meritorious weaknesses of its own delusion, and exaggerating all the signs of disappointment. Those who follow the banners of Reason are like the well-disciplined battalion which, wearing a more sober uniform, and making a less dazzling show than the light troops commanded by imagination, enjoy more safety, and even more honor, in the conflicts of human life. All this, however, is foreign to our present purpose.

Uncertain in what manner to address her whom he had been lately so anxious to meet with, and embarrassed by a life-dilemma to which his own head-weakness gave some awkwardness, the party had preceded more than a hundred yards before Darns summoned courage to arrest, or even to look at, his companion. Sensible, however, of the impropriety of his silence, he turned to speak to her; and observing that, although she wore her mask, there was something like disappointment and dejection in her manner, he was moved by self-reproach for his own coldness, and hastened to address her in the kindest tone he could assume.

"You must think me cruelly deficient in gratitude, Miss Lilies, that I have been thus long in your company, without thanking you for the interest which you have deigned to take in my unfortunate affairs?"

"I am glad you have at length spoken," she said, "though I own it is more coldly than I expected—"

"Miss Lilies! Darns to take interest—in whom, dear Darns, can I take interest but in you? and why do you put this barrier of ceremony between us, when previous circumstances have already separated for such a length of time?"

Darns was again confounded at the astute candour. If we may use the term, of this frank avowal—"One must love partridge very well," thought he, "to accept it when thrown in one's face—if this is not plain speaking, there is no such place as downright Dunstable in being!"

Embarrassed with these reflections, and himself of a nature sincerely, almost fanatically, delicate, he could only in reply utter such an acknowledgment of his companion's goodness, and his own gratitude.

His answer in a tone partly sorrowful and partly impatient, repeating, with displeased emphasis, the only distinct words he had been able to bring forth—

"Gratitude—gratitude!—O Darns, should those be the phrases between you and me?—Alas! I am too sure you are displeased with me, though I cannot even guess on what account. Perhaps you think I have been too free in venturing upon my visit to your friend. But then remember it was in your behalf, and that I knew no better way to put you on your guard against the misfortune and restraint which you have been subjected to, and are still enduring."

"Dear lady"—and Darns, rallying his recollection, and suspicious of some error in apprehension,—a suspicion which his mode of address inspired at once to communicate to Lilies, for she interrupted him,—

"Lady! dear lady!—For whom, or for what, in Heaven's name, do you take me, that you address me so familiarly?"

Had the question been asked in that enchanted hall in Fairy land, where all interrogations must be answered with absolute sincerity, Darns had certainly replied that he took her for the most frank-hearted and ultra liberal lass that had ever lived since Mother Eve cut the poppy without paring. But as he was still on middle-earth, and free to oval himself of a little polite deceit, he hastily answered, that he believed he had the honour of speaking to the niece of Mr. Redgauntlet.

"Surely," she replied, "but were it not as easy for you to have said, to your own only sister?"

Darns started in his saddle, as if he had received a just shot.

"My sister?" he exclaimed.

"And you did not know it, then?" said she. "I thought your reception of me was cold and indifferent."

A kind and cordial embrace took place between the relatives, and in light was Darns's spirit, that he really felt himself more relieved, by getting quit of the embarrassingness of the last half hour during which he had felt himself in danger of being presented by the attachment of a forward girl, than disappointed by the vanishing of so many day-dreams as he had been in the habit of encouraging during the time when the green-mantled maiden was goddess of his delirium. He had been already flung from his romantic Pegasus, and was too happy at length to find himself with hooves unbroken, though with his back on the ground. He was, besides, with all his whims and follies, a generous, kind-hearted youth, and was delighted to acknowledge or beautiful and sensible relative and to assure her in the warmest terms of his immediate affection and future protection, so much as they should be extricated from their present situation. Smiles and tears mingled on Lilies's cheeks, like showers and sunshine in April weather.

"Out on me," she said, "that I should be so childish as to cry at what makes me so sorely happy! Since, God knows, family-love is what my heart has most longed after, and to which it has been most a stranger. My uncle says that you and I, Darns, are but half Redgauntlets, and that the metal of which our father's family was made, has been bestowed in effluence in our mother's offspring."

"Alas!" said Darns, "I know so little of our family story that I almost doubted that I belonged to the House of Redgauntlet, although the chief of the family himself intimated so much to me."

"The chief of the family?" said Lilies. "You must know little of your own descent indeed, if you swear my uncle by that expression. You yourself, my dear Darns, are the heir and representative of our ancient House, for our father was the elder brother—that brave and unhappy Sir Henry Darns Redgauntlet, who suffered at Corbale in the year 1763. He took the name of Darns, in conjunction with his own, from our mother, heiress to a Cumberland family of great wealth and antiquity of whose large estates you are the undoubted heir although those of your father have been involved in the general doom of forfeiture. But all this must be necessarily unknown to you."

"Indeed I hear it for the first time in my life," answered Darns.

"And you know not that I was your sister?" said Lilies. "No wonder you received me so coldly. What a strange, wild, forward young person you must have thought me—mixing myself in the fortunes of a stranger whom I had only once spoken to—corresponding with him by signs—Good Heaven! what can you have supposed me?"

"And how should I have come to the knowledge of our connexion?" said Darsie. "You are aware I was not acquainted with it when we danced together at Brokenburn."

"I saw that with concern, and fain I would have warned you," answered Lillas; "but I was closely watched, and before I could find or make an opportunity of coming to a full explanation with you on a subject so agitating, I was forced to leave the room. What I did say was, you may remember, a caution to leave the southern border, for I foresaw what has since happened. But since my uncle has had you in his power, I never doubted he had communicated to you our whole family history."

"He has left me to learn it from you, Lillas; and assure yourself that I will hear it with more pleasure from your lips than from his. I have no reason to be pleased with his conduct towards me."

"Of that," said Lillas, "you will judge better when you have heard what I have to tell you;" and she began her communication in the following manner.

CHAPTER XVIII.

"THE House of Redgauntlet," said the young lady, "has for centuries been supposed to lie under a doom, which has rendered vain their courage, their talents, their ambition, and their wisdom. Often making a figure in history, they have been ever in the situation, of men striving against both wind and tide, who distinguish themselves by their desperate exertions of strength, and their persevering endurance of toil, but without being able to advance themselves upon their course, by either vigour or resolution. They pretend to trace this fatality to a legendary history, which I may tell you at a less busy moment."

Darsie intimated, that he had already heard the tragic story of Sir Alberick Redgauntlet.

"I need only say, then," proceeded Lillas, "that our father and uncle felt the family doom in its full extent. They were both possessed of considerable property, which was largely increased by our father's marriage, and were both devoted to the service of the unhappy House of Stewart; but (as our mother at least supposed) family considerations might have withheld her husband from joining openly in the affair of 1745, had not the high influence which the younger brother possessed over the elder, from his more decided energy of character, hurried him along with himself into that undertaking."

"When, therefore, the enterprise came to the fatal conclusion, which bereaved our father of his life, and consigned his brother to exile, Lady Redgauntlet fled from the north of England, determined to break off all communication with her late husband's family, particularly his brother, whom she regarded as having, by their insane political enthusiasm, been the means of his untimely death; and determined that you, my brother, an infant, and that I, to whom she had just given birth, should be brought up as adherents of the present dynasty. Perhaps she was too hasty in this determination—too timidly anxious to exclude, if possible, from the knowledge of the very spot where we existed, a relation so nearly connected with us as our father's only brother. But you must make allowance for what she had suffered. See, brother," she said, pulling her glove off, "these five blood-specks on my arm are a mark by which mysterious Nature has impressed, on an unborn infant, a record of its father's violent death and its mother's miseries."*

* Several persons have brought down to these days the impressions which Nature had thus recorded, when they were yet babes unborn. One lady of quality, whose father was long under sentence of death, previous to the rebellion, was marked on the back of the neck by the sign of a broad axe. Another, whose kinsmen had been slain in battle, and died on the scaffold to the number of seven, bore a child spattered on the right shoulder, and down the arm, with scarlet drops, as if of blood. Many other instances might be quoted.

"You were not then born when my father suffered?" said Darsie.

"Alas, no!" she replied; "nor were you a twelve-month old. It was no wonder that my mother, after going through such scenes of agony, became irresistibly anxious for the sake of her children—of her son in particular; the more especially as the late Sir Henry, her husband, had, by a settlement of his affairs, confided the custody of the persons of her children, as well as the estates which descended to them, independently of those which fell under his forfeiture, to his brother Hugh, in whom he placed unlimited confidence."

"But my mother had no reason to fear the operation of such a deed, conceived in favour of an attainted man," said Darsie.

"True," replied Lillas; "but our uncle's attainder might have been reversed, like that of so many other persons, and our mother, who both feared and hated him, lived in continual terror that this would be the case, and that she should see the author, as she thought him, of her husband's death, come armed with legal powers, and in a capacity to use them for the purpose of tearing her children from her protection. Besides, she feared, even in his incapacitated condition, the adventurous and pertinacious spirit of her brother-in-law, Hugh Redgauntlet, and felt assured that he would make some attempt to possess himself of the persons of the children. On the other hand, our uncle, whose proud disposition might, perhaps, have been soothed by the offer of her confidence, revolted against the distrustful and suspicious manner in which Lady Darsie Redgauntlet acted towards him. She basely abused, he said, the unhappy circumstances in which he was placed, in order to deprive him of his natural privilege of protecting and educating the infants, whom nature and law, and the will of their father, had committed to his charge, and he swore solemnly he would not submit to such an injury. Report of his threats was made to Lady Redgauntlet, and tended to increase those fears which proved but too well founded. While you and I, children at that time of two or three years old, were playing together in a walled orchard, adjacent to our mother's residence, which she had fixed somewhere in Devonshire, my uncle suddenly scaled the wall with several men, and I was snatched up and carried off to a boat which waited for them. My mother, however, flew to your rescue, and as she seized on me, held you fast, my uncle could not, as he has since told me, possess himself of your person, without using unmanly violence to his brother's widow. Of this he was incapable; and, as people began to assemble upon my mother's screaming, he withdrew, after darting upon you and her one of those fearful looks, which, it is said, remain with our family, as a final bequest of Sir Alberick, our ancestor."

"I have some recollection of the scuffle which you mention," said Darsie; "and I think it was my uncle himself (since my uncle he is) who recalled the circumstance to my mind on a late occasion. I can now account for the guarded seclusion under which my poor mother lived—for her frequent tears, her starts of hysterical alarm, and her constant and deep melancholy. Poor lady! what a lot was hers, and what must have been her feelings when it approached to a close!"

"It was then that she adopted," said Lillas, "every precaution her ingenuity could suggest, to keep your very existence concealed from the person whom she feared—nay, from yourself; for she dreaded, as she has said often to have expressed herself, that the wild blood of Redgauntlet would urge you to unite your fortunes to those of your uncle, who was well known still to carry on political intrigues, which most other persons had considered as desperate. It was also possible that he, as well as others, might get his pardon, as government showed every year more lenity towards the remnant of the Jacobites, and then he might claim the custody of your person, as your legal guardian. Either of these events she considered as the direct road to your destruction."

"I wonder she had not claimed the protection of Chancery for me," said Darsie; "or confided me to the care of some powerful friend."

"She was on indifferent terms with her relations, on account of her marriage with our father," said Lilius, "and trusted more to secreting you from your uncle's attempts, than to any protection which law might afford against them. Perhaps she judged unwisely, but surely not unnaturally, for one rendered irritable by so many misfortunes and so many alarms. Samuel Griffiths, an eminent banker, and a worthy clergyman now dead, were, I believe, the only persons whom she intrusted with the execution of her last will; and my uncle believes that she made them both swear to observe profound secrecy concerning your birth and pretensions, until you should come to the age of majority, and, in the mean time to breed you up in the most private way possible, and that which was most likely to withdraw you from my uncle's observation."

"And I have no doubt," said Darsie, "that betwixt change of name and habitation, they might have succeeded perfectly, but for the accident—lucky or unlucky, I know not which to term it—which brought me to Brokenburn, and into contact with Mr. Redgauntlet. I see also why I was warned against England, for in England"—

"In England alone, if I understand rightly," said Miss Redgauntlet, "the claims of your uncle to the custody of your person could have been enforced, in case of his being replaced in the ordinary rights of citizenship, either by the lenity of the government or by some change in it. In Scotland, where you possess no property, I understand his authority might have been resisted, and measures taken to put you under the protection of the law. But, pray, think it not unlucky that you have taken the step of visiting Brokenburn—I feel confident that the consequences must be ultimately fortunate, for, have they not already brought us in contact with each other?"

So saying, she held out her hand to her brother, who grasped it with a fondness of pressure very different from the manner in which they first clasped hands that morning. There was a moment's pause, while the hearts of both were overflowing with a feeling of natural affection, to which circumstances had hitherto rendered them strangers.

At length Darsie broke silence: "I am ashamed," he said, "my dearest Lilius, that I have suffered you to talk so long about matters concerning myself only, while I remain ignorant of your story, and your present situation."

"The former is none of the most interesting, nor the latter the most safe or agreeable," answered Lilius; "but now, my dearest brother, I shall have the inestimable support of your countenance and affection; and were I but sure that we could weather the formidable crisis which I find so close at hand, I should have little apprehensions for the future."

"Let me know," said Darsie, "what our present situation is; and rely upon my utmost exertions both in your defence and my own. For what reason can my uncle desire to detain me a prisoner?—If in mere opposition to the will of my mother, she has long been no more; and I see not why he should wish, at so much trouble and risk, to interfere with the free will of one, to whom a few months will give a privilege of acting for himself, with which he will have no longer any pretence to interfere."

"My dearest Arthur," answered Lilius—"for that name, as well as Darsie, properly belongs to you—it is the leading feature in my uncle's character, that he has applied every energy of his powerful mind to the service of the exiled family of Stewart. The death of his brother, the dilapidation of his own fortunes, have only added to his hereditary zeal for the House of Stewart, a deep and almost personal hatred against the present reigning family. He is, in short, a political enthusiast of the most dangerous character, and proceeds in his agency with as much confidence, as if he felt himself the very Atlas, who is alone capable of supporting a sinking cause."

"And where or how did you, my Lilius, educated, doubtless, under his auspices, learn to have a different view of such subjects?"

"By a singular chance," replied Lilius, "in the mannyery where my uncle placed me. Although the Abbess was a person exactly after his own heart, my education as a pensioner devolved much on an excellent old mother who had adopted the tenets of the Jansenists, with perhaps a still further tendency towards the reformed doctrines, than those of Port-Royale. The mysterious secrecy with which she inculcated these tenets, gave them charms to my young mind, and I embraced them the rather that they were in direct opposition to the doctrines of the Abbess, whom I hated so much for her severity, that I felt a childish delight in setting her control at defiance, and contradicting in my secret soul all that I was openly obliged to listen to with reverence. Freedom of religious opinion brings on, I suppose, freedom of political creed; for I had no sooner renounced the Pope's infallibility, than I began to question the doctrine of hereditary and indefeasible right. In short, strange as it may seem, I came out of a Parisian convent, not indeed an instructed Whig and Protestant, but with as much inclination, to be so as if I had been bred up, like you, within the presbyterian sound of Saint Giles's chimes."

"More so, perhaps," replied Darsie; "for the nearer the church—the proverb is somewhat musty. But how did these liberal opinions of yours agree with the very opposite prejudices of my uncle?"

"They would have agreed like fire and water," answered Lilius, "had I suffered mine to become visible; but as that would have subjected me to constant reproach and upbraiding, or worse, I took great care to keep my own secret; so that occasional censures for coldness, and lack of zeal for the good cause, were the worst I had to undergo; and these were bad enough."

"I applaud your caution," said Darsie.

"You have reason," replied his sister; "but I got so terrible a specimen of my uncle's determination of character, before I had been acquainted with him for much more than a week, that it taught me at what risk I should contradict his humour. I will tell you the circumstances; for it will better teach you to appreciate the romantic and resolved nature of his character, than any thing which I could state of his rashness and enthusiasm."

"After I had been many a long year at the convent, I was removed from thence, and placed with a meagre old Scottish lady of high rank, the daughter of an unfortunate person, whose head had in the year 1715 been placed on Temple-bar. She subsisted on a small pension from the French Court, aided by an occasional gratuity from the Stewarts; to which the annuity paid for my board formed a desirable addition. She was not ill-tempered, nor very covetous—neither beat me nor starved me—but she was so completely trammelled by rank and prejudices, so awfully profound in genealogy, and so bitterly keen, poor lady, in British politics, that I sometimes thought it pity that the Hanoverians, who murdered, as she used to tell me, her poor dear father, had left his dear daughter in the land of the living. Delighted, therefore, was I, when my uncle made his appearance, and abruptly announced his purpose of conveying me to England. My extravagant joy at the idea of leaving Lady Rachel Rouge-dragon, was somewhat qualified by observing the melancholy look, lofty demeanour, and commanding tone of my near relative. He held more communication with me on the journey, however, than consisted with his taciturn demeanour in general, and seemed anxious to ascertain my tone of character, and particularly in point of courage. Now, though I am a tamed Redgauntlet, yet I have still so much of our family spirit as enables me to be as composed in danger as most of my sex; and upon two occasions in the course of our journey—a threatened attack by banditti, and the overturn of our carriage—I had the fortune so to conduct myself, as to convey to my uncle a very favourable idea of my intrepidity. Probably this encouraged him to put in execution the singular scheme which he had in agitation."

"Ere we reached London we changed our means of conveyance, and altered the route by which we approached the city, more than once; then, like a hare which doubles repeatedly at some distance from the seat she means to occupy, and at last leaps into her form from a distance as great as she can clear by a spring, we made a forced march, and landed in private and obscure lodgings in a little old street in Westminster, not far distant from the Cloisters.

"On the morning of the day on which we arrived my uncle went abroad, and did not return for some hours. Mean time I had no other amusement than to listen to the tumult of noises which succeeded each other, or reigned in confusion together, during the whole morning. Paris I had thought the most noisy capital in the world, but Paris seemed midnight silence compared to London. Cannon thundered near and at a distance—drums, trumpets, and military music of every kind, rolled, flourished, and pierced the clouds, almost without intermission. To fill up the concert, bells pealed incessantly from a hundred steeples. The acclamations of an immense multitude were heard from time to time, like the roaring of a mighty ocean, and all this without my being able to glean the least idea of what was going on, for the windows of our apartment looked upon a waste back-yard, which seemed totally deserted. My curiosity became extreme, for I was satisfied, at length, that it must be some festival of the highest order which called forth these incessant sounds.

"My uncle at length returned, and with him a man of an exterior singularly unprepossessing. I need not describe him to you, for—do not look round—he rides behind us at this moment."

"That respectable person, Mr. Cristal Nixon, I suppose?" said Darsie.

"The same," answered Lilius; "make no gesture that may intimate we are speaking of him."

Darsie signified that he understood her, and she pursued her relation.

"They were both in full dress, and my uncle, taking a bundle from Nixon, said to me, 'Lilius, I am come to carry you to see a grand ceremony—put on as hastily as you can the dress you will find in that parcel, and prepare to attend me.' I found a female dress, splendid and elegant, but somewhat bordering upon the antique fashion. It might be that of England, I thought, and I went to my apartment full of curiosity, and dressed myself with all speed.

"My uncle surveyed me with attention—'She may pass for one of the flower-girls,' he said to Nixon, who only answered with a nod.

"We left the house together, and such was their knowledge of the lanes, courts, and bypaths, that though there was the roar of a multitude in the broad streets, those which we traversed were silent and deserted; and the strollers whom we met, tired of gazing upon gayer figures, scarcely honoured us with a passing look, although, at any other time, we should, among these vulgar suburbs, have attracted a troublesome share of observation. We crossed at length a broad street, where many soldiers were at guard, while others, exhausted with previous duty, were eating, drinking, smoking, and sleeping beside their piled arms.

"One day, Nixon,' whispered my uncle, 'we will make these redcoated gentry stand to their muskets more watchfully.'

"Or it will be the worse for them,' answered his attendant, in a voice as unpleasant as his physiognomy.

"Unquestioned and unchallenged by any one, we crossed among the guards, and Nixon tapped thrice at a small postern door in a huge ancient building which was straight before us. It opened, and we entered without my perceiving by whom we were admitted. A few dark and narrow passages at length conveyed us into an immense Gothic hall, the magnificence of which baffles my powers of description.

"It was illuminated by ten thousand wax lights, whose splendour at first dazzled my eyes, coming as we did from these dark and secret avenues. But when my sight began to become steady, how shall I describe what I beheld! Beneath were huge ranges of tables, occupied by princes and nobles in their robes of state—high officers of the crown, wearing their dresses and badges of authority—reverend prelates and judges, the sages of the church and law, in their more sombre, yet not less awful robes—with others whose antique and striking costume announced their importance, though I could not even guess who they might be. But at length the truth burst on me at once—it was, and the murmur around confirmed it, the Coronation Feast. At a table above the rest, and extending across the upper end of the hall, sat enthroned the youthful Sovereign himself, surrounded by the princes of the blood, and other dignitaries, and receiving the suit and homage of his subjects. Heralds and pursuivants, blazing in their fantastic yet splendid armorial habits, and pages of honour, gorgeously arrayed in the garb of other days, waited upon the princely banqueters. In the galleries with which this spacious hall was surrounded, shone all, and more than all, that my poor imagination could conceive, of what was brilliant in riches, or captivating in beauty. Countless rows of ladies, whose diamonds, jewels, and splendid attire, were their least powerful charms, looked down from their lofty seats on the rich scene beneath, themselves forming a show as dazzling and as beautiful as that of which they were spectators. Under these galleries, and behind the banquet tables, were a multitude of gentlemen, dressed as if to attend a court, but whose garb, although not enough to have adorned a royal drawing-room, could not distinguish them in such a high scene as this. Amongst these we wandered for a few minutes, undistinguished and unregarded. I saw several young persons dressed as I was, so was under no embarrassment from the singularity of my habit, and only rejoiced as I hung on my uncle's arm, at the magical splendour of such a scene, and at his goodness for procuring me the pleasure of beholding it.

"By and by, I perceived that my uncle had acquaintances among those who were under the galleries, and seemed, like ourselves, to be mere spectators of the solemnity. They recognised each other with a single word, sometimes only with a gripe of the hand—exchanged some private signs, doubtless—and gradually formed a little group, in the centre of which we were placed.

"Is it not a grand sight, Lilius?" said my uncle. "All the noble, and all the wise, and all the wealthy of Britain, are there assembled."

"It is indeed," said I, "all that my mind could have fancied of regal power and splendour."

"Girl," he whispered,—and my uncle can make his whispers as terribly emphatic as his thundering voice or his blighting look,—"all that is noble and worthy in this fair land are there assembled—but it is to bend like slaves and sycophants before the throne of a new usurper."

"I looked at him, and the dark hereditary frown of our unhappy ancestor was black upon his brow.

"For God's sake," I whispered, "consider where we are."

"Fear nothing," he said; "we are surrounded by friends."—As he proceeded, his strong and muscular frame shook with suppressed agitation.—"See," he said, "yonder bends Norfolk, renegade to his Catholic faith; there stoops the Bishop of ———, traitor to the Church of England; and,—shame of shames! yonder the gigantic form of Errol bows his head before the grandson of his father's murderer! But a sign shall be seen this night amongst them—Mene. Mene. Tekel. Upharsin, shall be read on these walls, as distinctly as the spectral handwriting made them visible on those of Belshazzar!"

"For God's sake," said I, dreadfully alarmed, "is impossible you can meditate violence in such a presence!"

"None is intended, fool," he answered, "nor can the slightest mischance happen, provided you will rally your boasted courage, and obey my directions. Do it coolly and quickly, for there are a hundred lives at stake."

"Alas! what can I do?" I asked in the utmost terror.

"Only be prompt to execute my bidding," said he; "it is but to lift a glove—Here, hold this in your hand—throw the train of your dress over it, be firm, composed, and ready—or, at all events, I step forward myself."

"'If there is no violence designed,' I said, taking mechanically, the iron glove he put into my hand.

"I could not conceive his meaning; but, in the excited state of mind in which I beheld him, I was convinced that disobedience on my part would lead to some wild explosion. If it, from the emergency of the occasion, a sudden presence of mind, and resolved to do any thing that might avert violence and bloodshed. I was not long held in suspense. A loud flourish of trumpets, and the voice of heralds, were mixed with the clatter of horse's hoofs, while a champion armed at all points, like those I had read of in romances, attended by squire, pages, and the whole retinue of chivalry, pranced forward, mounted upon a barbed steed. His challenge, in defiance of all who dared impeach the title of the new sovereign, was received aloud—once and again.

"'Rush in at the third sounding,' said my uncle to me; 'bring me the parader's gage, and leave mine in lieu of it.'

"I could not see how this was to be done, as we were surrounded by people on all sides. But, at the third sounding of the trumpets, a lane opened as if by word of command, betwixt me and the champion, and my uncle said, 'Now, fight now!'

"With a swiftness and steady step, and with a presence of mind for which I have never since been able to account, I discharged my military commission. I was hardly seen. I believe, as I have heard the phrase of battle, and in an instant I felt that 'Nelly dear, my girl!' said my mother, at whose side I found myself, already, as I was looking at the angry signs of the bystanders. 'Come, come, my dear gentleman, go where you please to me, or I will go.'

"Roulet was happy to approach the wall which seemed to be almost without end. I lay down in the dark passage. When I was a few feet behindly passed. Then he and his companion stopped and hastily withdrew into a corner when we were close there; we passed the corner, the edge of the light path or empty street and corner, and took their retired lodgings without attracting the least attention."

"I have only one," said Daise, "and a female, supposed to be a man in a dress - and yet, ladies, you do not look very much better - and taken up the champion's mantle at the late Anti-Slavery Convention, and in this place - and so forth, with a poor offering to accept the combat, provided a fair field should be allowed me." "I have," she continued, "it as an idle tale. Little thought how partly I was interested in the actors of a scene so daring - How could you have courage to go through with it?"

"Had I had time for reflection," answered his sister, "I should have refused on a mixture of principle and on fear. But like many people who do daring acts, I went on to save a life and not time to think of retreating. The matter was little known, and it is said the King had commanded that it should not be farther inquired into;—from prudence, as I suppose, and lenity, though my uncle chooses to ascribe the forbearance of the Elector of Hanover, as he calls him, sometimes to pusillanimity, and sometimes to a presumptuous scorn of the faction who opposes his title."

* The particulars here given are of course entirely imaginary, what is, they have no other foundation than what is to be found in the popular history of the Revolution. Yet a report to such an effect was long and generally current, though now having wholly lost its lingering credit. Those who gave it currency, if they did not originate it, dealt with the tradition, as if any would red in the dust. The attack led to the unfortunate horse of Stewart and its fall certainly continued to exist and to be freely cherished longer than in any similar case in any other country. It, when reason was baffled, and all hope destroyed, by reports of the nation, the more dreams of imaginary war, seemed to lead to fix on the dreary blank left in country hearts. Of the many reports set on foot and circulated from the cause, the tradition in question, though almost forgotten, has been preserved as a fine historical relic; and in excuse of what might be considered as a violent reflection on probability, in the foregoing chapter, the author is under the necessity of saying, "It was always said, though with very little appearance of truth, that upon the coronation of George III., when the Champion of England, Dymock, or his representative, appeared in Westminster Hall, and, in the language of chivalry, solemnly vowed to defend in single combat the right of the young King to the crown of these realms, at the moment when he flung down his gauntlet as the sign of battle, an unknown man, separated from the crowd and lifted the pledge, saying to another man in token of it with a paper expressing that if a farther contest should be allowed, a champion of rank and nobility of Europe with equal arms to dispute the claim of King or nobles the British kingdoms. The story, as we have said, is but one of the numerous fictions which were circulated to keep up the spirits of a sinking faction. The incident was, however, possible, if it could be supposed to be attended by any motive adequate to the risk, and might be imagined to occur to a person of Redgauntlet's enthusiastic character.

"And have your subsequent agencies under this frantic enthusiast," said Darsie, "equalled this in danger?"

"No—nor in importance," replied Lilius; "though I have witnessed much of the strange and desperate machinations, by which, in spite of every obstacle, and in contempt of every danger, he endeavours to awaken the courage of a broken party. I have traversed, in his company, all England and Scotland, and have visited the most extraordinary and contrasted scenes; now lodging at the castles of the proud gentry of Cheshire and Wales, where the retired aristocrats, with opinions as antiquated as their dwellings and their manners, still continue to nourish Jacobinical principles; and the next week, perhaps, spent among outlawed smugglers or Highland banditti. I have known my angel often act the part of a hero, and sometimes that of a more vulgar conspirator, and turn himself, with the most surprising flexibility, into all sorts of shape, to attract proselytes to his cause."

"Which, in the present day," said Darsie, "he finds I have no, no easy task."

"Soberly, calmly, and with a heart that I believe, he has, at different times, disgusted even the total failing away of his friends, and the collapse of others, been almost on the point of resigning his undertaking. How often have I known him sit in an open brow and a cold martyrdom upon the faces of the gentry, and even in the sports of the common people, in order to arrest himself with a temporary notice of popularity which, in fact, his heart was bursting to witness what he called the democracy of the times, the decay of nobility among the great, and the want of zeal in the rising generation. After the day has been passed in the hardest exertions he has spent the night in pacing his solitary chamber, bewailing the downfall of the cause, and wishing for the bullet of Duglas, or the axe of Palmerston."

"A strange delusion," said Douglass; "and it is wonderful that it does not yield to the force of reality."

"Ah, but," replied Talbot, "reckless of late have seemed to flatter his hopes. The general dissatisfaction with the peace—the unpopularity of the minister, which has extended itself even to the person of his master—the various reports which have disturbed the quiet of the metropolis—and a general state of disgust and dissatisfaction, which seem to affect the body of the nation, have given unwarranted encouragement to the exorbitant hopes of the Jacobites, and induced many, both at the Court of Rome, and if it can be proved so of the Pretender, to lend a more favourable ear than they had hitherto given to the insinuations of those who, like my uncle, hope where hope is lost to all but themselves. Now, I really believe that at this moment they undertake some desperate effort. My uncle has been using all his power, of late, to conciliate the affections of the seaward communities that dwell on the Solway, over whom our family possesses a signal interest before the fortitude, and amongst will, on the occasion of 1745, our valiantly father's interest, with his own, raised a considerable body of men. But they are no longer willing to obey his command; and, as one speaks among others, they allege your absence as their natural bond and reason. This has increased his desire to obtain possession of your person, and, if he possibly can, to influence your mind, so as to obtain your authority to his proceedings."

"That he shall never obtain answered Darsie; my principles and my presence alike repel such a step. Besides, it would be totally unavailing to his purpose. Whatever these people may pretend, to evade your uncle's importunities, they cannot, at the time of day, think of subjecting their necks again to the feudal yoke, which was effectually broken by the act of 1748, abolishing vassalage and hereditary jurisdictions."

"Ay, but that my uncle considers as the act of a usurping government," said Lilius.

"Like enough he may think so," answered her brother, "for he is a superior, and loses his authority by the enactment. But the question is, what the vassals will think of it, who have gained their freedom from feudal slavery, and have now enjoyed that freedom for many years? However, to cut the matter short, if five hundred men would rise at the wagging of my finger, that finger should not be raised in a cause which I disapprove of, and upon that my uncle may reckon."

"But you may temporize," said Lilius, upon whom the idea of her uncle's displeasure made evidently a strong impression,—"you may temporize, as most of the gentry in this country do, and let the bubble burst of itself; for it is singular how few of them venture to oppose my uncle directly. I entreat you to avoid direct collision with him. To hear you, the head of the house of Redgauntlet, declare against the family of Stewart, would either break his heart, or drive him to some act of desperation."

"Yes, but, Lilius, you forget that the consequences of such an act of complaisance might be, that the House of Redgauntlet and I might lose both our heads at one blow."

"Alas!" said she, "I had forgotten that danger. I have grown familiar with perilous intrigues, as the nurses in a pest-house are said to become accustomed to the air around them, till they forget even that it is noisome."

"And yet," said Darsie, "if I could free myself from him without coming to an open rupture—Tell me Lilius, do you think it possible that he can have any immediate attempt in view?"

"To confess the truth," answered Lilius, "I cannot doubt that he has. There has been an unusual bustle among the Jacobites of late. They have hopes, as I told you, from circumstances unconnected with their own strength. Just before you came to the country, my uncle's desire to find you out, became, if possible, more eager than ever—he talked of men to be presently brought together, and of your name and influence for raising them. At this very time, your first visit to Brokenburn took place. A suspicion arose in my uncle's mind, that you might be the youth he sought, and it was strengthened by papers and letters which the rascal Nixon did not hesitate to take from your pocket. Yet a mistake might have occasioned a fatal explosion; and my uncle therefore posted to Edinburgh to follow out the clew he had obtained, and fished enough of information from old Mr. Fairford to make him certain that you were the person he sought. Mean while, and at the expense of some personal, and perhaps too bold exertion, I endeavoured, through your friend young Fairford, to put you on your guard."

"Without success," said Darsie, blushing under his mask, when he recollected, how he had mistaken his sister's meaning.

"I do not wonder that my warning was fruitless," said she; "the thing was doomed to be. Besides, your escape would have been difficult. You were dogged the whole time you were at the Shepherd's Bush and at Mount Sharon, by a spy who scarcely ever left you."

"The wretch little Benjie!" exclaimed Darsie. "I will wring the monkey's neck round, the first time we meet."

"It was he indeed who gave constant information of your motions to Cristal Nixon," said Lilius.

"And Cristal Nixon—I owe him, too, a day's work in harvest," said Darsie; "for I am mistaken if he is not the person that struck me down when I was made prisoner among the rioters."

"Like enough; for he has a head and hand for any villany. My uncle was very angry about it; for though the riot was made to have an opportunity of carrying you off in the confusion, as well as to put the fishermen at variance with the public law, it would have been his last thought to have injured a hair of your head. But Nixon has insinuated himself into all my uncle's secrets, and some of these are so dark and dangerous, that though there are few things he would not dare, I doubt if he dare quarrel with him.—And yet I know that of Cristal, would move my uncle to pass his sword through his body."

"What is it, for Heaven's sake?" said Darsie, "I have a particular desire for wishing to know."

"The old brutal desperado, whose face and mind are a libel upon human nature, has had the insolence to speak to his master's niece as one whom he was at liberty to admire; and when I turned on him with the anger and contempt he merited, the wretch grumbled out something, as if he held the destiny of our family in his hand."

"I thank you, Lilius," said Darsie, eagerly.—"I thank you with all my heart for this communication. I have blamed myself as a Christian man for the indescribable longing I felt from the first moment I saw that rascal, to send a bullet through his head; and now you have perfectly accounted for and justified this very laudable wish. I wonder my uncle, with the powerful sense you describe him to be possessed of, does not see through such a villain."

"I believe he knows him to be capable of much evil," answered Lilius—"selfish, obdurate, brutal, and a man-hater. But then he conceives him to possess the qualities most requisite for a conspirator—undaunted courage, imperturbable coolness and address, and inviolable fidelity. In the last particular he may be mistaken. I have heard Nixon blamed for the manner in which our poor father was taken at Culloden."

"Another reason for my innate aversion," said Darsie; "but I will be on my guard with him."

"See, he observes us closely," said Lilius. "Was a thing is conscience!—He knows we are now speaking of him, though he cannot have heard a word that we have said."

It seemed as if she had guessed truly; for Cristal Nixon at that moment rode up to them, and sat with an affectation of jocularity, which sat very ill upon his sullen features, "Come, young ladies; you have had time enough for your chat this morning, and your tongues, I think, must be tired. We are going to pass a village, and I must beg you to separate—you, Miss Lilius, to ride a little behind—and you, Mrs., or Miss, or Master, which ever you choose to be called, to be jogging a little bit before."

Lilius checked her horse without speaking, but not until she had given her brother an expressive look recommending caution; to which he replied by a signal, indicating that he understood and would comply with her request.

CHAPTER XIX.

LEFT to his solitary meditations, Darsie (for we will still term Sir Arthur Darsie Redgauntlet of that name by the name to which the reader is habituated) was surprised not only at the alteration of his own state and condition, but at the equanimity with which he felt himself disposed to view all these vicissitudes.

His fever-fit of love had departed like a morning dream, and left nothing behind but a painful sense of shame, and a resolution to be more cautious ere he again indulged in such romantic visions. His position in society was changed from that of a wand'ring unowned youth, in whom none appeared to take interest, excepting the strangers by whom he had been educated, to the heir of a noble house, possessed of such influence and such property, that it seemed as if the progress or arrest of important political events were likely to depend upon his resolution. Even this sudden elevation, the more than fulfilment of those wishes which had haunted him ever since he was able to form a wish on the subject, was contemplated by Darsie, volatile as his disposition was, with more than a few thrills of gratified vanity.

It is true, there were circumstances in his present situation to counterbalance such high advantages. To be a prisoner in the hands of a man so determined as his uncle, was no agreeable consideration, when he was calculating how he might best dispose of pleasure, and refuse to join him in the perilous enterprise which he seemed to meditate. Outlawed and desperate himself, Darsie could not doubt that his uncle was surrounded by men capable of any thing—that he was restrained by no personal considerations—and therefore what degree of compulsion he might apply to his brother's son, or in what manner he might feel at liberty to punish his contumacy, should be disavowed the Jacobite cause, must depend entirely upon the limits of his own conscience; and who was to answer for the conscience of a heated enthusiast, who considers opposition to the party he has espoused, as treason to the welfare of his country? After a short interval, Cristal Nixon was pleased to throw some light upon the subject which agitated him.

When that grim satellite rode up without ceremony close to Darsie's side, the latter felt his very flesh creep with abhorrence, so little was he able to endure his presence, since the story of Lilius had added to his instinctive hatred of the man. His voice, too, sounded like that of a screech-owl, as he said, "So, my young cock of the north, you now know it all, and no doubt are blessing your uncle for stirring you up to such an honourable action."

"I will acquaint my uncle with my sentiments on the subject, before I make them known to any one else," said Darsie, scarcely prevailing on his tongue to utter even these few words in a civil manner.

"Umph," murmured Cristal between his teeth. "Close as wax, I see; and perhaps not quite so pliable.—But take care, my pretty youth," he added, scornfully; "Hugh Redgauntlet will prove a rough colt-breaker—he will neither spare whip-cord nor spur-rowel, I promise you."

"I have already said, Mr. Nixon," answered Darsie, "that I will canvass those matters of which my sister has informed me, with my uncle himself, and with no other person."

"Nay, but a word of friendly advice would do you no harm, young master," replied Nixon. "Old Redgauntlet is apter at a blow than a word—likely to bite before he barks—the true man for giving Scarborough warning, first knock you down, then bid you stand.—So, methinks, a little kind warning as to consequences were not amiss, lest they come upon you unawares."

"If the warning is really kind, Mr. Nixon," said the young man, "I will hear it thankfully; and indeed, if otherwise, I must listen to it whether I will or no, since I have at present no choice of company or of conversation."

"Nay, I have but little to say," said Nixon, affecting to give to his sullen and dogged manner the appearance of an honest bluntness; "I am as little apt to throw away words as any one. But here is the question—Will you join heart and hand with your uncle, or no?"

"What if I should say Ay?" said Darsie, determined, if possible, to conceal his resolution from this man.

"Why, then," said Nixon, somewhat surprised at the readiness of his answer, "all will go smooth, of course—you will take share in this noble undertaking, and, when it succeeds, you will exchange your open helmet for an Earl's coronet perhaps."

"And how if it fails?" said Darsie.

"Thereafter as it may be," said Nixon; "they who play at bowls must meet with rubbers."

"Well, but suppose, then, I have some foolish tenderness for my windpipe, and that, when my uncle proposes the adventure to me, I should say No—how then, Mr. Nixon?"

"Why, then, I would have you look to yourself, young master—There are sharp laws in France against refractory pupils—letters de cachet are easily come by, when such men as we are concerned, with interest themselves in the matter."

"But we are not in France," said poor Darsie, through whose blood ran a cold shivering at the idea of a French prison.

"A fast-sailing lugger will soon bring you there though, snug stowed under hatches, like a cask of moonlight."

"But the French are at peace with us," said Darsie, "and would not dare"—

"Why, who would ever hear of you?" interrupted Nixon; "do you imagine that a foreign Court would call you up for judgment, and put the sentence of imprisonment in the Courier de l'Europe, as they do at the Old Bailey?—No, no, young gentleman—the gates of the Bastille, and of Mont Saint Michel, and the Castle of Vincennes, move on d—d easy hinges when they let folk in—not the least jar is heard. There are cool cells there for hot heads—as calm, and quiet, and dark, as you could wish in Bedlam—and the dismissal comes when the carpenter brings the prisoner's coffin, and not sooner."

"Well, Mr. Nixon," said Darsie, affecting a cheerfulness which he was far from feeling, "mine is a hard case—a sort of hanging choice, you will allow—since I must either offend our own government here, and run the risk of my life for doing so, or be doomed to the dungeons of another country, whose laws I have never offended, since I have never trod its soil—Tell me what you would do if you were in my place."

"I'll tell you that when I am there," said Nixon, and, checking his horse, fell back to the rear of the little party.

"It is evident," thought the young man, "that the villain believes me completely noosed, and perhaps has the ineffable impudence to suppose that my sister must eventually succeed to the possessions which have occasioned my loss of freedom, and that his own influence over the destinies of our unhappy family may secure him possession of the heiress; but he shall perish by my hand first!—I must now be on the alert to make my escape, if possible, before I am forced on shipboard—Blind Willie will not, I think, desert me without an effort on my behalf, especially if he has learned that I am the son of his late unhappy patron.—What a change is mine! Whilst I possessed neither rank nor fortune, I lived safely and unknown, under the protection of the kind and respectable friends whose hearts Heaven had moved towards me—Now that I am the head of an honourable house, and that enterprises of the most daring character wait my decision, and retainers and vassals seem ready to rise at my beck, my safety consists chiefly in the attachment of a blind stroller!"

While he was revolving these things in his mind, and preparing himself for the interview with his uncle, which could not but be a stormy one, he saw Hugh Redgauntlet come riding slowly back to meet them, without any attendants. Cristal Nixon rode up as he approached, and, as they met, fixed on him a look of inquiry.

"The fool, Crackenthorp," said Redgauntlet, "has let strangers into his house. Some of his smuggling comrades, I believe; we must ride slowly, to give him time to send them packing."

"Did you see any of your friends?" said Cristal.

"Three, and have letters from many more. They are unanimous on the subject you wot of—and the point must be conceded to them, or far as the matter has gone, it will go no farther."

"You will hardly bring the Father to stoop to his flock," said Cristal, with a sneer.

"He must, and shall!" answered Redgauntlet, briefly. "Go to the front, Cristal—I would speak with my nephew.—I trust, Sir Arthur Redgauntlet, you are satisfied with the manner in which I have discharged my duty to your sister?"

"There can be no fault found to her manners or sentiments," answered Darsie; "I am happy in knowing a relative so amiable."

"I am glad of it," answered Mr. Redgauntlet. "I am no nice judge of women's qualifications, and my life has been dedicated to one great object; so that since she left France she has had but little opportunity of improvement. I have subjected her, however, as little as possible to the inconveniences and privations of my wandering and dangerous life. From time to time she has resided for weeks and months with families of honour and respectability, and I am glad that she has, in your opinion, the manners and behaviour which become her birth."

Darsie expressed himself perfectly satisfied, and there was a brief pause, which Redgauntlet broke by suddenly addressing his nephew.

"For you, my nephew, I also hoped to have done much. The weakness and timidity of your mother superseded you from my care, or it would have been my pride and happiness to have trained up the son of my unhappy brother in those paths of honour in which our ancestors have always trod."

"Now comes the storm," thought Darnley to himself, and began to collect his thoughts, as the cautious master of a vessel furled his sails, and makes his ship snug, when he discerns the approaching squall.

"My mother's conduct, in respect to me, might be misjudged," he said, "but it was founded on the most anxious affection."

"Assuredly," said his uncle, "and I have no wish to reflect on her memory, though her mistrust has done so much injury I will not say to me, but to the cause of my unhappy country. Her scheme was, I think, to have made you that wretched prize-taking thing, which they still continue to call in decision by the once respectable name of a Scottish Advocate, one of those mongrel things, that must creep to learn the ultimate decision of his cause to the bar of a foreign Court, instead of pleading before the independent and august Parliament of his own native kingdom."

"I did prosecute the study of law for a year or two," said Darnley, "but I found I had neither taste nor talents for the science."

"And left it with scorn, doubtless," said Mr. Redgauntlet. "Well, I now hold up to you, my dearest nephew, a more worthy object of ambition. Look seaward—do you see a monument standing on your plain near a hamlet?"

Darnley replied that he did.

"The hamlet is calledburgh-upon-sands, and your monument is erected to the memory of the tyrant Edward I. The just hand of Providence overtook him on that spot, as he was leading his hands to complete the subjugation of Scotland, whose civil dissensions began under his accursed policy. The glorious career of Bruce might have been stopped in its outset, the field of Bannockburn might have remained a bloodless turf, if God had not removed, in the very crisis, the crafty and bold tyrant who had so long torn Scotland's bowels. Edward's grave is the cradle of our national freedom. It is within sight of that great landmark of our liberty that I have to propose to you an undertaking, second in honour and importance to none since the immortal Bruce stabbed the Red Comyn, and grasped, with his yet bloody hand, the independent crown of Scotland."

He paused for an answer, but Darnley, overpowered by the energy of his manner and unwilling to exempt himself by a hasty explanation, remained silent.

"I will not argue," said Hugh Redgauntlet, after a pause, "that you are either so dull as not to comprehend the import of my words, or so dastardly as to be dismayed by my proposal, or so utterly degenerate from the blood and monuments of your ancestors, as not to feel my summons as the horse hears the war-cry."

"I will not pretend to misunderstand you, sir," said Darnley, "but an enterprise directed against a dynasty now established for three centuries requires strong arguments, both in point of justice and of expediency, to recommend it to men of conscience and prudence."

"I will not," said Redgauntlet, while his eyes sparkled with anger,—"I will not hear you speak a word against the justice of that enterprise, for which your oppressed country calls with the voice of a parent, entreating her children for aid—or against that noble revenge which your father's blood demands from his dishonoured grave. His skull is yet standing over the Birksgate,* and even its black and smouldering jaws command you to be a man. I ask you, in the name of God, and of your country, will you draw your sword, and go with me to Carlisle, were it but to lay your father's head, now the perch of the obscene owl and carrion crow, and the soil of every ribald clown, in consecrated earth, as befits his long ancestry?"

Darnley, unprepared to answer an appeal urged with so much passion, and not doubting a direct refusal would cost him his liberty or life, was again silent.

"I see," said his uncle, in a more composed tone, "that it is not deficiency of spirit, but the growing habits of a confined education, among the privileged class you were condemned to herd with, that keeps you silent. You are as yet but a juvenile Redgauntlet—your pulse has not yet learned the genuine throbs that answer to the summons of honour and patriotism."

"I trust," replied Darnley, at last, "that I shall never be found indifferent to the call of either, but to answer them with effect—even were I convinced that they now sounded in my ear—I must see some reasonable hope of success in the desperate enterprise to which you would involve me. I look around me and I see a wretched government—an established usurper of a born Herion on the throne—the very High Mountains, upon whom alone the trust of the royal family reposed, embroiled into a quarrel which set under the orders of the reigning dynasty. France has been utterly destroyed by the tremendous losses of the last war, and will hardly recover its empire. All without and within the kingdom is adverse to every enterprise of a hopeless struggle, and you alone seem willing to undertake a desperate enterprise."

"And would undertake it were it ten times more desperate, and have agitated it when ten times the obstacles were interposed—Have I forgot my father's blood? Can I—dare I even now repeat a Pater Noster, since my enemies and the murders remain unforgotten?—Is there an art I have not used, a privation to which I have not submitted, a bring on the crisis which I now behold arising? Have I not been a soldier and a devoted man, foregoing every comfort of social life, remaining in the extreme of devotion until when I might not in proper my prince and country, sacrificing my thing to make converts to this noble cause. No, I done all this, and shall I now stop short?—I have been about to interrupt him, but he pressed his affectionately upon his shoulder, and enjoying a rather exploring silence. "Peace," he said, "my ancestor's name—few of all my hopes and words—Peace, son of my slaughtered brother. I have sought for them, and mourned for them as a mother for an only child. Do not let me again but to the moment when you are restored to my hope. He lives me. I distrust so much my own unwearied power, that I entreat you, as the dearest boon, do not to awaken it at this crisis."

Darnley was not sorry to reply, that his respect for the person of his relation would induce him to aid all who he had to approve him of, before he formed any definite resolution upon the weighty subject of deliberation which he proposed to him.

"Deliberation?" repeated Redgauntlet, impatiently, and yet it is not all said—I wish there had been more warmth in thy reply, Arthur, but I must submit were an eagle bred in a falcon's nest, and hatched like a reclaimed hawk, he could not at first gaze steadily on the sun. Listen to me my dearest Arthur. The view of this action no more implies prudence than the florid colour of a feverish patient is a symptom of health. All is false and hollow—the apparent success of Chatham's administration has plunged the country deeper in debt than all the barons and of Canada are worth, were they as fertile as Yvetot—the dazzling lustre of the victories of Blenheim and Quebec have been dimmed by the diagram of a heavy peace—by the war, England, at immense expense, gained nothing but honour, and that she has gratuitously resigned. Many eyes, formerly all and indifferent, are now looking towards the line of our ancient and rightful monarchs, as the only path

* The northern gate of Carlisle was long garrisoned with the bones of the Scottish rebels executed in this in the approaching storm—the rich are alarmed—the nobles are disgusted—the populace are inflamed—and a band of patriots, whose measures are more safe than their numbers are few, have resolved to set up King Charles's standard."

"But the military," said Darsie—"how can you, with a body of unarmed and disorderly insurgents, propose to encounter a regular army? The Highlanders are now totally disarmed."

"In a great measure, perhaps," answered Redgauntlet; "but the policy which raised the Highland regiments has provided for that. We have already friends in these corps; nor can we doubt for a moment what their conduct will be, when the white cockade is once more mounted. The rest of the standing army has been greatly reduced since the peace; and we reckon confidently on our standard being joined by thousands of the disbanded troops."

"Alas!" said Darsie, "and is it upon such vague hopes as these, the inconstant humour of a crowd, or of a disbanded soldier, that men of honour are invited to risk their families, their property, their life?"

"Men of honour, boy," said Redgauntlet, his eyes glancing with impatience, "set life, property, family, and all at stake, when that honour commands it! We are not now weaker than when seven men, landing in the wilds of Moriaht, shook the throne of the usurper till it tottered—won two pitched fields, besides overrunning one kingdom and the half of another, and, but for treachery, would have achieved what their venturesome successors are now to attempt in their turn."

"And will such an attempt be made in serious earnest?" said Darsie. "Excuse me, my uncle, if I can scarce believe a fact so extraordinary. Will there really be found men of rank and consequence sufficient to renew the adventure of 1745?"

"I will not give you my confidence by halves, Sir Arthur," replied his uncle—"Look at that scroll—what say you to these names?—Are they not the flower of the Western shires—of Wales—of Scotland?"

"The paper contains indeed the names of many that are great and noble," replied Darsie, after perusing it; "but—"

"But what?" asked his uncle impatiently; "do you doubt the ability of those nobles and gentlemen to furnish the aid in men and money, at which they are rated?"

"Not their ability certainly," said Darsie, "for of that I am no competent judge;—but I see in this scroll the name of Sir Arthur Darsie Redgauntlet of that ilk, rated at a hundred men and upwards—I certainly am ignorant how he is to redeem that pledge."

"I will be responsible for the men," replied Hugh Redgauntlet.

"But, my dear uncle," added Darsie, "I hope for your sake, that the other individuals, whose names are here written, have had more acquaintance with your plan than I have been indulged with."

"For thee and thine I can be myself responsible," said Redgauntlet; "for if thou hast not the courage to head the force of thy house, the leading shall pass to other hands, and thy inheritance shall depart from thee, like vigour and verdure from a rotten branch. For these honourable persons a slight condition there is which they annex to their friendship—something so trifling that it is scarce worthy of mention. This boon granted to them by him who is most interested, there is no question they will take the field in the manner there stated."

Again Darsie perused the paper, and felt himself still less inclined to believe that so many men of family and fortune were likely to embark in an enterprise so fatal. It seemed as if some rash plotter had put down at a venture the names of all whom common report tainted with Jacobitism; or if it was really the act of the individuals named, he suspected they must be aware of some mode of excusing themselves from compliance with its purport. It was impossible, he thought, that Englishmen, of large fortune, who had failed to join Charles when he broke into England at the head of a victorious army, should have the least thoughts of encouraging a descent when circumstances were so much less propitious. He therefore concluded the enterprise would fail to pieces of itself, and that his best way was, in the mean time, to remain silent, unless the actual approach of a crisis (which might, however, never arrive) should compel him to give a downright refusal to his uncle's proposition; and if, in the interim, some door for escape should be opened, he resolved within himself not to omit availing himself of it.

Hugh Redgauntlet watched his nephew's looks for some time, and then, as if arriving from some other process of reasoning at the same conclusion, he said, "I have told you, Sir Arthur, that I do not urge your immediate accession to my proposal; indeed the consequences of a refusal would be so dreadful to yourself, so destructive to all the hopes which I have nursed, that I would not risk, by a moment's impatience, the object of my whole life. Yes, Arthur, I have been a self-denying hermit at one time—at another, the apparent associate of outlaws and desperadoes—at another, the subordinate agent of men whom I felt every way my inferiors—not for any selfish purpose of my own, no, not even to win for myself the renown of being the principal instrument in restoring my King and freeing my country. My first wish on earth is for that restoration and that freedom—my next, that my nephew, the representative of my house, and of the brother of my love, may have the advantage and the credit of all my efforts in the good cause. But," he added, drawing on Darsie one of his withering frowns, "if Scotland and my father's House cannot stand and flourish together, then perish the very name of Redgauntlet! perish the son of my brother, with every recollection of the glories of my family, of the affections of my youth, rather than my country's cause should be injured in the tilth of a barleycorn! The spirit of Sir Albenck is alive within me at this moment," he continued, drawing up his stately form, and sitting erect in his saddle, while he pressed his finger against his forehead; "and if you yourself crossed my path in opposition, I swear, by the mark that darkens my brow, that a new deed should be done—a new doom should be deserved!"

He was silent, and his threats were uttered in a tone of voice so deeply resolute; that Darsie's heart sunk within him, when he reflected on the storm of passion which he must encounter, if he declined to join his uncle in a project to which prudence and principle made him equally adverse. He had scarce any hope left but in temporizing until he could make his escape, and resolved to avail himself for that purpose of the delay which his uncle seemed not unwilling to grant. The stern, gloomy look of his companion became relaxed by degrees, and presently afterwards he made a sign to Miss Redgauntlet to join the party, and began a forced conversation on ordinary topics; in the course of which Darsie observed that his sister seemed to speak under the most cautious restraint, weighing every word before she uttered it, and always permitting her uncle to give the tone to the conversation, though of the most trifling kind. This seemed to him (such an opinion had he already entertained of his sister's good sense and firmness) the strongest proof he had yet received of his uncle's peremptory character, since he saw it observed with so much deference by a young person whose sex might have given her privileges, and who seemed by no means deficient either in spirit or firmness.

The little cavalcade was now approaching the house of Father Crackenthorp, situated, as the reader knows, by the side of the Solway, and not far distant from a rude pier, near which lay several fishing-boats, which frequently acted in a different capacity. The house of the worthy publican was also adapted to the various occupations which he carried on, being a large scrambling assemblage of cottages attached to a house of two stories, roofed with flags of sandstone—the original mansion, to which the extension of Master Crackenthorp's trade had occasioned his making many additions. Instead of the single long watering-trough, which usually distinguishes the front of the English public-house of the second class, there were three conveniences of that kind, for the use, as the landlord used to say, of the troop-horser, when the soldiers came to search his house, while a knowing tree and a nod, let you understand what species of troops he was thinking of. A huge ash tree before the door, which had reared itself to a great size and height, in spite of the blasts from the neighbouring railway, overshadowed, as usual, the sto-bench, as our ancestors called it, where, though it was still early in the day several fellows, who seemed to be gentlemen & servants, were drinking beer and smoking. One or two of them were liveries, which seemed known to Mr. Redgauntlet, for he muttered between his teeth, "Poole, haile!" were they on a march to hell, they must have their pistols in liveries with them, that the whole world might know who were going to be damned.

As he thus muttered, he drew bridle before the door of the place, from which several other lurching grooms began to issue, to look with indolent curiosity, as usual, upon an arrival.

Redgauntlet sprang from his horse and saluted his niece to dismount; but, forgetting, perhaps, his nephew's dangers, he did not pay him the attention which his female dress demanded.

The situation of Darnie was indeed something awkward, for Crystal Nixon, out of caution perhaps to prevent escape, had muffled the extreme folds of the riding skirt with which he was accustomed around his ankles and under his feet and there secured it with large buckles. We presume that gentlemen elsewhere may sometimes cast their eyes to that part of the person of the fair equitarians whom they choose occasionally to escort, and if they will compare their own feet like Darnie's, muffled in such a labyrinth of folds and amplitude of robe as modesty doubtless induces the fair even ones to assume upon such occasions, they will allow that on a first attempt, they might find some awkwardness in dismounting. Darnie, at least, was in such a predicament for not receiving adroit assistance from the attendant of Mr. Redgauntlet, he stumbled as he dismounted from the horse, and might have had a bad fall, had it not been broken by the gallant interception of a gentleman, who probably was, on his part, a little surprised at the sudden weight of the distressed fair one whom he had the honour to receive in his embrace. But what was his surprise to that of Darnie's, when the hurry of the moment, and of the accident, prevented him to see that it was his friend Alan Fairford in whose arms he found himself? A thousand apprehensions rushed on him, mingled with the full current of hope and joy, inspired by the unexpected appearance of his beloved friend, at the very crisis, a moment of his fate.

He was about to whisper in his ear, cautioning him at the same time to be silent; yet he hesitated for a second or two to effect his purpose, since, should Redgauntlet take the alarm from any sudden exclamation on the part of Alan, there was no saying what consequences might ensue.

Ere he could decide what was to be done, Redgauntlet, who had entered the house, returned hastily, followed by Crystal Nixon. "I'll release you of the charge of this young lady at," he said laughingly, to Alan Fairford, whom he probably did not recognize.

"I had no desire to intrude, sir," replied Alan; "the lady's situation seemed to require assistance—and—may I have the honour to speak to Mr. Harries at Milnsewark?"

"You are mistaken, sir," said Redgauntlet, turning short off and making a sign with his hand to Crystal, who hurried Darnie, however unwillingly, into the house, whispering in his ear, "Come, man, let us have no making of acquaintance from the windows. Ladies of fashion must be private. Show us a room, Father Crakenthorp."

So saying, he conducted Darnie into the house, interrupting at the same time his person between the suppliant young lady and the stranger of whom he was so suspicious, as to make communication by signs impossible. As they entered, they heard the sound of a fiddle in the stone-floored and well-wanded kitchen, through which they were about to follow their companion host, and where several people seemed engaged in dancing to its strains.

"D—n thee," said Nixon to Crakenthorp, "could you have the lady go through all the mob of the parish?—Hast thou no more private way to our sitting room?"

"None that is fit for my travelling," answered the landlord, laying his hand on his partly-stomach. "I am not Tom Turpinney, to creep like a lizard through by-places."

So saying, he kept moving on through the corridor, in the kitchen, and Nixon holding Darnie by his arm, as if to offer the lady support, but in all probability to frustrate any effort at escape, moved through the crowd which presented a very motley appearance, consisting of domestic servants, country fellows, women, and other idlers, whom Wandering Willie was regaling with his music.

To pass another friend without intimation of his presence would have been actual pollution, and just when they were passing the blind man's closed seat, Darnie asked him, with some emphasis, what he could not play a Scottish air? The man had been the instant before devoid of all sort of expression, going through his performance like a clown through a beautiful country, too much accustomed to consider it as a task to take any interest in his performance; and, in fact, scarce seeming to him to know that he was creating. In a word he made the time have made a comely man to my friend Willie, a man of no ordinary kind of character. But with Wandering Willie there was only an occasional and a rare fit of talent, such as will at times creep over all the performers of the fine arts, arising either from fatigue, or weariness of the present audience, or that caprice which is a temple painter's and musician's, and great grace of the phrase of the latter to walk through that process of sorting themselves with the energy of a quarrelled lover. But when the performer heard the voice of Darnie, his countenance became illuminated, and showed the complete mastery of those who suppose that the principal point of appearance depends upon the eye. With his face turned the point from which the sound came, his eyes a little curved, and quivering with agitation, and with colour which surprise and pleasure had brought to once more his faded cheek, he exchanged the humble harp which he had been sawing out with slow and lazy bow, for the fine Scottish air, which flew from his strings as if by inspiration, and after a breathless pause of admiration among the audience, was received with a clamour of applause, which seemed to show that the name and manner as well as the execution of the tune, was in the highest degree acceptable to all the party assembled.

In the mean time, Crystal Nixon, still holding hold of Darnie, and following the landlord, found his way with some difficulty through the crowded kitchen, and entered a small apartment on the other side of it, where they found Lillie Redgauntlet already seated. Here Nixon gave way to his oppressed resentment, and turning sternly on Crakenthorp, threatened him with his master's severe displeasure, because things were in such bad order to receive his family when he had given such good advice that he desired to be private. But Father Crakenthorp was not a man to be brow-beaten.

"Why brother Nixon, thou art angry this evening," he replied, "hast thou from thy wrongs? I think, you know, as well as I, that most of the mob is of the square's own making—gentlemen to come with their servants, and so forth, to meet him in the way of business, as old Tom Turpinney and the very last that came was sent down with the Gardener from Paradise."

"But the blind scraping scoundrel yonder," said Nixon, "how dared you take such a rural as the square your threshold at such a time as this?—If the square should dream you have a thought of parting—I am only speaking for your good, Father Crakenthorp."

look ye, brother Nixon," said Crackenthorp, "the very worthy gentleman, and I'll never at I am neither his servant nor his tenant, need send me none of his orders till he be put on his livery. As for turning away my door, I might as well plug up the ale-tap, down the sign—and as for peaching, and he Squire will find the folk here are as full as those he brings with him."

"You impudent lump of tallow," said Nixon, "you mean by that?"

"No," said Crackenthorp, "but that I can be as well as another—you understand me—lights in my upper story—know a thing or two about most folk in this country. If folk will send me on dangerous errands, egad they'll find Joe Crackenthorp a cat's-paw. I'll be clear, you may depend on it, and let every man do for his own actions—that's my way—wanted, Master Nixon?"

"—begone!" said Nixon, who seemed vexed with the landlord's contumacy, yet desirous of the effect it produced on him.

There was no sooner closed on Crackenthorp, than Redgauntlet, addressing Nixon, commenced to leave the room, and go to his pro-madam?" said the fellow sullenly, yet with respect, "Would you have your uncle pistol-beying his orders?"

"May perhaps pistol you for some other offence," said Lillias, "you do not obey mine," said Lillias, coming to use your advantage over me, madam—I will not go—I am on guard over this other Miss Fairford. If I should desert my post, my life were not worth the purchase."

"Now your post, sir," said Lillias, "and watch the side of the door. You have no commission in our private conversation, I suppose? Beware without further speech or remonstrance, or any uncle that which you would have reason to be should know."

He looked at her with a singular expression mixed with deference. "You abuse your position, madam," he said, "and act as foolishly as I did in affording you such a hank. But you are a tyrant; and tyrants have short reigns."

Then he left the apartment.

"Crackenthorp's unparalleled insolence," said Lillias to her, "has given me one great advantage. For, knowing that my uncle would shoot as little remorse as a woodcock, if he but had his brazen-faced assurance towards me, he has since that time assumed, so far as I am concerned, an air of insolent domination which the possession of my uncle's secrets, and the knowledge of his secret plans, have led him to exert over his family."

"In the meantime," said Darsie, "I am happy to see the landlord of the house does not seem so much to me as I apprehended; and this aids the escape which I am nourishing for you and for me. O, Lillias! the trust of friends, Alan Fairford in pursuit of me, and is here at this moment—another humble, but, I think, faithful friend, behind these dangerous walls."

She laid her finger on her lips, and pointed to the door. Darsie took the hint, lowered his voice, and spoke to her in whispers of the arrival of Fairford, and how he believed he had opened a communication with Willie. She listened with the utmost interest, and had just begun to reply, when a loud knock was heard in the kitchen, caused by several convulsions, amongst which Darsie thought he might distinguish that of Alan Fairford.

Knowing how little his own condition permitted him to do, the assistant of another, Darsie flew out of the room, and finding it locked and the outside, rushed against it with all his might, and made the most desperate efforts to burst through, notwithstanding the entreaties of his sister that he would compose himself, and recollect the condition in which he was placed. But the door, framed to withstand the attacks of excisemen, constables, and other personages, considered as worthy to use what are called the King's keys,* "and there-with to make lockfast places open and patent," set his efforts at defiance. Mean time the noise continued without, and we are to give an account of its origin in our next chapter.

CHAPTER XX.

JOE CRACKENTHORB'S public-house had never, since it first reared its chimneys on the banks of the Solway, been frequented by such a miscellaneous group of visitors as had that morning become its guests. Several of them were persons whose quality seemed much superior to their dresses and modes of travelling. The servants who attended them contradicted the inferences to be drawn from the garb of their masters, and, according to the custom of the knights of the rainbow, gave many hints that they were not people to serve any but men of first-rate consequence. These gentlemen, who had come thither chiefly for the purpose of meeting with Mr. Redgauntlet, seemed moody and anxious, conversed and walked together, apparently in deep conversation, and avoided any communication with the chance travellers whom accident brought that morning to the same place of resort.

As if Fate had set herself to confound the plans of the Jacobite conspirators, the number of travellers was unusually great, their appearance respectable, and they filled the public tap-room of the inn, where the political guests had already occupied most of the private apartments.

Amongst others, honest Joshua Geddes had arrived, travelling, as he said, in the sorrow of the soul, and mourning for the fate of Darsie Latimer as he would for his first-born child. He had skirted the whole coast of the Solway, besides making various trips into the interior, not shunning, on such occasions, to expose himself to the laugh of the scorner, nay, even to serious personal risk, by frequenting the haunts of smugglers, horse-jockeys, and other irregular persons, who looked on his intrusion with jealous eyes, and were apt to consider him as an exciseman in the disguise of a Quaker. All this labour and peril, however, had been undergone in vain. No search he could make obtained the least intelligence of Latimer, so that he began to fear the poor lad had been spirited abroad; for the practice of kidnapping was then not infrequent, especially on the western coasts of Britain, if indeed he had escaped a briefer and more bloody fate.

With a heavy heart, he delivered his horse, even Solomon, into the hands of the hostler, and walking into the inn, demanded from the landlord breakfast and a private room. Quakers, and such hosts as old Father Crackenthorp, are no congenial spirits; the latter looked askew over his shoulder, and replied, "If you would have breakfast here, friend, you are like to eat it where other folk eat theirs."

"And wherefore can I not," said the Quaker, "have an apartment to myself, for my money?"

"Because, Master Jonathan, you must wait till your betters be served, or else eat with your equals."

Joshua Geddes argued the point no farther, but sitting quietly down on the seat which Crackenthorp indicated to him, and calling for a pint of ale, with some bread, butter, and Dutch cheese, began to satisfy the appetite which the morning air had rendered unusually alert.

While the honest Quaker was thus employed, another stranger entered the apartment, and sat down near to the table on which his victuals were placed. He looked repeatedly at Joshua, licked his parched and chapped lips as he saw the good Quaker masticate his bread and cheese, and sucked up his thin chops when Mr. Geddes applied the tankard to his mouth, as if the discharge of these bodily functions by another had awakened his sympathies in an uncontrollable degree. At last, being apparently unable to withstand his longings, he asked, in a faltering tone, the huge landlord, who was tramping through the room in all corpulent impatience, "whether he could have a plack-pie?"

"Never heard of such a thing, master," said the landlord, and was about to trudge onward; when the guest, detaining him, said, in a strong Scottish tone, "Ye will maybe have nae whey then, nor buttermilk, nor ye couldna exhibit a souter's clod?"

"Can't tell what ye are talking about, master," said Crackenthorp.

"Then ye will have nae breakfast that will come within the compass of a shilling Scots?"

"Which is a penny sterling," answered Crackenthorp, with a sneer. "Why, no, Sawney, I can't say as we have—we can't afford it; but you shall have a bellyful for love, as we say in the bull-ring."

"I shall never refuse a fair offer," said the poverty-stricken guest; "and I will say that for the English, if they were deils, that they are a ceeveleesed people to gentlemen that are under a cloud."

Gentlemen!—humph!" said Crackenthorp—"not a bluecap among them but halts upon that foot." Then seizing on a dish which still contained a huge cantle of what had been once a princely mutton pasty, he placed it on the table before the stranger, saying, "There, master gentleman; there is what is worth all the black pies, as you call them, that were ever made of sheep's head."

"Sheep's head is a gude thing, for a' that," replied the guest; but not being spoken so loud as to offend his hospitable entertainer, the interjection might pass for a private protest against the scandal thrown out against the standing dish of Caledonia.

This premised, he immediately began to transfer the mutton and pie-crust from his plate to his lips, in such huge gobbets, as if he was refreshing after a three days' fast, and laying in provisions against a whole Lent to come.

Joshua Geddes in his turn gazed on him with surprise, having never, he thought, beheld such a gaunt expression of hunger in the act of eating. "Friend," he said, after watching him for some minutes, "if thou gorgest thyself in this fashion, thou wilt assuredly choke. Wilt thou not take a draught out of my cup to help down all that dry meat?"

"Troth," said the stranger, stopping and looking at the friendly propounder, "that's nae bad overture, as they say in the General Assembly. I have heard waur motions than that frae wiser counsel."

Mr. Geddes ordered a quart of home-brewed to be placed before our friend Peter Peebles; for the reader must have already conceived that this unfortunate litigant was the wanderer in question.

The victim of Themis had no sooner seen the flagon than he seized it with the same energy which he had displayed in operating upon the pie—puffed off the froth with such emphasis, that some of it lighted on Mr. Geddes's head—and then said, as if with a sudden recollection of what was due to civility, "Here's to ye, friend.—What! are ye ower grand to give me an answer, or are ye dull o' hearing?"

"I prithee drink thy liquor, friend," said the good Quaker; "thou meanest it in civility, but we care not for these idle fashions."

"What! ye are a Quaker, are ye?" said Peter; and without further ceremony reared the flagon to his head, from which he withdrew it not while a single drop of "barley-broo" remained.—"That's done you and me muckle gude," he said, sighing as he set down his pot; "but twa mutchkins o' yill between twa folk is a drappie ower little measure. What say ye to anither pot? or shall we cry in a blithe Scots pint at ance?—The yill is no amiss."

"Thou mayst call for what thou wilt on thine own charges, friend," said Geddes; "for myself, I willingly contribute to the quenching of thy natural thirst; but I fear it were no such easy matter to relieve thy acquired and artificial drouth."

"That is to say in plain terms, ye are for withdrawing your caution with the folk of the house? You Quaker folk are but fause comforters; but since ye have garred me drink sae muckle could yill—me that am no used to the like of it in the forenoon—I think ye might as weel have offered me a glass of brandy or usquebae—I'm nae nice body—I can drink ony think that's wet and toothsome."

"Not a drop at my cost, friend," quoth Geddes. "Thou art an old man, and hast, perchance, a heavy and long journey before thee. Thou art, moreover, my countryman, as I judge from thy tongue; and I will not give thee the means of dishonouring thy gray hairs in a strange land."

"Gray hairs, neighbour!" said Peter, with a wink to the bystanders,—whom this dialogue began to interest, and who were in hopes of seeing the Quaker played off by the crazed beggar, for such Peter Peebles appeared to be,—"Gray hairs! The Lord mend your eyesight, neighbour, that disna ken gray hairs frae a tow wig!"

This jest procured a shout of laughter, and, what was still more acceptable than dry applause, a man who stood beside called out, "Father Crackenthorp, bring a nipperkin of brandy. I'll bestow a dram on this fellow, were it but for that very word."

The brandy was immediately brought by a wench who acted as bar-maid; and Peter, with a grin of delight, filled a glass, quaffed it off, and then saying "God bless me! I was so unmannerly as not to drink to ye—I think the Quaker has smitten me wi' his bred havings,"—he was about to fill another, when his hand was arrested by his new friend; who said: the same time, "No, no, friend—fair play's a two-time about, if you please." And filling a glass for himself, emptied it as gallantly as Peter could have done. "What say you to that, friend?" he continued, addressing the Quaker.

"Nay, friend," answered Joshua, "it went down thy throat, not mine; and I have nothing to say about what concerns me not; but if thou art a man of humanity, thou wilt not give this poor creature the means of debauchery. Bethink thee that they will spurn him from the door, as they would do a helpless and masterless dog, and that he may die on the sands or on the common. And if he has through means been rendered incapable of helping himself, thou shalt not be innocent of his blood."

"Faith, Broadbrim, I believe thou art right, and the old gentleman in the flaxen jazy shall have none of the comforter—Besides, we have business to hand to-day, and this fellow, for as mad as he looks may have a nose on his face after all.—Hark ye, father—what is your name, and what brings you into such an out-of-the-way corner?"

"I am not just free to condescend on my name," said Peter; "and as for my business—there is a wee dribble of brandy in the stoup—it would be wrang to leave it to the lass—it is learning her bad usages."

"Well, thou shalt have the brandy, and be d-d to thee, if thou wilt tell me what you art making here."

"Seeking a young advocate chap that they call Alan Fairford, that has played me a slippery trick, an ye maun yen, a' about the cause," said Peter.

"An advocate, man!" answered the Captain of the Jumping Jenny—for it was he, and no other, who had taken compassion on Peter's drought; "wae, Lord help thee, thou art on the wrong side of the Firth to seek advocates, whom I take to be Scottish lawyers not English."

"English lawyers, man!" exclaimed Peter, "the deil a lawyer's in a' England."

"I wish from my soul it were true," said Ewan; "but what the devil put that in your head?"

"Lord, man, I got a grip of one of their attorneys in Carlisle, and he tauld me that there wasna a lawyer in England, ony mair than himsell, that kend the nature of a multiplepinding! And when I tauld him how this loopy lad, Alan Fairford, had served me, he said I might bring an action on the case—just as if the case hadna as many actions already as one car can weel carry. By my word, it is a gude case, and muckle has it borne, in its day, of various procedure—but it's the barley-pickle breaks the naig's back, and wi' my consent it shall not hae ony mair burden laid upon it."

"But this Alan Fairford?" said Nanty—"come—sip up the drop of brandy, man, and tell me some more about him, and whether you are seeking him for good or for harm."

"For my ain gude, and for his harm, to be sure," said Peter. "Thank of his having left my cause in the dead-thraw between the tynning and the winning, and capering off into Cumberland here, after a wild loup-the-tether lad they ca' Darsie Latimer."

"Darsie Latimer!" said Mr. Geddes, hastily; "do you know any thing of Darsie Latimer?"

"Maybe I do, and maybe I do not," answered Peter; "I am not free to answer every body's interrogatory, unless it is put judiciously, and by form of law—specially where folk think so much of a canp of sour yill, or a thimblefu' of brandy. But as for this gentleman, that has shown himself a gentleman at breakfast, and will show himself a gentleman at the meridian, I am free to condescend upon any points in the cause that may appear to bear upon the question at issue."

"Why, all I want to know from you, my friend, is whether you are seeking to do this Mr. Alan Fairford good or harm; because if you come to do him good, I think you could maybe get speech of him—and if to do him harm, I will take the liberty to give you a cast across the Frith, with fair warning not to come back on such an errand, lest worse come of it."

The manner and language of Ewart were such, that Joshua Geddes resolved to keep cautious silence, till he could more plainly discover whether he was likely to aid or impede him in his researches after Darsie Latimer. He therefore determined to listen attentively to what should pass between Peter and the seaman, and to watch for an opportunity of questioning the former, so soon as he should be separated from his new acquaintance.

"I wad by no means," said Peter Peebles, "do any substantial harm to the poor lad Fairford, who has had mony a gowd guinea of mine, as weel as his father before him; but I wad hae him brought back to the minding of my business and his ain; and maybe I wadna mist farther in my action of damages against him, than for retounding the fees, and for some annual rent on the principal sum, due frae the day on which he should have recovered it for me, plack and bawbee, at the great advising; for, ye are aware, that is the least that I can ask nomine domini; and I have nae thought to break down the lad bodily a' thegither—we maun live and let live—forgie and forget."

"The deuce take me, friend Broadbrim," said Nanty Ewart, looking to the Quaker, "if I can make out what this old scarecrow means. If I thought it was fitting that Master Fairford should see him, why perhaps it is a matter that could be managed. Do you know any thing about the old fellow?—you seemed to take some charge of him just now."

"No more than I should have done by any one in distress," said Geddes, not sorry to be appealed to; "but I will try what I can do to find out who he is, and what he is about in this country. But are we not a little too public in this open room?"

"It's well thought of," said Nanty; and at his command the bar-maid ushered the party into a side-booth, Peter attending them, in the instinctive hope that there would be more liquor drunk among them before parting. They had scarce sat down in their new apartment, when the sound of a violin was heard in the room which they had just left.

"I'll awa back yonder," said Peter, rising up again; "yon's the sound of a fiddle, and where there is music, there's aye something ganging to eat or drink."

"I am just going to order something here," said the Quaker; "but, in the mean time, have you any objection, my good friend, to tell us your name?"

"None in the world, if you are wanting to drink to me by name and surname," answered Peebles; "but otherwise, I would rather evade your interrogatories."

"Friend," said the Quaker, "it is not for thine own health, seeing thou hast drunk enough already—however—Here, handmaiden—bring me a gill of sherry."

"Sherry's but shilpit crink, and a gill's a sma' measure for twa gentlemen to crack ower at their first acquaintance.—But let us see your sneaking gill of sherry," said Poor Peter, thrusting forth his huge hand to seize on the diminutive pewter measure, which, ac-ording to the fashion of the time, contained the generous liquor freshly drawn from the butt.

"Nay, hold, friend," said Joshua, "thou hast not yet told me what name and surname I am to call thee by."

"D—d sly in the Quaker," said Nanty, apart, "to make him to pay for his liquor before he gives it him. Now, I am such a fool, that I should have let him get too drunk to open his mouth, before I thought of asking him a question."

"My name is Peter Peebles, then," said the litigant, rather sulkily, as one who thought his liquor too sparingly meted out to him; "and what have you to say to that?"

"Peter Peebles?" repeated Nanty Ewart, and seemed to muse upon something which the words brought to his remembrance, while the Quaker pursued his examination.

"But I prithce, Peter Peebles, what is thy further designation?—Thou knowest, in our country, that some men are distinguished by their craft and calling, as cordwainers, fishers, weavers, or the like, and some by their titles as proprietors of lands, (which savours of vanity). Now, how may you be distinguished from others of the same name?"

"As Peter Peebles of the great plea of Poor Peter Peebles against Plainstones, et per contra—if I am laird of naething else, I am aye a dominus litis."

"It's but a poor lairdship, I doubt," said Joshua.

"Pray, Mr. Peebles," said Nanty, interrupting the conversation abruptly, "were not you once a burges of Edinburgh?"

"Was I a burges?" said Peter, indignantly, "and am I not a burges even now? I have done nothing to forfeit my right, I trow—once provost and aye my lord."

"Well, Mr. Burgess, tell me farther, have you not some property in the Gude Town?" continued Ewart.

"Troth have I—that is, before my misfortunes, I had twa or three bonny bits of mailings among the closes and wynds, forby the shop and the story abune it. But Plainstones has put me to the causeway now. Never mind though, I will be upsides with him yet."

"Had not you once a tenement in the Covenant Close?" again demanded Nanty.

"You have hit it, lad, though ye look not like a Covenantanter," said Peter; "we'll drink to its memory—[Hout! the heart's at the mouth o' that ill-faur'd bit stoup already!]—it brought a rent, reckoning from the crawstep to the groundsill, that ye might ca' fourteen punds a-year, forby the laigh cellar that was let to Lucky Littleworth."

"And do you not remember that you had a poor old lady for your tenant, Mrs. Cantrips of Kittlebasket?" said Nanty, suppressing his emotion with difficulty.

"Remember! G—d, I have gude cause to remember her," said Peter, "for she turned a dyvour on my hands, the auld besom! and, after a' that the law could do to make me satisfied and paid, in the way of pouding and distrenzieng, and sae forth, as the law will, she ran away to the Charity Workhouse, a matter of twenty punds Scots in my debt—it's a great shame and oppression that Charity Workhouse, taking in bankrupt dyvours that canna pay their honest creditors."

"Methinks, friend," said the Quaker, "thine own rage might teach thee compassion for other people's nakedness."

"Rags!" said Peter, taking Joshua's words literally; "does ony wise body put on their best coat when they are travellin, and keeping company with Quakers, and such other cattle as the road affords?"

"The old lady died, I have heard," said Nanty, affecting a moderation which was belied by accents that faltered with passion.

"She might live or die, for what I care," answered Peter the Cruel; "what business have folk to do to live, that canna live as law will, and satisfy their just and lawful creditors?"

"And you—you that are now yourself trodden down in the very kennel, are you not sorry for what you have done? Do you not repent having occasioned the poor widow-woman's death?"

man. I entreat you to reflect that this to you is known as from all promises of courtesy or consideration at what I am apt to think are very dangerous proceedings, and that—

"Hark ye, Mr. Farford," said Redgauntlet; "I must here interrupt you for your own sake. Our word of betraying what you may have seen, or what you may have suspected, and your conclusion is like to have either a very distant or a very brief termination, in either case a most undesirable one. At present, you are sure of being at liberty in a very few days—perhaps much sooner."

"And my friend," said Alan Farford, "for whose sake I have run myself into this danger, what is to become of him? Dark and dangerous man?" he exclaimed, raising his voice, "I will not be again enjoined by deceitful promises."

"I give you my honour that your friend is well," interrupted Redgauntlet; "perhaps I may permit you to see him, if you will but submit with patience to a fate which is inevitable."

But Alan Farford, considering his confidence as having been almost first by Maxwell, and next by the Priest, raised his voice, and appealed to all the King's lieges within hearing, against the violence with which he was threatened. He was instantly seized on by Nixon and two assistants, who holding down his arms, and endeavouring to stop his mouth, were about to hurry him away.

The honest Quaker, who had kept out of Redgauntlet's presence, now came boldly forward.

"Friend," said he, "thou dost move than thou canst answer. Thou knowest me well, and thou art aware, that in me thou hast a deeply injured neighbour who was dwelling beside thee in the honesty and simplicity of his heart."

"Tush, Jonathan," said Redgauntlet; "talk not to me, man; it is neither the craft of a young lawyer, nor the simplicity of an old hypocrite can drive me from my purpose."

"By my faith," said the Captain, coming forward in his turn, "this is hardly fair, General; and I doubt," he added, "whether the will of my owners can make me a party to such proceedings. Nay, never fumble with your sword hilt, but cut with it like a man, if you are for a tilting." He unsheathed his hanger and continued, "I will neither see my comrade Farford, nor the old Quaker abused. It is all warrants, false or true—curses the justice—confound the cowardly!—and here stands little Nanty Ewart to make good what he says against oath and weapon, in spite of horse-shoe or hammer-shoe either."

The cry of "Down with all warrants!" was popular in the ears of the militia of the inn, and Nanty Ewart was no less so. Fishers, cooks, women, amblers, began to crowd to the spot. A counterparty endeavoured in vain to mediate. The attention of Redgauntlet began to wander, but the master shouted to them to forbear and unsheathing his sword as quick as lightning, he rushed on Ewart in the midst of his bravado, and struck his weapon from his hand with such address and force that it flew three yards from him. Coming within arm's length at the same moment, he gave him a severe fall, and waved his sword over his head, to show he was absolutely at his mercy.

"There you drunken vagabond," he said, "I give you your life—you are no bad fellow if you could keep from drinking among your friends. But we all know Nanty Ewart," he said to the crowd around, with a forgiving laugh, which, joined to the awe his prowess had inspired, entirely confirmed their wavering allegiance.

They shouted "The Lord for ever!" while poor Nanty, rising from the earth, on whose lap he had been stretched so rudely, went in quest of his hanger. Lifting it, wiped it, and, as he returned the weapon to the scabbard, muttered between his teeth, "It is true they are of mine, and the devil will stand his friend till his hour come; I will cross him no more."

So saying he slunk from the crowd, cowed and disheartened by his defeat.

"For you Joshua Gidder," said Redgauntlet, approaching the Quaker, who with lifted hands and eyes, had beheld the scene of violence. "I shall take the liberty to arrest thee for a breach of the peace, altogether unbecoming thy pretended principles; and I believe it will go hard with thee both in a Court of Justice and among those own Society of Friends, to they call themselves, who will be but indifferently pleased to see the quiet tenor of their hypocrisy admitted by such violent proceedings."

"I violate!" said Joshua; "I do much unbecoming the principles of the Friends! I defy thee, man, and I charge thee, as a Christian, to forbear using my soul with such charges: it is grievous enough to me to have seen violence which I was unable to prevent."

"Oh, Joshua, Joshua!" said Redgauntlet with a sardonic smile; "thou light of the faithful in the town of Dumfries and the places adjacent, wilt thou thus fall away from the truth? Hast thou not been as all, attempted to remove a man from the ranks of law? Dost thou not encourage that devil to follow to draw his weapon—and dost thou not thus furnish thy enemy in the cause? Think of the oaths of the injured Price Perkin, and the cruel Cruel Nixon, besides those of such gentlemen as look on this strange scene, who are set out on swearing as a garment, but to whom a Christian House matters oaths are literally meat and drink,—dost thou not think, I say, that these oaths will go farther than thy Yes and Nay in the matter?"

"I will swear to any thing," said Peter. "All a far when it comes to an oath of life!"

"You do me foul wrong," said the Quaker, unmoved by the general laugh. "I encourage drawing of weapons, though I attempted to make it unjust man by some use of argument—I brandish no cudgel, although it may be that the sword has struggled within me and caused my hand to grip your osken staff firmer than usual, when I see influence borne down with violence. But what! what is true and just to thee, who hast seen a use of violence from thy youth upwards? Let us speak to thee such language as thou canst understand. Deliver these young men up to me, to me, when he had led Redgauntlet a little apart from the crowd, "and I will not only free thee from the law charge of damages which thou hast incurred by this outrage upon my property, but I will add ransom to them and for myself. What would it profit thee to do the youths wrong, by detaining them in captivity?"

"Mr. Gidder," said Redgauntlet in a more respectful tone than he had hitherto used to the Quaker, "your language is disinterested, and I respect the fidelity of your friendship. Perhaps we have mistaken each other's principles and motives, but if we have not at present time for explanation, may yourself say. I hope to raise your friend Darnley to a patch of country which you will obtain with pleasure,—may do not attempt to answer me. The other young men shall suffer no more at a case, probably only a few hours—it is not more than due his practical interference in what concerned him not. Do you, Mr. Gidder, be so prudent as to take your horse and leave this place, which is growing in moment more unfit for the shade of a man, if you may not be at the event in safety at Mount Starn."

"Friend," replied Joshua, "I cannot comply with thy advice, I will remain here even as thy present as thou didst but now threaten, rather than leave my youth who have suffered by and through me and in my situation, in his present state of doubtful safety. Wherefore I will not mount my steed, I remain, neither will I turn his head towards Mount Starn until I see an end of this matter."

"A prisoner, then, you must be," said Redgauntlet; "I have no time to dispute the matter farther with you—but tell me for what you fix your eyes so anxiously on yonder people of mine?"

"To speak the truth," said the Quaker, "I shall be held among them a little worse of a boy and hence to whom I think Satan has given the power of transporting himself whithersoever he pleases forward; so that it may be truly said, there is no rein this land wherein he hath not a finger, if not a whole hand."

The boy, who saw their eyes fixed on him as they spoke, seemed embarrassed, and rather desirous of making his escape; but at a signal from Redgauntlet he advanced, assuming the sheepish look and rustic manner with which the jackanapes covered much acuteness and roguery.

"How long have you been with the party, sirrah," said Redgauntlet.

"Since the raid on the stake-nets," said Benjie, with his finger in his mouth.

"And what made you follow us?"

"I dauredna stay at hame for the constables," replied the boy.

"And what have you been doing all this time?"

"Doing, sir? I dinna ken what ye ca' doing—I have been doing naething," said Benjie; then seeing something in Redgauntlet's eye which was not to be trifled with, he added, "Naething but waiting on Maister Cristal Nixon."

"Hum!—ay—indeed?" muttered Redgauntlet. "Must Master Nixon bring his own retinue into the field?—This must be seen to."

He was about to pursue his inquiry, when Nixon himself came to him with looks of anxious haste. "The Father is come," he whispered and the gentlemen are getting together in the largest room of the house, and they desire to see you. Yonder is your nephew, too, making a noise like a man in Bedlam."

"I will look to it all instantly," said Redgauntlet. "Is the Father lodged as I directed?"

Cristal nodded.

"Now, then, for the final trial," said Redgauntlet. He folded his hands—looked upwards—crossed himself—and after this act of devotion, (almost the first which any one had observed him make use of,) he commanded Nixon to keep good watch—have his horses and men ready for every emergency—look after the safe custody of the prisoners—but treat them at the same time well and civilly. And these orders given, he darted hastily into the house.

CHAPTER XXII.

REDGAUNTLET'S first course was to the chamber of his nephew. He unlocked the door, entered the apartment, and asked what he wanted, that he made so much noise.

"I want my liberty," said Darsie, who had wrought himself up to a pitch of passion in which his uncle's wrath had lost its terrors. "I desire my liberty, and to be assured of the safety of my beloved friend, Alan Fairford, whose voice I heard but now."

"Your liberty shall be your own within half an hour from this period—your friend shall be also set at freedom in due time—and you yourself be permitted to have access to his place of confinement."

"This does not satisfy me," said Darsie; "I must see my friend instantly; he is here, and he is here endangered on my account only. I have heard violent exclamations—the clash of swords. You will gain no point with me unless I have ocular demonstration of his safety."

"Arthur—dearest nephew," answered Redgauntlet, "drive me not mad! Thine own fate—that of thy house—that of thousands—that of Britain herself, are at this moment in the scale; and you are only occupied about the safety of a poor insignificant pettifogger!"

"He has sustained injury at your hands, then?" said Darsie, fiercely. "I know he has; but if so, not even our relationship shall protect you."

"Peace, ungrateful and obstinate fool!" said Redgauntlet. "Yet stay—Will you be satisfied if you see this Alan Fairford, the bundle of bombazine—this precious friend of yours—well and sound?—Will you, I say, be satisfied with seeing him in perfect safety, without attempting to speak to or converse with him?"—Darsie signified his assent. "Take hold of my arm, then," said Redgauntlet; "and do you, niece Lillias, take the other; and beware, Sir Arthur, how you bear yourself."

Darsie was compelled to acquiesce, sufficiently aware that his uncle would permit him no interview with a friend whose influence would certainly be used against his present earnest wishes, and in some measure contented with the assurance of Fairford's personal safety.

Redgauntlet led them through one or two passages, (for the house, as we have before said, was very irregular, and built at different times,) until they entered an apartment, where a man with shouldered carbine kept watch at the door, but readily turned the key for their reception. In this room they found Alan Fairford and the Quaker, apparently in deep conversation with each other. They looked up as Redgauntlet and his party entered; and Alan pulled off his hat and made a profound reverence, which the young lady, who recognised him, though, masked as she was, he could not know her,—returned with some embarrassment, arising probably from the recollection of the bold step she had taken in visiting him.

Darsie longed to speak, but dared not. His uncle only said, "Gentlemen, I know you are as anxious on Mr. Darsie Latimer's account as he is upon yours. I am commissioned by him to inform you, that he is as well as you are—I trust you will all meet soon. Mean time, although I cannot suffer you to be at large, you shall be as well treated as is possible under your temporary confinement."

He passed on, without pausing to hear the answers which the lawyer and the Quaker were hastening to prefer; and only waving his hand by way of adieu, made his exit, with the real and the seeming lady whom he had under his charge, through a door at the upper end of the apartment, which was fastened and guarded like that by which they entered.

Redgauntlet next led the way into a very small room; adjoining which, but divided by a partition, was one of apparently larger dimensions; for they heard the trampling of the heavy boots of the period, as if several persons were walking to and fro, and conversing in low and anxious whispers.

"Here," said Redgauntlet to his nephew, as he disencumbered him from the riding-skirt and the mask, "I restore you to yourself, and trust you will lay aside all effeminate thoughts with this feminine dress. Do not blush at having worn a disguise to which kings and heroes have been reduced. It is when female craft or female cowardice find their way into a manly bosom, that he who entertains these sentiments should take eternal shame to himself for thus having resembled womankind. Follow me, while Lillias remains here. I will introduce you to those whom I hope to see associated with you in the most glorious cause that hand ever drew sword in."

Darsie paused. "Uncle," he said, "my person is in your hands; but remember, my will is my own. I will not be hurried into any resolution of importance. Remember what I have already said—what I now repeat—that I will take no step of importance but upon conviction."

"But canst thou be convinced, thou foolish boy, without hearing and understanding the grounds on which we act?"

So saying, he took Darsie by the arm, and walked with him to the next room—a large apartment, partly filled with miscellaneous articles of commerce, chiefly connected with contraband trade; where, among bales and barrels, sat, or walked to and fro, several gentlemen, whose manners and looks seemed superior to the plain riding-dresses which they wore.

There was a grave and stern anxiety upon their countenances, when, on Redgauntlet's entrance, they drew from their separate corners into one group around him, and saluted him with a formality, which had something in it of ominous melancholy. As Darsie looked around the circle, he thought he could discern in it few traces of that adventurous hope which urges men upon desperate enterprises; and began to believe that the conspiracy would dissolve of itself, without the necessity of his placing himself in direct opposition to so violent a character as his uncle, and incurring the hazard with which such opposition must needs be attended.

Mr. Redgauntlet, however, did not, or would not, see any such marks of depression of spirit amongst his coadjutors, but met them with cheerful countenance, and a warm greeting of welcome. "Happy to meet you here, my lord," he said, bowing low to a slender young man. "I trust you come with the pledges of your noble father, of B—, and all that loyal house.—Sir Richard, what news in the west? I am told you had two hundred men on foot to have joined when the fatal retreat from Derby was commenced. When the White Standard is again displayed, it shall not be turned back so easily, either by the force of its enemies, or the falsehood of its friends.—Doctor Grumball, I bow to the representative of Oxford, the mother of learning and loyalty.—Penguinion, you Cornishborough, has this good wind blown you North?—Ay, my brave Cambro-Britons, when was Wales last in the race of honour?"

Such and such-like compliments he dealt around, which were in general answered by silent bows; but when he saluted one of his own countrymen by the name of MacKellar, and greeted Maxwell of Summertrees by that of Pate-in-Perk, the latter replied, "that if Pate were not a fool, he would be Pate-in-Safety;" and the former, a thin old gentleman, in tarnished embroidery, said bluntly, "Ay, troth, Redgauntlet, I am here just like yourself; I have little to lose—they that took my land the last time, may take my life this; and that is all I care about it."

The English gentlemen, who were still in possession of their paternal estates, looked doubtfully on each other, and there was something whispered among them of the fox which had lost his tail.

Redgauntlet hastened to address them. "I think, my lords and gentlemen," he said, "that I can account for something like sadness which has crept upon an assembly gathered together for so noble a purpose. Our numbers seem, when thus assembled, too small and inconsiderable to shake the firm-seated usurpation of a half century. Put do not count us by what we are in thewe and muscle, but by what our summons can do among our countrymen. In this small party are those who have power to raise battalions, and those who have wealth to pay them. And do not believe our friends who are absent are cold or indifferent to the cause. Let us once light the signal, and it will be hailed by all who retain love for the Stewart, and by all—a more numerous body—who hate the Elector. Here I have letters from"—

Sir Richard Glendale interrupted the speaker. "We all confide, Redgauntlet, in your valour and skill—we admire your perseverance; and probably nothing short of your strenuous exertions, and the emulation awakened by your noble and disinterested conduct, could have brought so many of us, the scattered remnant of a disheartened party, to meet together once again in solemn consultation;—for I take it, gentleman," he said, looking round, "this is only a consultation."

"Nothing more," said the young lord.

"Nothing more," said Doctor Grumball, shaking his large academical peruke.

And "Only a consultation," was echoed by the others.

Redgauntlet bit his lip. "I had hopes," he said, "that the discourses I have held with the most of you, from time to time, had ripened into more maturity than your words imply, and that we were here to execute as well as to deliberate; and for this we stand prepared. I can raise five hundred men with my whistle."

"Five hundred men!" said one of the Welsh squires, "Cot bless us! and, pray you, what good could five hundred men do?"

"All that the printing does for the cannon, Mr. Mcredith," answered Redgauntlet; "it will enable us to seize Carlisle, and you know what our friends have engaged for in that case."

"Yes—but," said the young nobleman, "you must not hurry us on too fast, Mr. Redgauntlet; we are all, I believe, as sincere and truehearted in this business as you are, but we will not be driven forward blindfold. We owe caution to ourselves and our families, as well as to those whom we are empowered to represent on this occasion."

"Who hurries you my lord? Who is it that would drive this meeting forward blindfold? I do not understand your lordship," said Redgauntlet.

"Nay," said Sir Richard Glendale, "at least not let us fall under our old reproach of disagreement among ourselves. What my lord means, Redgauntlet, is, that we have this morning heard it uncertain whether you could even bring that bold fellow whom you count upon; your countryman, Mr. MacKellar, seemed, just before you came in to ask whether your people would rise in any force, as you could produce the authority of your nephew."

"I might ask," said Redgauntlet, "what right MacKellar, or any one, has to doubt my being able to accomplish what I stand pledged for?—But errors consist in our unity.—He stands my nephew, gentlemen, I present to you my kinsman, Sir Angus Darsie Redgauntlet of that ilk."

"Gentlemen," said Darsie, with a thoughtful frown, for he felt the crisis a very painful one. "Let me to say, that I suspend expressing my sentiments on the important subject under discussion, until I have heard those of the present meeting."

"Proceed in your deliberations, gentlemen," said Redgauntlet; "I will show my nephew such respect for acquiescing in the result, as will entirely remove any scruples which may hang around his mind."

Dr. Grumball now coughed, "shook his academic curls," and addressed the assembly.

"The principles of Oxford," he said, "are well understood, since she was the first to resign her title to the Arch-Usurper—since she has condemned the sovereign authority, the blasphemous, atheistical, anarchical tenets of Locke, and other deluders of the public mind. Oxford will give no money, and no assistance, to the cause of the rightful monarch, if we been often deluded by foreign powers, who have availed themselves of our zeal to stir up civil dissensions in Britain, not for the advantage of our cause, though banished monarch, but to engineer instances by which they might profit, while we, the tools, are sure to be ruined. Oxford, therefore, will not rise, unless our Sovereign comes in person to claim our allegiance, in which case, God for us, we should refuse him our best obedience."

"It is a very cool advice," said Mr. Maxwell.

"In troth," said Sir Richard Glendale, "this is a very keystone of our enterprise, and the foundation upon which I myself and others could ever dream of taking up arms. No insurrection will have Charles Edward himself at its head, never last longer than till a single foot-courier redecoats march to disperse it."

"This is my own opinion, and that of all my family," said the young nobleman already mentioned; "and I own I am somewhat startled at being summoned to attend a dangerous meeting such as this, before something certain could have been stated to us on this most important point."

"Pardon me, my lord," said Redgauntlet; "I have not been so unjust either to myself or my friends, had no means of communicating to our confederates (without the greatest risk of discovery) what is known to some of my household. As courageous, and as resolved, as when twenty years since, he threw himself into the wars of Scotland, Charles Edward has instantly obeyed the wishes of his faithful subjects. Charles Edward is in this country—Charles Edward is a man of war—Charles Edward waits but your presence to receive the homage of those who have called themselves his loyal liegemen. He that would turn his coat, and change his note, must do so in the eye of his sovereign."

There was a deep pause. These among the conspirators whom more habit, or a desire of personal consistency, had engaged in the affair, now, in terror their retreat cut off; and others who had hitherto regarded the proposed enterprise with a full, troubled when the moment of action was precipitated.

"How now, my lords and gentlemen?" said Sir let; "Is it delight and rapture that keep you silent? where are the eager welcomes that should be paid to your rightful King, who a second time confides his person to the care of his subjects, terrified by the hairbreadth escapes and severe punishments of his former expedition? I hope there is a gentleman here that is not ready to redeem, in his presence, the pledge of fidelity which he offers in his absence?"

"at least," said the young nobleman, resolutely, laying his hand on his sword, "will not be that. If Charles is come to these shores, I will be the first to give him welcome, and to devote my aid and fortune to his service."

"before God," said Mr. Meredith, "I do not see Mr. Redgauntlet has left us any thing else to do."

"Nay," said Summertrees, "there is yet one question. Has he brought any of those Irish rascals with him, who broke the neck of our last king's affair?"

"Not a man of them," said Redgauntlet.

"I trust," said Dr. Grumball, "that there are no Popish priests in his company? I would not intrude on the private conscience of my Sovereign, but, as a worthy son of the Church of England, it is my duty to consider her security."

"Not a Popish dog or cat is there, to bark or mew at his Majesty," said Redgauntlet. "Old Shaftesbury himself could not wish a prince's person more free from Popery—which may not be the worst thing in the world, notwithstanding.—Any more reasons, gentlemen? can no more plausible reasons be discovered for postponing the payment of our duty, the discharge of our oaths and engagements? Mean while your King waits your declaration—by my faith, with but a frozen reception!"

"Redgauntlet," said Sir Richard Glendale, calmly, "your reproaches shall not goad me into any thing which my reason disapproves. That I respect my engagement as much as you do, is evident, since I am here, ready to support it with the best blood in the veins. But has the King really come hither entirely unattended?"

"He has no man with him but young —, as aid-de-camp, and a single valet-de-chambre."

"No man;—but, Redgauntlet, as you are a gentleman, has he no woman with him?"

"Redgauntlet cast his eyes on the ground and replied, 'I am sorry to say—he has.'"

"The company looked at each other, and remained silent for a moment. At length Sir Richard pronounced. 'I need not repeat to you, Mr. Redgauntlet, what is the well-grounded opinion of his Majesty's friends concerning that most unhappy connexion; it is but one sense and feeling amongst us upon the subject. I must conclude that our humble representations were communicated by you, sir, to the King.'"

"On the same strong terms in which they were received," replied Redgauntlet. "I love his Majesty's will more than I fear his displeasure."

"But, apparently, our humble expostulation has produced no effect. This lady, who has crept into the room, has a sister in the Elector of Hanover's service, and yet we are well assured that every point of her most private communication is placed in her power."

"Carium et mutabile semper femina," said Dr. Grumball.

"She puts her secrets into her work-bag," said Redgauntlet; "and out they fly whenever she opens it. I must hang, I would wish it to be in some other place, a better rope than the string of a lady's garter."

"Are you, too, turning dastard, Maxwell?" said Redgauntlet in a whisper.

"Not I," said Maxwell; "let us fight for it, and let us win and wear us; but to be betrayed by a brimstone like that!"

"Be temperate, gentlemen," said Redgauntlet; "the rage of which you complain so heavily has always been that of kings and heroes; which I feel strongly confident the King will surmount, upon the humble advice of his best servants, and when he sees them ready to peril their all in his cause, upon the slight condition of his resigning the society of a female favourite, of whom I have seen reason to think he hath been himself for some time wearied. But let us not press upon him rashly with our well-meant zeal. He has a princely will, as becomes his princely birth, and we, gentlemen, who are royalists, should be the last to take advantage of circumstances to limit its exercise. I am as much surprised and hurt as you can be, to find that he has made her the companion of this journey, increasing every chance of treachery and detection. But do not let us insist upon a sacrifice so humiliating, while he has scarce placed a foot upon the beach of his kingdom. Let us act generously by our Sovereign; and when we have shown what we will do for him, we shall be able, with better face, to state what it is we expect him to concede."

"Indeed, I think it is but a pity," said MacKellar, "when so many pretty gentlemen are got together, that they should part without the flash of a sword among them."

"I should be of that gentleman's opinion," said Lord —, "had I nothing to lose but my life; but I frankly own, that the conditions on which our family agreed to join having been, in this instance, left unfulfilled, I will not peril the whole fortunes of our house on the doubtful fidelity of an artful woman."

"I am sorry to see your lordship," said Redgauntlet, "take a course, which is more likely to secure your house's wealth than to augment its honours."

"How am I to understand your language, sir?" said the young nobleman, haughtily.

"Nay, gentlemen," said Dr. Grumball, interposing, "do not let friends quarrel; we are all zealous for the cause—but truly, although I know the license claimed by the great in such matters, and can, I hope, make due allowance, there is, I may say, an indecorum in a prince who comes to claim the allegiance of the Church of England, arriving on such an errand with such a companion—si non castè, cautè, tamen."

"I wonder how the Church of England came to be so heartily attached to his merry old namesake," said Redgauntlet.

Sir Richard Glendale then took up the question, as one whose authority and experience gave him right to speak with much weight.

"We have no leisure for hesitation," he said; "it is full time that we decide what course we are to hold. I feel as much as you, Mr. Redgauntlet, the delicacy of capitulating with our Sovereign in his present condition. But I must also think of the total ruin of the cause, the confiscation and bloodshed which will take place among his adherents, and all through the infatuation with which he adheres to a woman who is the pensionary of the present minister, as she was for years Sir Robert Walpole's. Let his Majesty send her back to the continent, and the sword on which I now lay my hand shall instantly be unsheathed, and, I trust, many hundred others at the same moment."

The other persons present testified their unanimous acquiescence in what Sir Richard Glendale had said.

"I see you have taken your resolutions, gentlemen," said Redgauntlet; "unwisely, I think, because I believe that, by softer and more generous proceedings, you would have been more likely to carry a point which I think as desirable as you do. But what is to be done if Charles should refuse, with the inflexibility of his grandfather, to comply with this request of yours? Do you mean to abandon him to his fate?"

"God forbid!" said Sir Richard, hastily; "and God forgive you, Mr. Redgauntlet, for breathing such a thought. No! I for one will, with all duty and humility, see him safe back to his vessel, and defend him with my life, against whoever shall assail him. But when I have seen his sails spread, my next act will be to secure, if I can, my own safety, by retiring to my house; or, if I find our engagement, as is too probable, has taken wind, by surrendering myself to the next Justice of Peace, and giving security that hereafter I shall live quiet, and submit to the ruling powers."

Again the rest of the persons present, intimated their agreement in opinion with the speaker.

"Well, gentlemen," said Redgauntlet, "it is not for me to oppose the opinion of every one; and I must do you the justice to say, that the King has, in the present instance, neglected a condition of your agreement, which was laid before him in very distinct terms. The question now is, who is to acquaint him with the result of this conference? for I presume you would not wait on him in a body to make the proposal, that he should dismiss a person from his family as the price of your allegiance."

"I think Mr. Redgauntlet should make the explanation," said Lord ——. "As he has, doubtless, done justice to our remonstrances by communicating them to the King, no one can, with such propriety and force, state the natural and inevitable consequence of their being neglected."

"Now, I think," said Redgauntlet, "that those who make the objection should state it; for I am confident the King will hardly believe, on less authority than that of the heir of the loyal House of B—, that he is the first to seek an evasion of his pledge to join him."

"An evasion, sir!" repeated Lord —, fiercely. "I have borne too much from you already, and this I will not endure. Favour me with your company to the downs yonder."

Redgauntlet laughed scornfully, and was about to follow the fiery young man, when Sir Richard again interposed. "Are we to exhibit," he said, "the last symptoms of the dissolution of our party, by turning our swords against each other?—Be patient Lord —; in such conferences as this, much must pass unquestioned which might brook challenge elsewhere. There is a privilege of party as of parliament—men cannot, in emergency, stand upon picking phrases.—Gentlemen, if you will extend your confidence in me so far, I will wait upon his majesty, and I hope my Lord — and Mr. Redgauntlet will accompany me. I trust the explanation of this unpleasant matter will prove entirely satisfactory, and that we shall find ourselves at liberty to render our homage to our Sovereign without reserve, when I for one will be the first to peril all in his just quarrel."

Redgauntlet at once stepped forward, "My lord," he said, "if my zeal made me say any thing in the slightest degree offensive, I wish it unsaid, and ask your pardon. A gentleman can do no more."

"I could not have asked Mr. Redgauntlet to do so much," said the young nobleman, willingly accepting the hand which Redgauntlet offered. "I know no man living from whom I could take so much reproof without a sense of degradation, as from himself."

"Let me then hope, my lord, that you will go with Sir Richard and me to the presence. Your warm blood will heat our zeal—our colder resolves will temper yours."

The young lord smiled, and shook his head. "Alas! Mr. Redgauntlet," he said, "I am ashamed to say, that in zeal you surpass us all. But I will not refuse this mission, provided you will permit Sir Arthur, your nephew, also to accompany us."

"My nephew?" said Redgauntlet, and seemed to hesitate, then added, "Most certainly.—I trust," he said, looking at Darsie, "he will bring to his Prince's presence such sentiments as fit the occasion."

It seemed however to Darsie, that his uncle would rather have left him behind, had he not feared that he might in that case have been influenced by, or might perhaps himself influence, the unresolved confederates with whom he must have associated during his absence.

"I will go," said Redgauntlet, "and request admission."

In a moment after he returned, and without speaking, motioned for the young nobleman to advance. He did so, followed by Sir Richard Glendale and Darsie, Redgauntlet himself bringing up the rear. A short passage and a few steps brought them to the door of the temporary presence-chamber, in which the Royal Wanderer was to receive their homage.

It was the upper loft of one of those cottages which made additions to the Old Inn, poorly furnished, dusty, and in disorder; for rash as the enterprise might be considered, they had been still careful not to draw the attention of strangers by any particular attentions to the personal accommodation of the Prince. He was seated, when the deputies, as they might be termed, of his remaining adherents, entered; and as he rose, and came forward and bowed in acceptance of their salutation, it was with a dignified courtesy which at once supplied whatever was deficient in external pomp, and converted the wretched garret into a saloon worthy of the occasion.

"It is needless to add, that he was the same personage already introduced in the character of Father Buonaventure, by which name he was distinguished at Fairladies. His dress was not different from what he then wore, excepting that he had a loose riding-coat of camlet, under which he carried an efficient cut-and-thrust sword, instead of his walking rapier, and also a pair of pistols.

Redgauntlet presented to him successively the young Lord —, and his kinsman, Sir Arthur Darsie Redgauntlet, who trembled as, bowing and kissing his hand, he found himself surprised into what might be construed an act of high treason, which yet he saw no safe means to avoid.

Sir Richard Glendale seemed personally known to Charles Edward, who received him with a mixture of dignity and affection, and seemed to sympathize with the tears which rushed into that gentleman's eyes as he bid his Majesty welcome to his native kingdom.

"Yes, my good Sir Richard," said the unfortunate Prince, in a tone melancholy, yet resolved, "Charles Edward is with his faithful friends once more—not perhaps, with his former gay hopes which undervalued danger, but with the same determined contempt of the worst which can befall him, in claiming his own rights and those of his country."

"I rejoice, sire—and yet, alas! I must also grieve to see you once more on the British shores," said Sir Richard Glendale, and stopped short—a tumult of contradictory feelings preventing his farther utterance.

"It is the call of my faithful and suffering people which alone could have induced me to take once more the sword in my hand. For my own part, Sir Richard, when I have reflected how many of my loyal and devoted friends perished by the sword and by proscription, or died indigent and neglected in a foreign land, I have often sworn that no view to my personal aggrandizement should again induce me to agitate a title which has cost my followers so dear. But now so many men of worth and honour conceive the cause of England and Scotland to be linked with that of Charles Stewart, I must follow their brave example, and, laying aside all other considerations, once more stand forward as their deliverer. I am, however, come hither upon your invitation; and as you are so completely acquainted with circumstances to which my absence must necessarily have rendered me a stranger, I must be a mere tool in the hands of my friends. I know well I never can refer myself implicitly to more loyal hearts or wiser heads, than Herries Redgauntlet, and Sir Richard Glendale. Give me your advice, then, how we are to proceed, and decide upon the fate of Charles Edward."

Redgauntlet looked at Sir Richard, as if to say, "Can you press an additional or unpleasant condition at a moment like this?" And the other shook his head and looked down, as if his resolution was unaltered, and yet as feeling all the delicacy of the situation.

There was a silence, which was broken by the unfortunate representative of an unhappy dynasty with some appearance of irritation. "This is strange gentlemen," he said; "you have sent for me from the bosom of my family, to head an adventure of doubt and danger; and when I come, your own minds seem to be still irresolute. I had not expected this on the part of two such men."

"For me, sire," said Redgauntlet, "the steel of my sword is not truer than the temper of my mind."

"My Lord —'s and mine are equally so," said

Sir Richard; "but you had in charge, Mr. Redgauntlet, to convey our request to his Majesty, coupled with certain conditions."

"And I discharged my duty to his Majesty and to you," said Redgauntlet.

"I looked at no condition, gentlemen," said their King, with dignity, "save that which called me here to assert my rights in person. That I have fulfilled at no common risk. Here I stand to keep my word, and I expect of you to be true to yours."

"There was, or should have been, something more than that in our proposal, please your Majesty," said Sir Richard. "There was a condition annexed to it."

"I saw it not," said Charles, interrupting him. "Out of tenderness towards the noble hearts of whom I think so highly, I would neither see nor read any thing which could lessen them in my love and my esteem. Conditions can have no part betwixt Prince and subject."

"Sire," said Redgauntlet, kneeling on one knee, "I see from Sir Richard's countenance he deems it my fault that your Majesty seems ignorant of what your subjects desired that I should communicate to your Majesty. For Heaven's sake! for the sake of all my past services and sufferings, leave not such a stain upon my honour! The note, Number D., of which this is a copy, referred to the painful subject to which Sir Richard again directs your attention."

"You press upon me, gentlemen," said the Prince, colouring highly, "recollections, which, as I hold them most alien to your character, I would willingly have banished from my memory. I did not suppose that my loyal subjects would think so poorly of me, as to use my depressed circumstances as a reason for forcing themselves into my domestic privacies, and stipulating arrangements with their King regarding matters, in which the meanest hinds claim the privilege of thinking for themselves. In affairs of state and public policy, I will ever be guided as becomes a prince, by the advice of my wisest counsellors; in those which regard my private affections, and my domestic arrangements, I claim the same freedom of will which I allow to all my subjects, and without which a crown were less worth wearing than a beggar's bonnet."

"May it please your Majesty," said Sir Richard Glendale, "I see it must be my lot to speak unwilling truths; but believe me, I do so with as much profound respect as deep regret. It is true, we have called you to head a mighty undertaking, and that your Majesty, preferring honour to safety, and the love of your country to your own ease, has condescended to become our leader. But we also pointed out as a necessary and indispensable preparatory step to the achievement of our purpose—and, I must say, as a positive condition of our engaging in it—that an individual, supposed,—I presume not to guess how truly,—to have your Majesty's more intimate confidence, and believed, I will not say on absolute proof, but upon the most pregnant suspicion, to be capable of betraying that confidence to the Elector of Hanover, should be removed from your royal household and society."

"This is too insolent, Sir Richard!" said Charles Edward. "Have you inveigled me into your power to bait me in this unseemly manner?—And you, Redgauntlet, why did you suffer matters to come to such a point as this, without making me more distinctly aware what insults were to be practised on me?"

"My gracious Prince," said Redgauntlet, "I am so far to blame in this, that I did not think so slight an impediment as that of a woman's society could have really interrupted an undertaking of this magnitude. I am a plain man, sire, and speak but bluntly; I could not have dreamt but what, within the first five minutes of this interview, either Sir Richard and his friends would have ceased to insist upon a condition so ungrateful to your Majesty, or that your Majesty would have sacrificed this unhappy attachment to the sound advice, or even to the over-anxious suspicions, of so many faithful subjects. I saw no entanglement in such a difficulty, which on either side might not have been broken through like a cobweb."

"entirely mistaken—as much so as you are at this moment, when you think in your heart my refusal to comply with this insolent proposition is dictated by a childish and romantic passion for an individual. I tell you, sir, I could part with that person to-morrow, without an instant's regret—that I have had thoughts of dismissing her from my court, for reasons known to myself; but that I will never betray my rights as a sovereign and a man, by taking this step to secure the favour of any one, or to purchase that allegiance, which, if you owe it to me at all, is due to me as my birthright."

"I am sorry for this," said Redgauntlet; "I hope both your Majesty and Sir Richard will reconsider your resolutions, or forbear this discussion in a conjuncture so pressing. I trust your Majesty will recollect that you are on hostile ground; that our preparations cannot have so far escaped notice as to permit us now with safety to retreat from our purpose; in-somuch, that it is with the deepest anxiety of heart I foresee even danger to your own royal person, unless you can generously give your subjects the satisfaction, which Sir Richard seems to think they are obstinate in demanding."

"And deep indeed your anxiety ought to be," said the Prince. "Is it in these circumstances of personal danger in which you expect to overcome a resolution, which is founded on a sense of what is due to me as a man or a prince? If the axe and scaffold were ready before the windows of Whitehall, I would rather tread the same path with my great-grandfather, than concede the slightest point in which my honour is concerned."

He spoke these words with a determined accent, and looked around him on the company, all of whom (excepting Darsie, who saw, he thought, a fair period to a most perilous enterprise) seemed in deep anxiety and confusion. At length, Sir Richard spoke in a solemn and melancholy tone.

"If the safety," he said, "of poor Richard Glendale were alone concerned in this matter, I have never valued my life enough to weigh it against the slightest point of your Majesty's service. But I am only a messenger—a commissioner, who must execute my trust, and upon whom a thousand voices will cry Curse and wo, if I do it not with fidelity. All of your adherents, even Redgauntlet himself, see certain ruin to this enterprise—the greatest danger to your Majesty's person—the utter destruction of all your party and friends, if they insist not on the point, which, unfortunately, your Majesty is so unwilling to concede. I speak it with a heart full of anguish—with a tongue unable to utter my emotions—but it must be spoken—the fatal truth—that if your royal goodness cannot yield to us a boon which we hold necessary to our security and your own, your Majesty with one word disarms ten thousand men, ready to draw their swords in your behalf; or, to speak yet more plainly, you annihilate even the semblance of a royal party in Great Britain."

"And why do you not add," said the Prince, scornfully, "that the men who have been ready to assume arms in my behalf, will atone for their treason to the Elector, by delivering me up to the fate for which so many proclamations have destined me? Carry my head to St. James's, gentlemen; you will do a more acceptable and a more honourable action, than, having inveigled me into a situation which places me so completely in your power, to dishonour yourselves by propositions which dishonour me."

"My God, sire!" exclaimed Sir Richard, clasping his hands together, in impatience, "of what great and inexpressible crime can your Majesty's ancestors have been guilty, that they have been punished by the infliction of judicial blindness on their whole generation!—Come, my Lord —, we must to our friends."

"By your leave, Sir Richard," said the young nobleman, "not till we have learned what measures can be taken for his Majesty's personal safety."

"Care not for me, young man," said Charles Edward; "when I was in the society of Highland robbers and cattle-drovers, I was safer than I now hold myself among the representatives of the best blood in England.—Pursell, gentlemen—I will shift for myself.

"This must never be," said Redgauntlet. "Let me that brought you to the point of danger, at least provide for your safe retreat."

So saying, he hastily left the apartment, followed by his nephew. The Wanderer, averting his eyes from Lord — and Sir Richard Glendale, threw himself into a seat at the upper end of the apartment, while they, in much anxiety, stood together at a distance from him, and conversed in whispers.

CHAPTER XXIII.

When Redgauntlet left the room, in haste and discomposure, the first person he met on the stair, and indeed so close by the door of the apartment that Darnie thought he must have been listening there, was his attendant Nixon.

"What the devil do you here?" he said abruptly and sternly.

"I wait your orders," said Nixon. "I hope all's right?—excuse my ask."

"All is wrong, sir—Where is the confaring fellow—Ewart—what do you call him?"

"Nanty Ewart, sir—I will carry your commands," said Nixon.

"I will deliver them myself to him," said Redgauntlet: "call him hither."

"But should your honour leave the presence?" said Nixon, still lingering.

"Death, sir, do you protest to me?" said Redgauntlet, bending his brows. "I, sir, transact my own business, you, I am told, act by a ragged deputy."

Without farther answer, Nixon departed, rather disconcerted, as it seemed to Darnie.

"That dog turns insolent and lazy," said Redgauntlet; "but I must bear with him for a while."

A moment after, Nixon returned with Ewart.

"Is this the smuggling fellow?" demanded Redgauntlet.

Nixon nodded.

"Is he sober now?—he was bawling anon."

"Sober enough for business," said Nixon.

"Well then, hark ye, Ewart—man your boat with your best hands, and have her by the pier—get your other fellows on board the brig—d you have any cargo left, throw it overboard, it shall be all paid, five times over—and be ready for a start to Wales or the Hebrides, or perhaps for Sweden or Norway."

Ewart answered sullenly enough, "Ay, ay, sir."

"Go with him, Nixon," said Redgauntlet, forcing himself to speak with some appearance of cordiality to the servant with whom he was offended; "see he does his duty."

Ewart left the house sullenly, followed by Nixon. The sailor was just in that species of drunken humour which made him jealous, passionate, and troublesome, without showing any other disorder than that of irritability.

As he walked towards the beach he kept muttering to himself, but in such a tone that his companion lost not a word, "Smuggling fellow—Ay, smuggler—and, start your cargo into the sea—and be ready to start for the Hebrides, or Sweden or the devil, I suppose—Well, and what if I said in answer—Rebel, Jacobite—traitor—I'll make you and your d—d confederates walk the plank—I have seen better men do it—half-a-score of a morning—when I was across the Line."

"D—d unhandsome terms those Redgauntlet used to you, brother," said Nixon.

"Which do you mean?" said Ewart, starting, and smothering himself. "I have been at my old trade of thinking aloud, have I?"

"No matter," answered Nixon, "none but a friend heard you. You cannot have forgotten how Redgauntlet disarmed you this morning?"

"Why, I would bear no malice about that—only he is so curiously high and saucy," said Ewart.

"And then," said Nixon, "I know you for a true-hearted Protestant."

"That I am, by G—," said Ewart. "No, the Spaniards could never get my religion from me."

"And a friend to King George, and the Hanover line of succession," said Nixon, still walking and speaking very slow.

"You may swear I am, excepting in the way of business, as Turnpenny says. I like King George, but I can't afford to pay duties."

"You are outlawed, I believe?" said Nixon.

"Am I?—faith, I believe I am," said Ewart. "I wish I were outlawed again with all my heart—do come along, we must get all ready for our peremptory gentleman, I suppose."

"I will teach you a better trick," said Nixon. "There is a bloody pack of rebels yonder."

"Ay, we all know that," said the smuggler; "but the snowball's melting, I think."

"There is some one yonder, whose head is worth thirty thousand pounds—of sterling money," said Nixon, pausing between each word, as if to enhance the magnificence of the sum.

"And what of that?" said Ewart, quickly.

"Only that if, instead of lying by the sea with your men on their oars, if you will just carry your boat on board just now, and take no notice of any signal from the shore, by G—d, Nanty Ewart, I'll make a man of you for life!"

"Oh, ho! then the Jacobite gentry are out much as they think themselves?" said Nanty.

"In an hour or two," replied Nixon. "they will make safer in Carlisle Castle."

"The devil they will!" said Ewart; "and you have been the informer, I suppose?"

"Yes; I have been all paid for my service among the Redgauntlets—have scarce got dog's wages—been treated worse than ever dog was used. I saw the old fox and his cub in the same trap now, 'Ner', and we'll see how a certain young lady will look then. You see I am frank with you, Nanty."

"And I will be as frank with you," said the smuggler. "You are a d—d old scoundrel—traitor to a man whose bread you eat! Me help to bring your devils, that have been so often betrayed myself—let if they were a hundred Popes, Devils, and Protestants I will back and tell them their danger—they are out of cargo—regularly invoiced—but under my chest by the owners—I'll back!"

"You are not stark mad?" said Nixon, who now saw he had miscalculated in supposing Nanty's old ideas of honour and fidelity could be shaken even by repentment, or by his Protestant partialities. "You shall not go back—it is all a joke."

"I'll back to Redgauntlet, and see whether a joke he will laugh at."

"My life is lost if you do," said Nixon—"his reason."

They were in a clump or cluster of tall firs at the moment they were speaking, about half way between the pier and the house, but not in a direct line from which Nixon, whose object it was to gain time, had induced Ewart to diverge incessantly.

He now saw the necessity of taking a desperate resolution. "Hear reason," he said; and added as Nanty still endeavoured to press him, "Or do hear this!" discharging a pocket-pistol into the unfortunate man's body.

Nanty staggered, but kept his feet. "It has at my back bone aunder," he said; "you have done me the last good office, and I will not die ungrateful."

As he uttered the last words, he collected his remaining strength, stood firm for an instant, drew his hanger, and striking a stroke with both hands at Ewart's head, struck him down.

The blow, struck with the energy of a desperate and dying man, exhibited a force to which Ewart's exhausted frame might have seemed inadequate;—it cleft the hat which he wore, and forced it into his skull, and then left a fragment of the weapon, which was bent to the fury of the blow.

One of the armen of the lugger, who stood attracted by the firing of the pistol, though being a small one, the report was very trifling, found the unfortunate man stark dead. Alarmed at what he saw, which he conceived to have been the consequence of some unsuccessful engagement betwixt his late commander and a revenue officer, (for Nixon chanced not to be personally known to him,) the sailor hastened back to the boat, in order to apprise his comrades of Nanty's fate, and to advise them to take off themselves and the vessel.

Mean time Redgauntlet, having, as we have seen, despatched Nixon for the purpose of securing a retreat for the unfortunate Charles in case of extremity, returned to the apartment where he had left the Wanderer. He now found him alone.

"Sir Richard Glendale," said the unfortunate Prince, "with his young friend, has gone to consult their adherents now in the house. Redgauntlet, my friend, I will not blame you for the circumstances in which I find myself, though I am at once placed in danger, and rendered contemptible. But you ought to have stated to me more strongly the weight which these gentlemen attached to their insolent proposition. You should have told me that no compromise would have any effect—that they desired, not a Prince to govern them, but one, on the contrary, over whom they were to exercise restraint on all occasions, from the highest affairs of the state, down to the most intimate and closest concerns of his own privacy, which the most ordinary men desire to keep secret, and sacred from interference."

"God knows," said Redgauntlet, in much agitation, "I acted for the best when I pressed your Majesty to come hither—I never thought that your Majesty, at such a crisis, would have scrupled, when a kingdom was in view, to sacrifice an attachment, which"

"Peace, sir!" said Charles; "it is not for you to estimate my feelings upon such a subject."

Redgauntlet coloured high, and bowed profoundly. "At least," he resumed, "I hoped that some middle way might be found, and it shall—and must—Come with me, nephew. We will to these gentlemen, and I am confident I shall bring back heart-stirring tidings."

"I will do much to comply with them, Redgauntlet. I am loath, having again set my foot on British land, to quit it without a blow for my right. But this which they demand of me is a degradation, and compliance is impossible."

Redgauntlet, followed by his nephew, the unwilling spectator of this extraordinary scene, left once more the apartment of the adventurous Wanderer, and was met on the top of the stairs by Joe Crackenthorp. "Where are the other gentlemen?" he said.

"Yonder, in the west barrack," answered Joe; "but Master Ingoldsby,"—that was the name by which Redgauntlet was most generally known in Cumberland,—"I wished to say to you that I must put yonder folk together in one room."

"What folk?" said Redgauntlet, impatiently.

"Why, them prisoner stranger folk, as you bid Cristal Nixon look after. Lord love you! this is a large house enow, but we cannot have separate lock-ups for folks, as they have in Newgate or in Bedlam. Yonder's a mad beggar, that is to be a great man when he wins a lawsuit, Lord help him!—Yonder's a Quaker and a lawyer charged with a riot; and, scod, I must make one key and one lock keep them, for we are chokeful, and you have sent off old Nixon, that could have given one some help in this confusion. Besides, they take up every one a room, and call for naughts on earth,—excepting the old man, who calls nastily enough,—but he has not a penny to pay shot."

"Do as thou wilt with them," said Redgauntlet, who had listened impatiently to his statement; "so thou dost but keep them from getting out and making some alarm in the country, I care not."

"A Quaker and a lawyer!" said Darsie. "This must be Fairford and Geddes.—Uncle, I must request of you"

"Nay, nephew," interrupted Redgauntlet, "this is no time for asking questions. You shall yourself decide upon their fate in the course of an hour—no harm whatever is designed them."

So saying, he hurried towards the place where the Jacobite gentlemen were holding their council, and Darsie followed him, in the hope that the obstacle which had arisen to the prosecution of their desperate adventure would prove insurmountable, and spare him the necessity of a dangerous and violent rupture with his uncle. The discussions among them were very eager; the more daring part of the conspirators, who had little but life to lose, being desirous to proceed at all hazards; while the others, whom a sense of honour and a hesitation to disavow long-cherished principles had brought forward, were perhaps not ill satisfied to have a fair apology for declining an adventure, into which they had entered with more of reluctance than zeal.

Mean while Joe Crackenthorp, availing himself of the hasty permission obtained from Redgauntlet, proceeded to assemble in one apartment those whose safe custody had been thought necessary; and without much considering the propriety of the matter, he selected for the common place of confinement, the room which Lillias had since her brother's departure occupied alone. It had a strong lock, and was double-hinged, which probably led to the preference assigned to it as a place of security.

Into this, Joe, with little ceremony, and a good deal of noise, introduced the Quaker and Fairford; the first descanting on the immorality, the other on the illegality, of his proceedings; and he turning a deaf ear both to the one and the other. Next he pushed in, almost in headlong fashion, the unfortunate litigant, who having made some resistance at the threshold, had received a violent thrust in consequence, and came rushing forward, like a ram in the act of charging, with such impetus, as must have carried him to the top of the room, and struck the cocked hat which sat perched on the top of his tow wig against Miss Redgauntlet's person, had not the honest Quaker interrupted his career by seizing him by the collar, and bringing him to a stand. "Friend," said he, with the real good-breeding which so often subsists independently of ceremonial, "thou art no company for that young person; she is, thou seest, frightened at our being so suddenly thrust in hither; and although that be no fault of ours, yet it will become us to behave civilly towards her. Wherefore come thou with me to this window, and I will tell thee what it concerns thee to know."

"And what for should I no speak to the leddy, friend?" said Peter, who was now about half seas over. "I have spoke to leddies before now, man—What for should she be frightened at me?—I am nae bogle, I ween.—What are ye pooin' me that gate for?—Ye will rive my coat, and I will have a good action for having myself made sartum atque tectum at your expenses."

Notwithstanding this threat, Mr. Geddes, whose muscles were as strong as his judgment was sound and his temper sedate, led Poor Peter, under the sense of a control against which he could not struggle, to the farther corner of the apartment, where, placing him, whether he would or no, in a chair, he sat down beside him, and effectually prevented his annoying the young lady, upon whom he had seemed bent on conferring the delights of his society.

If Peter had immediately recognised his counsel learned in the law, it is probable that not even the benevolent efforts of the Quaker could have kept him in a state of restraint; but Fairford's back was turned towards his client, whose optics, besides being somewhat dazzled with ale and brandy, were speedily engaged in contemplating a half-crown which Joshua held between his finger and his thumb, saying, at the same time, "Friend, thou art indigent and improvident. This will, well employed, procure thee sustentation of nature for more than a single day; and I will bestow it on thee if thou wilt sit here and keep me company; for neither thou nor I, friend, are fit company for ladies."

"Speak for yourself, friend," said Peter, scornfully; "I was aye kend to be agreeable to the fair sex; and when I was in business I served the leddies wi' anither sort of decorum than Plainstanes, the d—d awkward scoundrel! It was one of the articles of dittay between us."

"Well, but, friend," said the Quaker, who observed that the young lady still seemed to fear Peter's intrusion, "I wish to hear thee speak about this great lawsuit of thine, which has been matter of such celebrity."

"Celebrity?—Ye may swear that," said Peter, for the string was touched to which his crazy imagination always vibrated. "And I dinna wonder that folk that judge things by their outward grandeur, should think me something worth their envying. It's very true that it is grandeur upon earth to hear ane's name thundered out along the long-arched roof of the Outer-House,—Poor Peter Peebles against Plainstones, et per contra; 'a' the best lawyers in the house fleeing like eagles to the prey; some because they are in the cause, and some because they want to be thought engaged (for there are tricks in other trades by selling muslins)—to see the reporters mending their pens to take down the debate—the Lords themselves pooin' in their chairs, like folk sitting down to a gude dinner, and crying on the clerks for parts and pendicles of the process, who, puir bodics, can do little mair than cry on their closet-keepers to help them. To see a' this," continued Peter in a tone of sustained rapture, "and to ken that naething will be said or dune amang a' thae grand folk, for maybe the feck of three hours, saving what concerns you and your business—O, man, nae wonder that ye judge this to be earthly glory!—And yet, neighbour, as I was saying, there be no unco drawbacks—I whiles think of my bit house, where dinner, and supper, and breakfast, used to come without the crying for, just as if fairies had brought it—and the gude bed at e'en—and the needfu' penny in the pouch.—And then to see a' ane's worldly substance capering in the air in a pair of weigh-bauks, now up, now down, as the breath of judge or counsel inclines it for pursuer or defender,—troth, man, there are times I rue having ever begun the plea wark, though may be, when ye consider the renown and credit I have by it, ye will hardly believe what I am saying."

"Indeed, friend," said Joshua, with a sigh, "I am glad thou hast found any thing in the legal contention which compensates thee for poverty and hunger; but I believe, were other human objects of ambition looked upon as closely, their advantages would be found as chimerical as those attending thy protracted litigation."

"But never mind, friend," said Peter, "I'll tell you the exact state of the conjunct processes, and make you sensible that I can bring mysell round with a wet finger, now I have my finger and my thumb on this loup-the-dike loon, the lad Fairford."

Alan Fairford was in the act of speaking to the masked lady, (for Miss Redgauntlet had retained her riding vizard,) endeavouring to assure her as he perceived her anxiety, of such protection as he could afford, when his own name, pronounced in a loud tone, attracted his attention. He looked round, and, seeing Peter Peebles, as hastily turned to avoid his notice, in which he succeeded, so earnest was Peter upon his colloquy with one of the most respectable auditors whose attention he had ever been able to engage. And by this little motion, momentary as it was, Alan gained an unexpected advantage; for while he looked round, Miss Lillias, I could never ascertain why, took the moment to adjust her mask, and did it so awkwardly, that when her companion again turned his head, he recognised as much of her features as authorized him to address her as his fair client, and to press his offers of protection and assistance with the boldness of a former acquaintance.

Lillias Redgauntlet withdrew the mask from her crimsoned cheek. "Mr. Fairford," she said, in a voice almost inaudible, "you have the character of a young gentleman of sense and generosity; but we have already met in one situation which you must think singular; and I must be exposed to misconstruction, at least for my forwardness, were it not in a cause in which my dearest affections were concerned."

"Any interest in my beloved friend, Darsie Latimer," said Fairford, stepping a little back, and putting a marked restraint upon his former advances, "gives me a double right to be useful to"—He stopped short.

"To his sister, your goodness would say," answered Lillias.

"His sister, madam?" replied Alan, in the extremity of astonishment—"Sister, I presume in affection only?"

"No, sir; my dear brother Darsie and I are connected by the bonds of actual relationship; and I am not sorry to be the first to tell this to the friend he most values."

Fairford's first thought was on the violent passion which Darsie had expressed towards the fair unknown. "Good God!" he exclaimed, "how did he bear the discovery?"

"With resignation, I hope," said Lillias, smiling. "A more accomplished sister he might easily have come by, but scarcely could have found one who could love him more than I do."

"I meant—I only meant to say," said the young counsellor, his presence of mind failing him for an instant—"that is, I meant to ask where Darsie Latimer is at this moment."

"In this very house, and under the guardianship of his uncle, whom I believe you knew as a visiter of your father, under the name of Mr. Herries of Brrenswork."

"Let me hasten to him," said Fairford; "I have sought him through difficulties and dangers—I must see him instantly."

"You forget you are a prisoner," said the young lady.

"True—true; but I cannot be long detained—the cause alleged is too ridiculous."

"Alas!" said Lillias, "our fate—my brother's and mine, at least—must turn on the deliberations, perhaps of less than an hour.—For you, sir, I believe and apprehend nothing but some restraint; my uncle is neither cruel nor unjust, though few will go farther in the cause which he has adopted."

"Which is that of the Pretend—"

"For God's sake speak lower!" said Lillias, approaching her hand, as if to stop him. "The word may cost you your life. You do not know—indeed you do not—the terrors of the situation in which we at present stand, and in which I fear you also are involved by your friendship for my brother."

"I do not indeed know the particulars of our situation," said Fairford; "but be the danger what it may, I shall not grudge my share of it for the sake of my friend; or," he added, with more timidity, "of my friend's sister. Let me hope," he said, "my dear Miss Latimer, that my presence may be of some use to you; and that it may be so, let me entreat a share of your confidence which I am conscious I have otherwise no right to ask."

He led her, as he spoke, towards the recess of the farther window of the room, and observing to her that, unhappily, he was particularly exposed to interruption from the mad old man whose entrance had alarmed her, he disposed of Darsie Latimer's night skirt, which had been left in the apartment, over the back of two chairs, forming thus a sort of screen behind which he ensconced himself with the mantle of the green mantle; feeling at the moment, that the danger in which he was placed was almost compensated by the intelligence which permitted those feelings towards her to revive, which justice to his friend had induced him to stifle in the birth.

The relative situation of adviser and advised, of protector and protected, is so peculiarly suited to the respective condition of man and woman, that great progress towards intimacy is often made in very small space; for the circumstances call for confidence on the part of the gentleman, and forbid coyness on the part of the lady, so that the usual barriers against intercourse are at once thrown down.

Under these circumstances, securing themselves as far as possible from observation, conversing in whispers, and seated in a corner, where they were brought into so close contact that their faces nearly touched each other, Fairford heard from Lillias Redgauntlet the history of her family, particularly of her uncle; his views upon her brother, and the agony which she felt at that very moment he might succeed in engaging Darsie in some desperate scheme, fatal to his fortune and perhaps to his life.

Alan Fairford's acute understanding instantly at he had heard with the circumstances he stood at Fairford. His first thought was, at all risks, his instant escape, and presence powerful enough to crush, in the very conspiracy of such a determined character did not consider as difficult; for, though the guarded on the outside, the window, which bore ten feet from the ground, was open for a common on which it looked was unmened profusely covered with fudge. There thought, he little difficulty in effecting his id in concealing his course after he had

But he relinquished this design as armed. He had no doubt, that any light could throw on the state of the country, no too late to be serviceable to one who was ported to have his own full share of the obstinacy which had cost his ancestors so who, in drawing the sword, must have om him the scabbard.

urford had never more difficulty in his life a first emotion, then he had to refrain from down the crazy blockhead who had broke m at such a moment. But the length of idleness gave him time, fortunately perhaps arties, to reflect on the extreme irregularity proceeding. He stood silent, however, with while Peter went on.

u cannot endure to hear as much of that out, and the Quaker, “as I have heard out of opinion for thee, I think verily thou wilt soon be at the bottom of the matter, unless it be altogether bottomless.”

Fairford shook off, rather indignantly, the large busy hand which Peter had imposed upon his shoulder, and was about to say something peevish, upon an unpleasant and insolent mode of interruption, when the door opened, a terrible voice saying to the sentinel, “I tell you I mean be in, to see if Mr. Nixon’s here;” and Little Benjie thrust in his mophead and beam black eyes. Ere he could withdraw it, Peter Peebles sprang to the door, seized on the boy by the collar, and dragged him forward into the room.

“Let me see it,” he said, “ye ne’er-da-weel limb of Satan! I’ll gar ye eatuly the production, I trow—I’ll hae first and second dijoncon against you, ye deevil’s buckie!”

“What dost thou want?” said the Quaker, inter- ferring. “Why dost thou frighten the boy, friend Peebles?”

“I gave the becard a penny to buy me snuff,” said the pauper, “and he has rendered no account of his intrusions, but I’ll gar him as gude.”

So saying, he proceeded forcibly to rifle the pockets of Benjie’s ragged jacket, of one or two snarers for game marbles, a half-bitten apple, two stolen eggs, (one of which Peter broke in the eagerness of his re- search,) and various other unconsidered trifles, which had not the air of being very honestly come by. The little rascal, under this discipline, bit and struggled like a fox-cub, but like that vermin, uttered neither cry nor complaint, till a note, which Peter tore from his bosom, flew as far as Lilies Redgaunt- let and fell at her feet. It was addressed to C. N.

It was for the villain Nixon,” she said to Alan Fair- ford, “open it without scruple; that boy is his enemy; we shall now see what the miscreant is driving at.”

Little Benjie now gave up all farther struggle, and suffered Peebles to take from him, without resistance, a shilling, out of which Peter declared he would pay himself principal and interest, and account for the balance. The boy, whose attention seemed fixed on something very different, only said, “Master Nixon will murder me!”

Alan Fairford did not hesitate to read the little scrap of paper, on which was written, “All is pro- posed—keep them in play until I come up—You may depend on your reward.—C. C.”

“Alas, my uncle—my poor uncle!” said Lilies; this is the result of his confidence! Methinks, to give him instant notice of his confidant’s treachery, is now the best service we can render all concerned if they break up their undertaking, as they must now do, Darius will be at liberty.”

In the same breath, they were both at the half-opened door of the room, Fairford entreating to speak with the Father Buonaventura, and Lilies, equally vehemently, requesting a moment’s interview with her uncle. While the sentinel hesitated what to do, his attention was called to a loud noise at the door, where a crowd had been assembled in conse- quence of the appalling cry, that the enemy were upon them; occasioned as it afterwards proved, by some stragglers having at length discovered the dead bodies of Nanty Fwait and of Nixon.

Amid the confusion occasioned by this alarming incident, the sentinel ceased to attend to his duty; and, accepting Alan Fairford’s arm, Lilies found no opposition in penetrating even to the inner apartment, where the principal persons in the enterprise, whose council had been disturbed by this alarming inci- dent, were now assembled in great confusion, and had been joined by the Chevalier himself.

“Only a mutiny among these smuggling scound- rels,” said Redgauntlet.

“Only a mutiny, do you say?” said Sir Richard Glenale, “and the lugger, the last hope of escape for”—he looked towards Charles,—“stands out to sea under a press of sail!”

“Do not concern yourself about me,” said the un- fortunate Prince, “this is not the worst emergency in which it has been my lot to stand; and if it were, I fear it not. Shift for yourselves, my lords and gen- tlemen.”

"No, never!" said the young Lord ——. "Our only hope now is in an honourable resistance."

"Most true," said Redgauntlet; "let despair renew the union amongst us which accident disturbed. I give my voice for displaying the royal banner instantly, and ——— How now!" he concluded, sternly, as Lillias, first soliciting his attention by pulling his cloak, put into his hand the scroll, and added, it was designed for that of Nixon.

Redgauntlet read — and, dropping it on the ground, continued to stare upon the spot where it fell, with raised hands and fixed eyes. Sir Richard Glendale lifted the fatal paper, read it, and saying, "Now all is indeed over," handed it to Maxwell, who said aloud, "Black Colin Campbell, by G — d! I heard he had come post from London last night."

As if in echo to his thoughts, the violin of the blind man was heard, playing, with spirit, "The Campbells are coming," a celebrated clan-march.

"The Campbells are coming in earnest," said Mac-Kellar; "they are upon us with the whole battalion from Carlisle."

There was a silence of dismay, and two or three of the company began to drop out of the room.

Lord ——— spoke with the generous spirit of a young English nobleman. "If we have been fools, do not let us be cowards. We have one here more precious than us all, and come hither on our warranty—let us save him at least."

"True, most true," answered Sir Richard Glendale. "Let the King be first cared for."

"That shall be my business," said Redgauntlet; "if we have but time to bring back the brig, all will be well—I will instantly despatch a party in a fishing skiff to bring her to."—He gave his commands to two or three of the most active among his followers.—"Let him be once on board," he said, "and there are enough of us to stand to arms and cover his retreat."

"Right, right," said Sir Richard, "and I will look to points which can be made defensible; and the old powder-plot boys could not have made a more desperate resistance than we shall.—Redgauntlet," continued he, "I see some of our friends are looking pale; but methinks your nephew has more mettle in his eye now than when we were in cold deliberation, with danger at a distance."

"It is the way of our house," said Redgauntlet; "our courage ever kindles highest on the losing side. I, too, feel that the catastrophe I have brought on must not be survived by its author. Let me first," he said, addressing Charles, "see your Majesty's sacred person in such safety as can now be provided for it, and then" —

"You may spare all considerations concerning me, gentlemen," again repeated Charles; "yon mountain of Criffel shall fly as soon as I will."

Most threw themselves at his feet with weeping and entreaty; some one or two slunk in confusion from the apartment, and were heard riding off. Unnoticed in such a scene, Darsie, his sister, and Fairford, drew together, and held each other by the hands, as those who, when a vessel is about to founder in the storm, determine to take their chance of life and death together.

Amid this scene of confusion, a gentleman, plainly dressed in a riding-habit, with a black cockade in his hat, but without any arms except a couteau-de-chasse, walked into the apartment without ceremony. He was a tall, thin, gentlemanly man, with a look and bearing decidedly military. He had passed through their guards, if in the confusion they now maintained any, without stop or question, and now stood, almost unarmed, among armed men, who, nevertheless, gazed on him as on the angel of destruction.

"You look coldly on me, gentlemen," he said. "Sir Richard Glendale—my Lord ———, we were not always such strangers. Ha, Pate-in-Peril, how is it with you? and you, too, Ingoldsby—I must not call you by any other name—why do you receive an old friend so coldly? But you guess my errand."

"And are prepared for it, General," said Redgauntlet; "we are not men to be penned up like sheep for the slaughter."

"Pshaw! you take it too seriously—let me speak but one word with you."

"No words can shake our purpose," said Redgauntlet, "were your whole command, as I suppose is the case, drawn round the house."

"I am certainly not unsupported," said the General; "but if you would hear me" —

"Hear me, sir," said the Wanderer, stepping forward; "I suppose I am the mark you aim at—I surrender myself willingly, to save these gentlemen's danger—let this at least avail in their favour."

An exclamation of "Never, never!" broke from the little body of partisans, who threw themselves round the unfortunate Prince, and would have seized or struck down Campbell, had it not been that he remained with his arms folded, and a look, rather indicating impatience because they would not hear him, than the least apprehension of violence at their hand.

At length he obtained a moment's silence. "I do not," he said, "know this gentleman"—(Making a profound bow to the unfortunate Prince)—"I do not wish to know him; it is a knowledge which would suit neither of us."

"Our ancestors, nevertheless, have been well acquainted," said Charles, unable to suppress, even at that hour of dread and danger, the painful recollection of fallen royalty.

"In one word, General Campbell," said Redgauntlet, "is it to be peace or war?—You are a man of honour, and we can trust you."

"I thank you, sir," said the General; "and I feel that the answer to your question rests with you. Come, do not be fools, gentlemen; there was perhaps no great harm meant or intended by your gathering together in this obscure corner, for a bear-bait or a cock-fight, or whatever other amusement you may have intended; but it was a little imprudent, considering how you stand with government, and it has occasioned some anxiety. Exaggerated accounts of your purpose have been laid before government by the information of a traitor in your own councils; and I was sent down post to take the command of a sufficient number of troops, in case these calumnies should be found to have any real foundation. I have come here, of course, sufficiently supported both with cavalry and infantry, to do whatever might be necessary; but my commands are—and I am sure they agree with my inclination—to make no arrests, nor, to make no farther inquiries of any kind, if this good assembly will consider their own interest so far as to give to their immediate purpose, and return quietly to their own houses."

"What!—all?" exclaimed Sir Richard Glendale—"all, without exception?"

"All, without one single exception," said the General; "such are my orders. If you accept my terms, say so, and make haste; for things may happen to interfere with his Majesty's kind purposes towards you all."

"His Majesty's kind purposes!" said the Wanderer—"Do I hear you aright, sir?"

"I speak the King's very words, from his very lips," replied the General. "'I will,' said his Majesty, 'to serve the confidence of my subjects by reposing in security in the fidelity of the millions who acknowledge my title—in the good sense and prudence of a few who continue, from the errors of education, to disown it.'—His Majesty will not even believe that the most zealous Jacobites who yet remain can nourish a thought of exciting a civil war, which must be fatal to their families and themselves, besides spreading bloodshed and ruin through a peaceful land. He cannot even believe of his kinsman, that he would attempt which must ruin all who have escaped former calamities; and he is convinced, that, did curiosity or any other motive lead that person to visit this country, he would soon see it was his wisest course to return to the continent; and his Majesty commiserates his situation too much to offer any obstacle to his doing so."

"Is this real?" said Redgauntlet. "Can you mean this?—Am I—are all, are any of these gentlemen?"

at liberty, without interruption, to embark in yonder brig, which, I see, is now again approaching the shore?"

"You, sir—all—any of the gentlemen present," said the General,—“all whom the vessel can contain, are at liberty to embark uninterrupted by me; but I advise none to go off who have not powerful reasons, unconnected with the present meeting, for this will be remembered against no one.”

"Then, gentlemen," said Redgauntlet, clasping his hands together as the words burst from him, "the cause is lost for ever!"

General Campbell turned away to the window, as if to avoid hearing what they said. Their consultation was but momentary; for the door of escape which thus opened was as unexpected as the exigence was threatening.

"We have your word of honour for our protection," said Sir Richard Glendale, "if we dissolve our meeting in obedience to your summons?"

"You have, Sir Richard," answered the General.

"And I also have your promise," said Redgauntlet, "that I may go on board yonder vessel, with any friend whom I may choose to accompany me?"

"Not only that, Mr. Ingoldsby—or I will call you Redgauntlet once more—you may stay in the offing for a tide, until you are joined by any person who may remain at Fairladies. After that, there will be a sloop of war on the station, and I need not say your condition will then become perilous."

"Perilous it should not be, General Campbell," said Redgauntlet, "or more perilous to others than to us, if others thought as I do even in this extremity."

"You forget yourself, my friend," said the unhappy Adventurer; "you forget that the arrival of this gentleman only puts the cope-stone on our already adopted resolution to abandon our bull-fight, or by whatever other wild name this headlong enterprise may be termed. I bid you farewell, unfriendly friends—I bid you farewell," (bowing to the General,) "my friendly foe—I leave this strand as I landed upon it, alone, and to return no more!"

"Not alone," said Redgauntlet, "while there is blood in the veins of my father's son."

"Not alone," said the other gentlemen present, stung with feelings which almost overpowered the better reasons under which they had acted. "We will not disown our principles, or see your person endangered."

"If it be only your purpose to see the gentleman to the beach," said General Campbell, "I will myself go with you. My presence among you, unarmed, and in your power, will be a pledge of my friendly intentions, and will overawe, should such be offered, any interruption on the part of officious persons."

"Be it so," said the Adventurer, with the air of a Prince to a subject; not of one who complied with the request of an enemy too powerful to be resisted.

They left the apartment—they left the house—an unauthenticated and dubious, but appalling, sensation of terror had already spread itself among the inferior retainers, who had so short time before strutted, and hustled, and thronged the doorway and the passages. A report had arisen, of which the origin could not be traced, of troops advancing towards the spot in considerable numbers; and men who, for one reason or other, were most of them amenable to the arm of power, had either shrunk into stables or corners, or fled the place entirely. There was solitude on the landscape, excepting the small party which now moved towards the rude pier, where a boat lay manned, agreeably to Redgauntlet's orders previously given.

The last heir of the Stewarts leant on Redgauntlet's arm as they walked towards the beach; for the ground was rough, and he no longer possessed the elasticity of limb and of spirit which had, twenty years before, carried him over many a Highland hill, as light as one of their native deer. His adherents followed, looking on the ground, their feelings struggling against the dictates of their reason.

General Campbell accompanied them with an air of apparent ease and indifference, but watching, at the same time, and no doubt with some anxiety, the changing features of those who acted in this extraordinary scene.

Darsie and his sister naturally followed their uncle, whose violence they no longer feared, while his character attracted their respect; and Alan Fairford accompanied them from interest in their fate, unnoticed in a party where all were too much occupied with their own thoughts and feelings, as well as with the impending crisis, to attend to his presence.

Half way betwixt the house and the beach, they saw the bodies of Nanty Ewart and Cristal Nixon blackening in the sun.

"That was your informer?" said Redgauntlet, looking back to General Campbell, who only nodded his assent.

"Caitiff wretch!" exclaimed Redgauntlet;—"and yet the name were better bestowed on the fool who could be misled by thee."

"That sound broadsword cut," said the General, "has saved us the shame of rewarding a traitor."

They arrived at the place of embarkation. The Prince stood a moment with folded arms, and looked around him in deep silence. A paper was then slipped into his hands—he looked at it, and said, "I find the two friends I have left at Fairladies are apprized of my destination, and propose to embark from Bowness. I presume this will not be an infringement of the conditions under which you have acted?"

"Certainly not," answered General Campbell; "they shall have all facility to join you."

"I wish, then," said Charles, "only another companion.—Redgauntlet, the air of this country is as hostile to you as it is to me. These gentlemen have made their peace, or rather they have done nothing to break it. But you—come you, and share my home where chance shall cast it. We shall never see these shores again; but we will talk of them, and of our disconcerted bull-fight."

"I follow you, Sir, through life," said Redgauntlet, "as I would have followed you to death. Permit me one moment."

The Prince then looked round, and seeing the abashed countenances of his other adherents bent upon the ground, he hastened to say, "Do not think that you, gentlemen, have obliged me less because your zeal was mingled with prudence, entertained, I am sure, more on my own account, and on that of your country, than from selfish apprehensions."

He stepped from one to another, and, amid sobs and bursting tears, received the adieus of the last remnant which had hitherto supported his lofty pretensions, and addressed them individually with accents of tenderness and affection.

The General drew a little aloof, and signed to Redgauntlet to speak with him while this scene proceeded. "It is now all over," he said, "and Jacobite will be henceforward no longer a party name. When you tire of foreign parts, and wish to make your peace, let me know. Your restless zeal alone has impeded your pardon hitherto."

"And now I shall not need it," said Redgauntlet. "I leave England for ever; but I am not displeased that you should hear my family adieus.—Nephew, come hither. In presence of General Campbell, I tell you, that though to breed you up in my own political opinions has been for many years my anxious wish, I am now glad that it could not be accomplished. You pass under the service of the reigning Monarch without the necessity of changing your allegiance—a change, however," he added, looking around him, "which sits more easy on honourable men than I could have anticipated; but some wear the badge of their loyalty on the sleeve, and others in the heart.—You will, from henceforth, be uncontrolled master of all the property of which forfeiture could not deprive your father—of all that belonged to him—excepting this, his good sword," (laying his hand on the weapon he wore) "which shall never fight for the House of Hanover; and as my hand will never draw weapon more, I shall sink it forty fathoms deep in the wide ocean. Bless you, young man! If I have dealt harshly with you, forgive me. I had set my whole desires on one point,—God knows, with no selfish purpose; and I am justly punished by this final termination of my views, for having been too little scrupulous in the means by which I pursued them. Nioca, farewell, and may God bless you also!"

"No, sir," said Lilia, seizing his hand eagerly. "You have been hitherto my protector,—you are now in sorrow, let me be your attendant and your comforter in exile!"

"I thank you, my girl, for your unmerited affection; but it cannot and must not be. The curtain here falls between us. I go to the house of another—If I leave it before I quit the earth, it shall be only for the House of God. Once more, farewell both I!—The fatal doom," he said, with a melancholy smile, "will, I trust, now depart from the House of Redgauntlet, since its present representative has adhered to the winning side. I am convinced he will not change it, should it in turn become the losing one."

The unfortunate Charles Edward had now given his last adieu to his downcast adherents. He made a sign with his hand to Redgauntlet, who came to assist him into the shuff. General Campbell also offered his assistance; the rest appearing too much affected by the scene which had taken place to prevent him.

"You are not sorry, General, to do me this last act of courtesy," said the Chevalier; "and, on my part, I thank you for it. You have taught me the principle on which men on the scaffold feel forgiveness and kindness even for their executioner—Farewell!"

They were seated in the boat, which presently pulled off from the land. The Oxford drave broke out into a loud benediction, in terms which General Campbell was too generous to criticise at the time, or to remember afterwards;—nay, it is said that, Whig and Campbell as he was, he could not help joining in the universal Amen! which resounded from the shore.

CONCLUSION,

BY DR. DRYAUGHT,

IN A LETTER TO THE AUTHOR OF WAVERLEY.

I AM truly sorry, my worthy and much respected sir, that my anxious researches have neither, in the form of letters, nor of diaries, or other memoranda, been able to discover more than I have hitherto transmitted, of the history of the Redgauntlet family. But I observe in an old newspaper called the Whitehall Gazette, of which I fortunately possess a file for several years, that Sir Arthur Darnley Redgauntlet was presented to his late Majesty at the drawing-room, by Lieutenant-General Campbell—upon which the Editor observes, in the way of comment, that we were going, remis ad nos, into the interests of the Pretender, since a Scot had presented a Jacobite at Court. I am sorry I have not room (the frank being only uncial) for his further observations, tending to show the apprehensions entertained by many well-instructed persons of the period, that the young King might himself be induced to become one of the Stewarts' faction,—a catastrophe from which it has pleased Heaven to preserve these kingdoms.

I perceive also, by a marriage contract in the family repositories, that Miss Lilia Redgauntlet of Redgauntlet, about eighteen months after the transactions you have commemorated, intermarried with Alan Fairford, Esq. Advocate, of Clinkdollar, who, I think, we may not unreasonably conclude to be the same person whose name occurs so frequently in the pages of your narration. In my last excursion to Edinburgh, I was fortunate enough to discover an old uncle, from whom, at the expense of a bottle of whisky, and half a pound of tobacco, I extracted the important information, that he knew Peter Pechlin very well, and had drunk many a mead with him in Cadie Fraser's turn. He said that he lived ten years after King George's accession, in the momentary expectation of winning his cause every day in the Session time, and every hour in the day, and at last fell down dead, in what my informer called a "Perplexy fit," upon a proposal for a composition being made to him in the Outer House. I have chosen to retain my informer's phrase, not being able justly to determine whether it is a corruption of the word apoplexy, as my friend Mr. Oldbuck supposes, or the name of some peculiar disorder: incidental to those who have offices in the Courts of Law, as many callings and conditions of men have diseases appropriate to themselves. The same cadie also remembered Blind Willie Stevenson, who was called Wandering Willie, and who ended his days "unco beinly, in Sir Arthur Redgauntlet's ha' neuk." "He had done the family some good turn," he said, "specially when one of the Argyle gentlemen was coming down on a whorl of them that had the 'auld leaven' about them, and wad hae taen every man of them, and nae less nor beaded and hanged them. But Willie, and a friend they had, called Robin the Rambler, gae them warning by playing tunes such as, 'the Campbells are coming, and the like, whereby they got timeous warning to take the wing.' I need not point out to your acuteness, my worthy sir, that this seems to refer to some inaccurate account of the transactions in which you seem so much interested."

Respecting Redgauntlet, about whose subsequent history you are more particularly inquisitive, I have learned from an excellent person who was a priest of the Scottish Monastery of Ratisbon, before its suppression, that he remained for two or three years in the family of the Chevalier, and only left it at last consequence of some discord in that melancholy household. As he had hinted to General Campbell, he exchanged his residence for the cloister, and displayed in the latter part of his life a strong sense of the duties of religion, which in his earlier days he had too much neglected, being altogether engaged in political speculations and intrigues. He rose to the situation of Prior, in the house which he belonged to, and which was of a very strict order of religion. He sometimes received his countrymen, whom accident brought to Ratisbon, and curiosity induced to visit the Monastery of —. But it was remarked, that though he listened with interest and attention, when British or particularly Scottish, became the subject of conversation, he never either introduced or protracted the subject, never used the English language, nor inquired about English affairs, and, above all, never mentioned his own family. His strict observance of the rules of his order gave him, at the time of his death, some pretensions to be chosen a saint, and the brethren of the Monastery of — made great efforts for that effect, and brought forward some plausible proofs of miracles. But there was a circumstance which threw a doubt over the subject, and prevented the monastery from acceding to the wishes of the worthy brethren. Under his habit, and secured in a small silver box, he had worn perpetually around his neck a lock of hair which the fathers avouched to be a relic. But the Avvocato del Diavolo, in combat (as was his official duty) the pretensions of the candidate for sanctity, made it at least equally probable that the supposed relic was taken from the head of a brother of the deceased Prior, who had been exacted for adherence to the Stewart family in 1744, and the motto, Haud obliuiscendum, seemed to utter a tone of mundane feeling and recollection of a journey, which made it at least doubtful whether, in the quiet and gloom of the cloister, Father had forgotten the sufferings and injuries of the House of Redgauntlet.

THE END OF REDGAUNTLET.

ALES OF THE CRUSADERS.

THE BETROTHED.

INTRODUCTION TO THE BETROTHED

Tales of the Crusades was determined upon as the latter following course of these novels, rather by the interest of friends whom death has now removed, and from their father's own taste. Not but that he was a steady and sagacious reader, which might be expected by the very name of the son, but he was conscious of the same value that might be seen of a character which it might be said he was a man of letters; and that by the moderns of the north reader might be induced to call upon him for something which he was not able to give, that might be said to be one of the authors to be feared, who would then stand in disrepute of the dwarf bringing with him a standard to his own stature, and showing that the standard was not a dwarf's own work was one.

The title of the noble Marriage is accordingly the same as that—it exists as a collection of German popular songs, entitled, Heinrichs Deutsche Volkslieder Berlin, 1859 published by Hermann Baerthel and Von der Hagen. The song is supposed to be extracted from a manuscript collection of Witten Thoman, chapters to St. Lawrence or Lawrence and dated 1558. The ballad which is popular in Germany is supposed to have been composed in the fifteenth century. The Noble Marriage a powerful hero of Germany about to set out on a pilgrimage to the land of St. Thomas, with the geography of which we are not much acquainted, wishes to take his last leave of his country and to do so in the most appropriate manner he sends him to keep watch over them till the seven years of his pilgrimage were accomplished. His chamberlain, an elderly and a cautious man, doubts the trust, observing, that seven days, instead of seven years, would be the shortest span to which he would consent to pledge himself for the fidelity of any woman. The answer of the Noble Marriage, confidently accepts the trust reposed by the chamberlain and the hero departs on his pilgrimage. The seven years are now elapsed, all night a noise day and night when, behold a vision appears as the noble pilgrim as he sleeps in the land of the strange

"He is a constant visitor," said Mr. Chaddock, "and the French," he was speaking the ingenious inventor of the great patent method at Gravening, where they put in raw hemp close to the red-hot coils of the roller, without the aid of spinning-machines, looms, shuttles, or water, endless variations. He had just constructed it by the aid

One of a piece of machinery to perform the work of the handloom, but when it was exhibited before his house the manufacturer, it had the inconvenience of heating the smoothing-iron red hot, excepting which the experiment was entirely satisfactory. He well became as rich as a Jew."

"Well," added Mr. O'Donoghue, "if the congress" —

"Pretty much the same as the Greek," muttered Sir Oldbuck, and then said aloud, "and if that eccentric genius has work enough in copying the Dutchman's list, what the devil has he to do here?"

"Why he is of opinion, that at the expense of a little inconvenience, some part of the labour of cultivating these people might be saved by the use of stumps."

There was a murmur of disapprobation at this proposal, and the words, "Beers up" and "Bread taken out of our mouths," and "They might as well construct a stupa, please," were whistled. And it was not without repeated calls to order, that the Prince obtained an opportunity of resuming his address.

—Order! —Order! Pray, support the chair! Here, here, here be quiet!"

"Accordingly, it is to be presumed, that the mathematical operations can only apply to those parts of the narrative which are of personal reminiscence and of contemporary events, such as the description of the house, the description of the harbor's position, the marine nature of some of the parts and the distribution of happiness at the time spoken of, the year 1819. The mathematical has nothing common to the parts which are not, but by placing the words and, between other words employed in these subjects, as a sort of instrument, the end of the Page of Lawin, and taking it from a sort of mathematical process as that by which we get a law, a law that these things may now and then, mathematical cannot find to occur, while the author, used of jumping has been known, may have an admirable relation in the use of the terms."

"I speak for information, Mr. Proun," said the Rev. Mr. Lawrence Templeton, "but I am inclined to suppose the late publication of Walldander to have been the work of Dunstons, and by the help of the steam-organ."

"For shame, Mr. Tompkinson," said the Prince, "show me good things as Walpole did. I assure you, had the writer known any thing about the country in which he lived the same."

"Or had he had the wit like some of ourselves, to lay the blame in such a remote or distant country that nobody should be able to reach your' head," said Mr. Oldbrook.

"Why, go to that," said the Prince, "you must consider the thing was got up for the German market, where folks are no better judges of Welsh manners than of Welsh crew."

"I make it my prayer that this he not found the fruit of our own self-seeking," said Dr. Drysdale, pointing to some books which lay on the table. "I fear the manner expressed in this course met the approbation of the people, and that I myself had been misled into that error."

He then said that Foxe's History had been passed the preliminary examinations pertinent to the work.

Wright' said Captain Claiborne, "by my word, it is heavy enough already."

"I'm sure that the French is the same then
 "That the French had even that he has paid nearly off."

"It is not for me to speak," said the worthy minister of St. John's, "but yet I must say, that having so long engaged upon the stage of Pittsburg, my work ought to have been brought out, humble though it be, before any other upon a similar intellectual level."

"You Stage Funnies!" said Mr. Oldbrook, with great contempt, "will you speak of your poetry prize-designs in my presence, where great Historical Poems, in twenty books, with notes in two columns, has been constructed of Grimm's Kalevala?"

The President, who appeared to suffer a great deal during this discussion, now spoke with dignity and determination. "Gentlemen," he said, "this sort of discussion is highly irregular. There is a question before you, and to that, gentlemen, I must confine your attention. Priority of publication let me remind you gentlemen, is always referred to the Committee of Criticism, whose determination on such subjects is without appeal. I declare I will leave the floor, if any more addresses ensue."

The character of this work is given with tolerable fairness in the next.

be introduced.—And now, gentlemen, that we are once more in order, I would wish to have some gentleman speak upon the question, whether, as associated to carry on a joint-stock trade in fictitious narrative, in prose and verse, we ought not to be incorporated by Act of Parliament? What say you, gentlemen, to the proposal? Vix unta fortior, is an old and true adage."

"Societas mater discordiarum, is a brocard as ancient and as veritable," said Oldbuck, who seemed determined, on this occasion, to be pleased with no proposal that was countenanced by the chair.

"Come, Monkbarrow," said the Preses, in his most coaxing manner, "you have studied the monastic institutions deeply, and know there must be a union of persons and talents to do any thing respectable, and attain a due ascendance over the spirit of the age. Tres faciunt collegium—it takes three monks to make a convent."

"And nine tailors to make a man," replied Oldbuck, not in the least softened in his opposition; "a quotation as much to the purpose as the other."

"Come, come," said the Preses, "you know the Prince of Orange said to Mr. Seymour, 'Without an association, we are a rope of sand.'"

"I know," replied Oldbuck, "it would have been as seemly that none of the old leaven had been displayed on this occasion, though you be the author of a Jacobite novel. I know nothing of the Prince of Orange after 1689; but I have heard a good deal of the immortal William the Third."

"And, to the best of my recollection," said Mr. Templeton, whispering Oldbuck, "it was Seymour made the remark to the Prince, not the Prince to Seymour. But this is a specimen of our friend's accuracy, poor gentleman: He trusts too much to his memory! of late years—failing fast, sir—breaking up."

"And breaking down too," said Mr. Oldbuck. "But what can you expect of a man too fond of his own hasty and flashy compositions, to take the assistance of men of reading and of solid parts?"

"No whispering—no caballing—no private business, gentlemen," said the unfortunate Preses,—who reminded us somewhat of a Highland drover, engaged in gathering and keeping in the straight road his excursive black cattle.

"I have not yet heard," he continued, "a single reasonable objection to applying for the Act of Parliament, of which the draught lies on the table. You must be aware that the extremes of rude and of civilized society are, in these our days, on the point of approaching to each other. In the patriarchal period, a man is his own weaver, tailor, butcher, shoemaker, and so forth; and, in the age of Stock-companies, as the present may be called, an individual may be said, in one sense, to exercise the same plurality of trades. In fact, a man who has dipped largely into these speculations, may combine his own expenditure with the improvement of his own income, just like the ingenious hydraulic machine, which, by its very waste, raises its own supplies of water. Such a person buys his bread from his own Baking Company, his milk and cheese from his own Dairy Company, takes off a new coat for the benefit of his own Clothing Company, illuminates his house to advance his own Gas Establishment, and drinks an additional bottle of wine for the benefit of the General Wine Importation Company, of which he is himself a member. Every act, which would otherwise be one of mere extravagance, is, to such a person, seasoned with the odor lucri, and reconciled to prudence. Even if the price of the article consumed be extravagant, and the quality indifferent, the person, who is in a manner his own customer, is only imposed upon for his own benefit. Nay, if the Joint-stock Company of Undertakers shall unite with the Medical Faculty, as proposed by the late facetious Doctor G——, under the firm of Death and the Doctor, the shareholder might contrive to secure to his heirs a handsome slice of his own death-bed and funeral expenses. In short, Stock-Companies are the fashion of the age, and an Incorporating Act will, I think, be particularly useful in bringing back the body, over whom I have the honour to preside, to a spirit of subordination, highly necessary to success in every enterprise where joint wisdom, talent, and labour, are to be employed. It is with regret that I state, that, besides several differences amongst yourselves, I have not myself, for some time, been treated with that deference among you which circumstances entitled me to expect."

"Hinc ille lachryma," muttered Mr. Oldbuck.

"But," continued the Chairman, "I see other gentlemen impatient to deliver their opinions, and I desire to stand in no man's way. I therefore—my place in this chair forbidding me to originate the motion—beg some gentleman may move a committee for revising the draught of the bill now upon the table, and which has been duly circulated among those having interest, and take the necessary measures to bring it before the House early next session."

There was a short murmur in the meeting, and at length Mr. Oldbuck again rose. "It seems, sir," he said, addressing the chair, "that no one present is willing to make the motion you point at. I am sorry no more qualified person has taken upon him to show any reasons in the contrair, and that it has fallen on me, as we Scotsmen say, to bell-the-cat with you: anent whilk phrase, Pitscottie hath a pleasant jest of the great Earl of Angus."

Here a gentleman whispered to the speaker, "Have a care of Pitscottie!" and Mr. Oldbuck, as if taking the hint, went on.

"But that's neither here nor there.—Well, gentlemen, to be short, I think it unnecessary to enter into the general reasonings whilk have this day been delivered, as I may say, ex cathedra; nor will I charge our worthy Preses with an attempt to obtain over us, per ambages, and under colour of an Act of Parliament, a despotic authority, inconsistent with our freedom:

But this I will say, that times are so much changed above stairs, that whereas last year you might have obtained an act incorporating a Stock Company for riddling ashes, you will not be able to procure one this year for gathering pearls. What signifies, then, wasting the time of the meeting, by inquiring whether or not we ought to go in at a door which we know to be bolted and barred in our face, and in the face of all the companies for fire or air, land or water, which we have of late seen blighted?"

Here there was a general clamour, seemingly of approbation in which the words might be distinguished, "Needles in the eye of it"—"Money thrown away"—"Lost before the committee &c. &c. &c." But above the tumult, the voices of two gentlemen, in different corners of the room, answered each other in a low and loud, like the blows of the two fleures on Saint Dunstons clock; and although the Chairman, in much agitation, strove to silence them, his interruption had only the effect of cutting their words up into syllables, thus,—

First Voice. "The Lord Chan!"

Second Voice. "The Lord Lau!"

Chairman, (loudly.) "Scandalum magnatum!"

First Voice. "The Lord Chancel!"

Second Voice. "The Lord Lauder!"

Chairman, (louder yet.) "Breach of Privilege!"

First Voice. "The Lord Chancellor!"

Second Voice. "My Lord Lauderdale!"

Chairman, (at the highest pitch of his voice.) "Called before the House!"

Both Voices together. "Will never consent to such a bill!"

A general assent seemed to follow this last proposition, which was propounded with as much emphasis as could be contrived by the united clappers of the whole meeting, joined to those of the voices already mentioned.

Several persons present seemed to consider the business of the meeting as ended, and were beginning to handle their hats and canes, with a view to departure, when the Chairman, who had thrown himself back in his chair with an air of much mortification and displeasure, again drew himself up, and commanded attention. All stopped, though some shrugged their shoulders, as if under the predominating influence of what was called a bore. But the tenor of his discourse soon excited serious attention.

"I perceive, gentlemen," he said, "that you are like young birds, who are impatient to leave their mothers:—take care your own pen-feathers are strong enough to support you; since, as for my part, I am tired of supporting on my back such a set of ungrateful gulls. But it signifies nothing saying—I will no longer avail myself of such weak assistance:—you—I will discard you—I will unbeget you, as Sir Arthur Absolute says—I will leave you and your whole household in trade—your caverns and your castles—your modern antiques and your antiquated moderns—your confusion of times, seasons, and circumstances—your properties, as player folk call them, your scenery and dresses—the whole of your exhausted expenditure to the fools who choose to deal with them. I will vindicate my own fame with my own right hand, without appealing to such halting assistants."

"Whom I have used for sport, rather than need."

—I will lay my foundations better than on quicksands—I will rear my structure of better materials than painted cards. In short, word, I will write HISTORY!"

There was a tumult of surprise, amid which our reporter detected the following expressions:—"The devil you will!"—"You, my dear sir, you?"—"The old gentleman forgets that he is the greatest liar since Sir John Mandeville."

"Not the worse historian for that," said Oldbuck, "see history, you know, is half fiction."

"I'll answer for that half being forthcoming," said the first speaker; "but for the scantling of truth which is necessary after all, Lord help us!—Geoffrey of Monmouth will be lost Clarendon to him."

As the confusion began to abate, more than one member of the meeting was seen to touch his forehead significantly, when Captain Clutterbuck humm'd,

Be by your friends advised,
T'oo rash, too hasty, dad,
Maugre your bolts and wise head,
The world will think you mad.

"The world, and you, gentlemen, may think what you please," said the Chairman, elevating his voice; "but I mean to write the most wonderful book which the world ever saw—a book in which every incident shall be incredible, yet as true—a work recalling recollections with which the various generation once tingled, and which shall be read by each with an admiration approaching to incredulity. Such shall be the life of NAPOLEON BONAPARTE, by the ARTIST of VERLEY!"

In the general start and exclamation which followed the announcement, Mr. Oldbuck dropped his snuff-box: and the French rapier, which dispersed itself in consequence, had effect upon the nasal organs of our reporter, ensconced as he was under the secretary's table, which occasioned his being discovered and extruded in the illiberal and unhandsome manner we have mentioned, with threats of farther damage to his ears, and other portions of his body, on the part especially of Captain Clutterbuck. Undismayed by these threats, which indeed those of his profession are accustomed to hold at naught, our young man hovered about the door of the tavern, but could only bring us the farther intelligence, that the meeting was broken up in about a quarter of an hour after his exposure "in much-admired disorder."

TALES OF THE CRUSADERS.

TALE I. THE BETROTHED.

CHAPTER I.

These days were hotly won upon the Marches of Llewelyn's Shire.

Chronicles, from which this narrative is examined, that during the long period when Welsh princes maintained their independence, 1187 was peculiarly marked as favourable to eternity them and their warlike neighbours, de Marchese, who inhabited those formidable in the frontiers of the ancient British, on the which the traveller gazes with wonder. This time when Baldwin, Archbishop of Canterbury, accompanied by the learned Giraldus de Barri, Bishop of Saint David's, preached the from castle to castle, from town to town;
ed the utmost valleys of his native Cambria call to arms for recovery of the Holy Sepulchre, while he deprecated the feuds and wars of men against each other, held out to the spirit of the age a general object of ambition, one of adventure, where the favour of Heaven, as of earthly renown, was to reward the valiant champions.

To British chieftains, among the thousands his spirit-stirring summons called from their end to a distant and perilous expedition, had the best excuse for declining the summons.
rior skill of the Anglo-Norman knights, re engaged in constant inroads on the Welsh and who were frequently detaching from it raids, which they fortified with castles, thus good what they had won, was avenged, but not compensated, by the furious inroads ritish, who, like the billows of a retiring tide, s successively, with noise, fury, and devastation, on each retreat, yielded ground incessantly invaders.

In among the native princes might have operated a strong and permanent barrier to the encroachment of the strangers; but they were, unhappily, as discord among themselves as they were with the Normans, and were constantly engaged in private wars with each other, of which the common enemy had the sole advantage.

Invitation to the Crusade promised something of novelty to a nation peculiarly ardent in war; and it was accepted by many, regardless of the consequences which must ensue to the which they left defenceless. Even the most deadly enemies of the Saxon and Norman race forgot their enmity against the invaders of their land to enrol themselves under the banners of the nobles, who, under various pretexts, and sometimes concerning all other save the open avowal of superior force, had severed and appropriated large portions of that once extensive and independent principality, which, when Wales was unhappily divided into three parts on the death of Roderick Mawr, fell to the lot of his youngest son, Mervyn. The undaunted resolution and stubborn ferocity of Gwenwyn, descendant of that prince, had long made him beloved among the "Tall men," or Champions of Wales; and he was enabled, more by the number of those who served under him, attracted by his reputation, than by the natural strength of his dilapidated principality, to retaliate the encroachments of the English by the most wasteful inroads.

Yet even Gwenwyn on the present occasion seemed to forget his deeply sworn hatred against his dangerous neighbours. The Torch of Pengwern (for so Gwenwyn was called, from his frequently laying the province of Shrewsbury in conflagration) seemed at present to burn as calmly as a taper in the bower of a lady; and the Wolf of Plinlimmon, another name with which the bards had graced Gwenwyn, now slumbered as peacefully as the shepherd's dog on the domestic hearth.

But it was not alone the eloquence of Baldwin or of Girald which had lulled into peace a spirit so restless and fierce. It is true, their exhortations had done more towards it than Gwenwyn's followers had thought possible. The Archbishop had induced the British Chief to break bread, and to mingle in salvan sports, with his nearest, and hitherto one of his most determined enemies, the old Norman warrior Sir Raymond Berenger, who, sometimes beaten, sometimes victorious, but never subdued, had, in spite of Gwenwyn's hottest incursions, maintained his Castle of Garde Doloureuse, upon the marches of Wales; a place strong by nature, and well fortified by art, which the Welsh prince had found it impossible to conquer, either by open force or by stratagem, and which, remaining with a strong garrison in his rear, often checked his incursions by rendering his retreat precarious.

On this account, Gwenwyn of Powys-Land had a hundred times avowed the death of Raymond Berenger, and the demolition of his castle; but the policy of the sagacious old warrior, and his long experience in all warlike practice, were such as, with the aid of his more powerful countrymen, enabled him to defy the attempts of his fiery neighbour. If there was a man, therefore, throughout England, whom Gwen-wyn hated more than another, it was Raymond Berenger; and yet the good Archbishop Baldwin could prevail on the Welsh prince to meet him as a friend and ally in the cause of the Cross. He even invited Raymond to the autumn festivities of his Welsh palace, where the old knight, in all honourable courtesy, feasted and hunted for more than a week in the domains of his hereditary foe.

But these were reckoned Gwenwyn, (or more Gwenwynwen, though we retain the briefer form,) a British prince who continued exercising his sovereign authority over such parts of Powysland as had not been subjugated by the Mortimers, the Llewellyns, FitzAlans, and other Norman

To requite this hospitality, Raymond invited the Prince of Powys, with a chosen but limited train, during the ensuing Christmas, to the Garde Doloureuse, which some antiquaries have endeavoured to identify with the Castle of Colone, on the river of the same name. But the length of time, and some geographical difficulties, throw doubts upon this ingenious conjecture.

As the Welshman crossed the drawbridge, he was observed by his faithful bard to shudder with involuntary emotion; nor did Cadwallon, experienced as he was in life, and well acquainted with the character of his master, make any doubt that he was at that moment strongly urged by the apparent opportunity, to seize upon the strong fortress which had been so long the object of his cupidity, even at the expense of violating his good faith.

Dreading lest the struggle of his master's conscience and his ambition should terminate unfavourably for his fame, the bard arrested his attention by whispering in their native language, that "the teeth which bite hardest are those which are out of sight;" and Gwenwyn, looking around him, became aware that, though only unarmed squires and pages appeared in the court-yard, yet the towers, and battlements connecting them were garnished with archers and men-at-arms.

They proceeded to the banquet, at which Gwenwyn, for the first time, beheld Eveline Berenger, the sole child of the Norman castellan, the inheritor of his domains and of his supposed wealth, aged only sixteen, and the most beautiful damsel upon the Welsh marches. Many a spear had already been shivered in maintenance of her charms; and the gallant Hugo de Lacy, Constable of Chester, one of the most redoubted warriors of the time, had laid at Eveline's feet the prize which his chivalry had gained in a great tournament held near that ancient town. Gwenwyn considered these triumphs as so many additional recommendations to Eveline; her beauty was incontestable, and she was heiress of the fortress which he so much longed to possess, and which he began now to think might be acquired by means more smooth than those with which he was in the use of working out his will.

Again, the hatred which subsisted between the British and their Saxon and Norman invaders; his long and ill-extinguished feud with this very Raymond Berenger; a general recollection that alliances between the Welsh and English had rarely been happy; and a consciousness that the measure which he meditated would be unpopular among his followers, and appear a dereliction of the systematic principles on which he had hitherto acted, restrained him from speaking his wishes to Raymond or his daughter. The idea of the rejection of his suit did not for a moment occur to him; he was convinced he had but to speak his wishes, and that the daughter of a Norman castellan, whose rank or power were not of the highest order among the nobles of the frontiers, must be delighted and honoured by a proposal for allying his family with that of the sovereign of a hundred mountains.

There was indeed another objection, which in later times would have been of considerable weight—Gwenwyn was already married. But Brengwain was a childless bride; sovereigns (and among sovereigns the Welsh prince ranked himself) marry for lineage, and the Pope was not likely to be scrupulous, where the question was to oblige a prince who had assumed the Cross with such ready zeal, even although, in fact, his thoughts had been much more on the Garde Doloureuse than on Jerusalem. In the mean while, if Raymond Berenger (as was suspected) was not liberal enough in his opinions to permit Eveline to hold the temporary rank of concubine, which the manners of Wales warranted Gwenwyn to offer as an interim arrangement, he had only to wait for a few months, and sue for a divorce through the Bishop of Saint David's, or some other intercessor at the Court of Rome.

Agitating these thoughts in his mind, Gwenwyn prolonged his residence at the Castle of Berenger, from Christmas till Twelfth-day; and endured the presence of the Norman cavaliers who resorted to Raymond's festal halls, although, regarding themselves, in virtue of their rank of knighthood, equal to the most potent sovereigns, they made small account of the long descent of the Welsh prince, who, in their eyes, was but the chief of a semi-barbarous province; while he, on his part, considered them little better than a sort of privileged robbers, and with the utmost difficulty restrained himself from manifesting his open hatred, when he beheld them careering in the exercises of chivalry, the habitual use of which rendered them such formidable enemies to his country. At length, the term of feasting was ended, and knight and squire departed from the castle, which once more assumed the aspect of a solitary and guarded frontier-fort.

But the Prince of Powys-Land, while pursuing his sports on his own mountains and valleys, found that even the abundance of the game, as well as his release from the society of the Norman chivalry, who affected to treat him as an equal, profited him nothing, so long as the light and beautiful form of Eveline, on her white palfrey, was banished from the train of sportsmen. In short, he hesitated no longer, but took into his confidence his chaplain, an able and sagacious man, whose pride was flattered by his patron's communication, and who, besides, saw in the proposed scheme some contingent advantages for himself and his order. By his counsel, the proceedings for Gwenwyn's divorce were prosecuted under favourable auspices, and the unfortunate Brengwain was removed to a nunnery, which perhaps she found a more cheerful habitation than the lonely retreat which she had led a neglected life, ever since Gwenwyn had despaired of her bed being blessed with issue. Father Einion also dealt with the chiefs and elders of the land, and represented to them the advantage which in future wars they were certain to obtain by the possession of the Garde Doloureuse, which for more than a century covered and protected a considerable tract of country, rendered their advance difficult, and their retreat perilous, and, in a word, prevented their carrying their incursions as far as the gates of Shrewsbury. As for the union with the Saxon damsel, the fetters which it was to form might not (the good father hinted) be found more pernicious than those which had bound Gwenwyn to her predecessor, Brengwain.

These arguments, mingled with others adapted to the views and wishes of different individuals, were so prevailing, that the chaplain in the course of a few weeks was able to report to his princely patron that his proposed match would meet with no opposition from the elders and nobles of his dominions. A golden bracelet, six ounces in weight, was the instant reward of the priest's dexterity in negotiation, and he was appointed by Gwenwyn to commit to paper those proposals, which he doubted not were to throw the Castle of Garde Doloureuse, notwithstanding its melancholy name, into an ecstasy of joy. With some difficulty the chaplain prevailed on his patron to say nothing in this letter upon his temporary plan of concubinage, which he wisely judged might be considered as an affront both by Eveline and her father. The matter of the divorce he represented as almost entirely settled, and wound up his letter with a moral application, in which were many allusions to Vasilis, Esther, and Ahasuerus.

Having despatched this letter by a swift and trusty messenger, the British prince opened in all solemnity the feast of Easter, which had come round during the course of these external and internal negotiations.

Upon the approaching Holy-tide, to propitiate the minds of his subjects and vassals, they were invited in large numbers to partake a princely festival at Castell-Coch, or the Red Castle, as it was then called, since better known by the name of Powys-Castle, and in latter times the princely seat of the Duke of Beaufort. The architectural magnificence of this noble residence is of a much later period than that of Gwenwyn, whose palace, at the time we speak of, was a long, low-roofed edifice of red stone, whence the castle derived its name; while a ditch and gabiate were, in addition to the commanding situation, its most important defences.

and much influence with their countrymen. Their power over the public mind even revealed that of the princes themselves, in whom indeed they bore some resemblance, for they never wore arms, were initiated into their order by secret and mystic solemnities, and homage was rendered to their Awen, or flow of poetic inspiration, as if it had been indeed marked with a divine character. Thus possessed of power and consequence, the bards were not unwilling to exercise their privileges, and sometimes, in doing so, their manners frequently assumed an air of caprice.

This was perhaps the case with Cadwallon, the chief bard of Gwenwyn, and who, as such, was expected to have poured forth the tale of song in the banqueting hall of his prince. But neither the anxious and breathless expectation of the assembled chiefs and champions—nor the dead silence which greeted the ringing hall when his harp was reverently placed before him by his attendant, nor even the entreaties or exhortations of the prince himself, could extract from him admission more than a short and interrupted prelude upon the instrument, the notes of which arranged themselves into an air mysteriously mournful, and died away in silence. The Prince frowned darkly on the bard, who was himself far too deeply lost in gloomy thought, to offer any apology or even to observe his displeasure. Again he touched a few wild notes, and raising his looks upward, seemed to be on the very point of bursting forth into a tide of song similar to those with which this master of his art was wont to enchant his hearers. But the effort was in vain—he declared that his right hand was withered, and pushed the instrument from him.

A murmur went round the company, and Gwenwyn read in their aspects that they received the unusual silence of Cadwallon on this high occasion as a bad omen. He called hastily on a young and ambitious bard, named Iarlod of Menwygant, whose rising fame was like a sun to vie with the established reputation of Cadwallon, and summoned him to say something which might command the applause of his sovereign and the gratitude of the company. The young man was ambitious, and understood the art of a courtier. He commenced a poem, in which, although under a feigned name, he drew such a partial picture of Eudine Berenger, that Gwenwyn was enraptured, and while all who had seen the beautiful, original at once recognised the resemblance, the eyes of the Prince confessed at once his passion for the subject, and his admiration of the poet. The figures of Celtic poetry, in themselves highly imaginative, were scarce sufficient for the enthusiasm of the ambitious bard, rising in his tone as he perceived the feelings which he was exciting. The praises of the Prince mingled with those of the Norman beauty, and, as a lion, said the poet, "can only be led by the hand of a chaste and beautiful maiden, so a chief can only acknowledge the empire of the most virtuous, the most lovely of her sex. Who asks of the moon-day sun, in what quarter of the world he was born? and who shall ask of such charms as hers, to what country they owe their birth?"

Enthusiasm in pleasure as in war, and possessed of imaginations which answered readily to the suggestions of their poets, the Welsh chiefs and leaders joined in acclamations of applause; and the song of the bard went further to render popular the intended alliance of the Prince than had all the grove arguments of his private procurer in the same topic.

Gwenwyn, himself, in a transport of delight, tore off the golden bracelets which he wore, to bestow them upon a bard whose song had produced an effect so desirable, and cast, as he looked at the silent and sullen Cadwallon, "The silent harp was never strung with golden wires."

"Prince," answered the bard, whose pride was at least equal to that of Gwenwyn himself, "you pervert the proverb of Taliesin: it is the fastidious harp which never lacked golden strings."

Gwenwyn, turning sternly towards him, was about to make an angry answer, when the sudden appearance of Jorwath, the messenger whom he had dispatched to Raymond Berenger, arrested his purpose.

The rude envoy entered the hall bareheaded, carrying the sandals of goat-skin which he wore, and having on his shoulder a cloak of the same, and a short javelin in his hand. The dust on his garments and the frown on his brow, showed with what haste and his attend had been executed. Gwenwyn demanded of him eagerly, "What news from Guy Doloureuse Jorwath ap Jevan?"

"I bear them on my bosom," said the son of Jevan; and, with much reverence, he delivered to the Prince a packet, bound with oak, and sealed with the impression of a swan, the ancient emblem of the House of Berenger. Himself ignorant of foreign reading, Gwenwyn, in anxious haste, delivered the letter to Cadwallon, who usually acted as secretary when the chaplain was not in presence, as custom then was to be the case. Cadwallon, looking at the letter, and briefly, "I read no Latin. I'll send to Norman, who writes to a Prince of France a different language than that of Britain; and will wait here when that noble tongue shall be spoken to Twynadog to Carleol!"

Gwenwyn only replied to him with an angry glance.

"Where is Father Eamon?" said the upstart Prince.

"He sleeps in the church," replied one of his attendants, "for it is the feast of Saint"—

"Were it the feast of Saint David," said Gwenwyn, "and were the pyx between his hands, he cannot bother me instantly?"

One of the chief householders sprang off, to command his attendance, and, in the mean time, Gwenwyn eyed the letter containing the report of battle, but which it required an interpreter to read, with such eagerness and anxiety, that, as he turned over his former success, there in a few minutes, it was possible the tenor of his patron's thoughts were the interval. A light and lively air, which seemed to breathe, like the subtlest vents of an infirm, leading to interrupt his meditations, introduced a stanza or two apposite to the subject.

"And what though then, O Carleol," he said, interrupting the letter which lay on the table, "his master 'dust speak with the tongue of a stranger! Hath not the cuckoo a hard song, as yet she tells us of green buds and springing buds? What if thy language be that of the cuckoo, it is not the same which buds hearts and buds lips at the altar! And what though thou dost a render up thy treasures, are not all pleasures sweet when enhanced by expectation? What is the chase, if the deer dropped at our feet the moment he started from the cover—or what value were in the love of the maiden, were it yielded with any delay?"

The song of the bard was here broken short by entrance of the priest, who, hasty to obey the summons of his impatient master, had not time to say good-even, the stole, which he had worn a long while, and many of the clerics thought a magnificent vestment, that, so habited, a priest should appear in a lordly assembly, and stand profane ground.

The priest, perceiving the letter of the Norman lord, and struck with surprise at the contents, laid it open in silence.

"Read it!" exclaimed the fierce Gwenwyn. "The prince you," replied the more prudent chaplain, "a smiling company were a finer custom."

"Read it aloud!" repeated the Prince, in a higher tone. "There are none here who respect the honour of their prince, or who deserve to be confided. Read it, I say, aloud! and by Saint David, if Raymond the Norman hath dared—"

He stopped short, and, reclining on his arm, appeared himself to be outside of attention, but easy for his followers to fill up the breach in exclamation which prudence had recommended.

The voice of the chaplain was low and solemn as he read the following epistle:—

"Raymond Berenger, the noble Norman Knight, Marshal of the Cleric Doloureuse, to Gwenwyn."

Prince of Powys, (May peace be between them!) sendeth health.

"Your letter, craving the hand of our daughter Eveline Berenger, was safely delivered to us by your servant, Jorworth ap Jevan, and we thank you heartily for the good meaning therein expressed to us and to ours. But, considering within ourselves the difference of blood and lineage, with the impediments and causes of offence which have often arisen in the like cases, we hold it fitter to match our daughter among our own people; and this by no case in disparagement of you, but solely for the weal of you, of ourselves, and of our mutual dependants, who will be the more safe from the risk of quarrel betwixt us, that we essay not to draw the bonds of our intimacy more close than becometh. The sheep and the goats feed together in peace on the same pastures, but they mingle not in blood, or race, the one with the other. Moreover, our daughter Eveline hath been sought in marriage by a noble and potent Lord of the Marches, Hugo de Lacy, the Constable of Chester, to which most honourable suit we have returned a favourable answer. It is therefore impossible that we should in this matter grant to you the boon you seek; nevertheless, you shall at all times find us, in other matters, willing to pleasure you; and herunto we call God, and Our Lady, and Saint Mary Magdalene of Quatford, to witness; to whose keeping we heartily recommend you.

"Written by our command, at our castle of Garde Doloureuse, within the Marches of Wales, by a reverend Priest, Father Aldrovand, a black monk of the house of Wenlock; and to which we have appended our seal, upon the eve of the blessed martyr Saint Alphegius, to whom be honour and glory!"

The voice of Father Einion faltered, and the scroll which he held in his hand trembled in his grasp, as he arrived at the conclusion of this epistle; for well he knew that insults more slight than Gwenwyn would hold the least word it contained, were sure to put every drop of his British blood into the most vehement commotion. Nor did it fail to do so. The Prince had gradually drawn himself up from the posture of repose in which he had prepared to listen to the epistle; and when it concluded, he sprung on his feet like a startled lion, spurning from him as he rose, the foot-bearer, who rolled at some distance on the floor. "Priest," he said, "hast thou read that accursed scroll fairly? for if thou hast added, or diminished one word, or one letter, I will have thine eyes so handled, that thou shalt never read letter more!"

The monk replied, trembling, (for he was well aware that the sacerdotal character was not uniformly respected among the irascible Welshmen,) "By the oath of my order, mighty prince, I have read word for word, and letter for letter."

There was a momentary pause, while the fury of Gwenwyn at this unexpected affront, offered to him in the presence of all his Uchelwyr, (i. e. noble chiefs, literally men of high stature) seemed too big for utterance, when the silence was broken by a few notes from the hitherto mute harp of Cadwallon. The Prince looked round at first with displeasure at the interruption, for he was himself about to speak; but when he beheld the bard bending over his harp with an air of inspiration, and blending together, with unexampled skill, the wildest and most exalted tones of his art, he himself became an auditor instead of a speaker, and Cadwallon, not the Prince seemed to become the central point of the assembly, on whom all eyes were bent, and to whom each ear was turned with breathless eagerness, as if his strains were the responses of an oracle.

"We wed not with the stranger,"—thus burst the song from the lips of the poet. "Vortigern wedded with the stranger; thence came the first wo upon Britain and a sword upon her nobles, and a thunderbolt upon her palace. We wed not with the enslaved Saxon—the free and princely stag seeks not for his bride the heifer whose neck the yoke hath worn. We wed not with the rapacious Norman—the noble hound scorns to seek a mate from the herd of ravening wolves. When was it heard that the Cymry, the descendants of Brute, the true children of the soil of fair Britain, were plundered, oppressed, bereft of their birthright, and insulted even in their last retreats?—when but since they stretched their hand in friendship to the stranger, and clasped to their bosoms the daughter of the Saxon? Which of the two is feared?—the empty water-course of summer, or the channel of the headlong winter torrent?—A maiden smiles at the summer-shrunk brook while she crosses it, but a barbed horse and his rider will fear to stem the wintry flood. Men of Mathravel and Powys, be the dreaded flood of winter—Gwenwyn son of Cyverliock!—may thy plume be the topmost of its waves!"

All thoughts of peace, thoughts which in themselves were foreign to the hearts of the warlike British, passed before the song of Cadwallon like dust before the whirlwind, and the unanimous shout of the assembly declared for instant war. The Prince himself spoke not, but, looking proudly around him, flung abroad his arm, as one who cheers his followers to the attack.

The priest, had he dared, might have reminded Gwenwyn, that the Cross which he had assumed on his shoulder, had consecrated his arm to the Holy War, and precluded his engaging in any civil strife. But the task was too dangerous for Father Einion's courage, and he shrunk from the hall to the seclusion of his own convent. Caradoc, whose brief hour of popularity was past, also retired, with humbled and dejected looks, and not without a glance of indignation at his triumphant rival, who had so judiciously reserved his display of art for the theme of war, that was ever most popular with the audience.

The chiefs resumed their seats no longer for the purpose of festivity, but to fix, in the hasty manner customary among these prompt warriors, where they were to assemble their forces, which, upon such occasions, comprehended almost all the able-bodied males of the country,—for all, excepting the priests and the bards, were soldiers,—and to settle the order of their descent upon the devoted marches, where they proposed to signalize, by general ravage, their sense of the insult which their Prince had received, by the rejection of his suit.

CHAPTER III.

The sands are number'd, that make up my life;
Here must I stay, and here my life must end.

Henry VI., Act I., Scene IV.

WHEN Raymond Berenger had despatched his mission to the Prince of Powys, he was not unsuspicious, though altogether fearless, of the result. He sent messengers to the several dependants who held their fiefs by the tenure of cornage, and warned them to be on the alert, that he might receive instant notice of the approach of the enemy. These vassals, as is well known, occupied the numerous towers, which, like so many falcon-nests, had been built on the points most convenient to defend the frontiers, and were bound to give signal of any incursion of the Welsh, by blowing their horns; which sounds, answered from tower to tower, and from station to station gave the alarm for general defence. But although Raymond considered these precautions as necessary, from the fickle and precarious temper of his neighbours, and for maintaining his own credit as a soldier, he was far from believing the danger to be imminent; for the preparations of the Welsh, though on a much more extensive scale than had lately been usual, were as secret, as their resolution of war had been suddenly adopted.

It was upon the second morning after the memorable festival of Castell-Coch, that the tempest broke on the Norman frontier. At first a single, long, and keen bugle-blast, announced the approach of the enemy; presently the signals of alarm were echoed from every castle and tower on the borders of Shropshire, where every place of habitation was then a fortress. Beacons were lighted upon crags and eminences, the bells were rung backward in the churches and towns, while the general and earnest summons to arms announced an extremity of danger which even the inhabitants of that unsettled country had not hitherto experienced.

Amid this general alarm, Raymond Berenger, having busied himself in arranging his few but gallant followers and adherents, and taken such modes of procuring intelligence of the enemy's strength and motions as were in his power, at length ascended the watch-tower of the castle to observe in person the country around, already obscured in several places by the clouds of smoke, which announced the progress and the ravages of the invaders. He was speedily joined by his favourite squire, to whom the unusual heaviness of his master's looks was cause of much surprise, for till now they had ever been blithest at the hour of battle. The squire held in his hand his master's helmet, for Sir Raymond was all armed, saving the head.

"Dennis Morolt," said the veteran soldier, "are our vassals and liegemen all mustered?"

"All, noble sir, but the Flemings, who are not yet come in."

"The lazy hounds, why tarry they?" said Raymond. "Ill policy it is to plant such sluggish natures in our borders. They are like their own steers, fitter to tug a plough than for aught that requires mettle."

"With your favour," said Dennis, "the knaves can do good service notwithstanding. That Wilkin Flammock of the Green can strike like the hammers of his own fulling-mill."

"He will fight, I believe, when he cannot help it," said Raymond; "but he has no stomach for such exercise, and is as slow and as stubborn as a mule."

"And therefore are his countrymen rightly matched against the Welsh," replied Dennis Morolt, "that their solid and unyielding temper may be a fit foil to the fiery and headlong dispositions of our dangerous neighbours, just as restless waves are best opposed by steadfast rocks.—Hark, sir, I hear Wilkin Flammock's step ascending the turret-stair, as deliberately as ever monk mounted to matins."

Step by step the heavy sound approached, until the form of the huge and substantial Fleming at length issued from the turret-door to the platform where they were conversing. Wilkin Flammock was cased in bright armour, of unusual weight and thickness, and cleaned with exceeding care, which marked the neatness of his nation; but, contrary to the custom of the Normans, entirely plain, and void of carving, gilding, or any sort of ornament. The basenet, or steel-cap, had no visor, and left exposed a broad countenance, with heavy and unpliant features, which announced the character of his temper and understanding. He carried in his hand a heavy mace.

"So, Sir Fleming," said the Castellane, "you are in no hurry, methinks, to repair to the rendezvous."

"So please you," answered the Fleming, "we were compelled to tarry, that we might load our wains with our bales of cloth and other property."

"Ha! wains?—how many wains have you brought with you?"

"Six, noble sir," replied Wilkin.

"And how many men?" demanded Raymond Berenger.

"Twelve, valiant sir," answered Flammock.

"Only two men to each baggage-wain? I wonder you would thus encumber yourself," said Berenger.

"Under your favour, sir, once more," replied Wilkin, "it is only the value which I and my comrades set upon our goods, that inclines us to defend them with our bodies; and, had we been obliged to leave our cloth to the plundering clutches of yonder vagabonds, I should have seen small policy in stopping here to give them the opportunity of adding murder to robbery. Gloucester should have been my first halting-place."

The Norman knight gazed on the Flemish artisan, for such was Wilkin Flammock, with such a mixture of surprise and contempt, as excluded indignation. "I have heard much," he said, "but this is the first time that I have heard one with a beard on his lip avouch himself a coward."

"Nor do you hear it now," answered Flammock, with the utmost composure—"I am always ready to fight for life and property; and my coming to this country, where they are both in constant danger, shows that I care not much how often I do so. But a sound skin is better than a slashed one, for all that."

"Well," said Raymond Berenger, "fight after thine own fashion, so thou wilt but fight stoutly with that long body of thine. We are like to have need for all that we can do.—Saw you aught of these rascally Welsh?—have they Gwenwyn's banner amongst them?"

"I saw it with the white dragon displayed," replied Wilkin; "I could not but know it, since it was brooded in my own loom."

Raymond looked so grave upon this intelligence that Dennis Morolt, unwilling the Fleming should mark it, thought it necessary to withdraw his attention. "I can tell thee," he said to Flammock, "that when the Constable of Chester joins us with his lances, you shall see your handiwork, the dragon fly faster homeward than ever flew the shuttle which wove it."

"It must fly before the Constable comes up, Dennis Morolt," said Berenger, "else it will fly triumphantly over all our bodies."

"In the name of God and the Holy Virgin," said Dennis, "what may you mean, Sir Knight?—not that we should fight with the Welsh before the Constable joins us?"—He paused, and then, well understanding the firm, yet melancholy glance, with which his master answered the question, he proceeded with more vehement earnestness—"You cannot mean it—you cannot intend that we shall quit this castle, and we have so often made good against them, and contend in the field with two hundred men against thousands?—Think better of it my beloved master, and let not the rashness of your old age blemish that character for wisdom and warlike skill, which your former life has so nobly won."

"I am not angry with you for blaming my purpose," answered the Norman, "for I know you do it in love to me and mine. But, Dennis Morolt, this thing must be—we must fight the Welshmen within these three hours, or the name of Raymond Berenger must be blotted from the genealogy of his house."

"And so we will—we will fight them, my noble master," said the esquire; "fear not cold courage from Dennis Morolt, where battle is the theme. But we will fight them under the walls of the castle, with honest Wilkin Flammock and his cross-bows on the wall to protect our flanks, and afford us some balance against the numerous odds."

"Not so, Dennis," answered his master—"in the open field we must fight them, or thy master must rank but as a mansworn knight. Know, that when I feasted yonder wily savage in my halls at Christmas, and when the wine was flowing fastest around, Gwenwyn threw out some praises of the fastness and strength of my castle, in a manner which intimated it was these advantages alone that had secured me in former wars from defeat and captivity. I spoke in answer, when I had far better been silent; for what availed my idle boast, but as a fetter to bind me to a deed next to madness? If, I said, a prince of the Cymry shall again come in hostile fashion before the Garde Doloureuse, let him pitch his standard down in yonder plain by the bridge, and, by the word of a good knight, and the faith of a Christian man, Raymond Berenger will meet him as willingly, be he many or be he few, as ever Welshman was met withal."

Dennis was struck speechless when he heard of a promise so rash, so fatal; but his was not the casistry which could release his master from the fetters with which his unwary confidence had bound him. It was otherwise with Wilkin Flammock. He stared—he almost laughed, notwithstanding the reverence due to the Castellane, and his own insensibility to risible emotions. "And is this all?" he said. "If your honour had pledged yourself to pay one hundred florins to a Jew or to a Lombard, no doubt you must have kept the day, or forfeited your pledge; but surely one day is as good as another to keep a promise for fighting, and that day is best in which the promise is strongest. But indeed, after all, what signifies any promise over a wine flagon?"

To Heaven's keeping I commit thee, honest Fleming.—Follow me, Dennis Morolt."

The old Castellane descended the stair of the southern tower hastily, just as his daughter Eveline ascended that of the eastern turret, to throw herself at his feet once more. She was followed by the Father Aldrovand, chaplain of her father; by an old and almost inviolated huntsman, whose more active services in the field and the chase had been for some time chiefly limited to the superintendence of the Knight's kennels, and the charge especially of his more favourite hounds; and by Rose Flammock, the daughter of Wilkin, a blue-eyed Flemish maiden, round, plump, and shy as a partridge, who had been for some time permitted to keep company with the high-born Norman dame, in a doubtful station, betwixt that of an humble friend and superior domestic.

Eveline rushed upon the battlements, her hair dishevelled, and her eyes drowned in tears, and eagerly demanded of the Fleming where her father was.

Flammock made a clumsy reverence, and attempted some answer; but his voice seemed to fail him. He turned his back upon Eveline without ceremony, and, totally disregarding the anxious inquiries of the huntsman and the chaplain, he said hastily to his daughter, in his own language, "Mad work! mad work! look to the poor maiden, Roschen—Der alter Herr ist verrückt!"

Without farther speech, he descended the stairs, and never paused till he reached the buttery. Here he called like a lion for the controller of these regions, by the various names of Kainmeter, Keller-master, and so forth, to which the old Reinold, an ancient Norman squire, answered not, until the Netherlander fortunately recollected his Anglo-Norman title of butler. This, his regular name of office, was the key to the buttery hatch, and the old man instantly appeared, with his gray cassock and high rolled hose, a ponderous bunch of keys suspended by a silver chain to his broad leathern girdle, which, in consideration of the emergency of the time, he had thought it right to balance on the left side with a huge falchion, which seemed much too weighty for his old arm to wield.

"What is your will," he said, "Master Flammock? or what are your commands, since it is my lord's pleasure that they shall be laws to me for a time?"

"Only a cup of wine, good Meister Keller-master—butler, I mean."

"I am glad you remember the name of mine office," said Reinold, with some of the petty resentment of a spoiled domestic, who thinks that a stranger has been irregularly put in command over him.

"A flagon of Rhenish, if you love me," answered the Fleming, "for my heart is low and poor within me, and I must needs drink the best."

"And drink you shall," said Reinold, "if drink will give you the courage which perhaps you may want."—He descended to the secret crypts, of which he was the guardian, and returned with a silver flagon, which might contain about a quart. "Here is such wine," said Reinold, "as thou hast seldom tasted," and was about to pour it into a cup.

"Nay, the flagon," the flagon, friend Reinold; I love a deep and solemn draught when the business is weighty," said Wilkin. He seized on the flagon accordingly, and drinking a preparatory mouthful, paused as if to estimate the strength and flavour of the generous liquor. Apparently he was pleased with both, for he nodded in approbation to the butler; and, raising the flagon to his mouth once more, he slowly and gradually brought the bottom of the vessel parallel with the roof of the apartment, without suffering one drop of the contents to escape him.

"That hath savour, Herr Keller-master," said he, while he was recovering his breath by intervals, after so long a suspense of respiration; "but, may heaven forgive you for thinking it the best I have ever tasted! You little know the cellars of Ghent and Ypres."

"And I care not for them," said Reinold; "of gentle Norman blood hold the wines of Gascony and France, generous, light, and cordial, worth the acid potations of the Rhine and the Neckar."

"All is matter of taste," said the Fleming; "hark ye—Is there much of this wine in the cellar?"

"Methought but now it pleased not your palate?" said Reinold.

"Nay, nay, my friend," said Wilkin, "I said it savour—I may have drunk better—but this is good, where better may not be had.—Again, I much of it hast thou?"

"The whole butt, man," answered the butler; have broached a fresh piece for you."

"Good," replied Flammock; "get the quart-Christian measure; heave the cask up into the buttery, and let each soldier of this castle be with such a cup as I have here swallowed. It hath done me much good—my heart was sad when I saw the black smoke arising from those fulling-mills yonder. Let each man, I say, his full quart-pot—man defend not castles on liquor."

"I must do as you will, good Wilkin Flammock," said the butler; "but I pray remember all are not alike. That which will but warm your Flemish hearts, will put wildfire into Norman brains; what may only encourage your countrymen to the walls, will make ours fly over the battlements."

"Well, you know the conditions of your own trymen best; serve out to them what wine and ale you list—only let each Fleming have a full quart of Rhenish.—But what will you do for the English churls, of whom there are a right many left us?"

The old butler paused, and rubbed his brow. "There will be a strange waste of liquor," he said, "and yet I may not deny that the emergency defend the expenditure. But for the English, are, as you wot, a mixed breed, having much of German sullenness, together with a plentiful dash of the hot blood of yonder Welsh furies. Let us stir them not; strong heavy draughts would madden them. What think you of ale, an invigorating strengthening liquor, that warms the heart and inflames the brain?"

"Ale!" said the Fleming.—"Hurn—he—aye ale mighty, Sir Butler?—is it double ale?"

"Do you doubt my skill?" said the butler.—"March and October have witnessed me ever since came round, for thirty years, deal with the best ale in Shropshire.—You shall judge."

He filled, from a large hogsherd in the corner of the buttery, the flagon which the Fleming had just emptied, and which was no sooner replenished than—Wilkin again drained it to the bottom.

"Good ware," he said, "Meister Butler, our stinging wars. The English churls will fight the devils upon it—let them be furnished with mirth along with their beef and brown bread. And now, having given you your charge, Master Reinold, it is time I should look after mine own."

Wilkin Flammock left the buttery, and with men and judgment alike undisturbed by the distractions in which he had so recently indulged, undisturbed also by the various rumours concerning what was passing without doors, he made the round of the castle and its outworks, mustered the little garrisons and assigned to each their posts, reserving to his own countrymen the management of the artillery, or crossbows, and of the military engines which were contrived by the proud Normans, and were comprehensible to the ignorant English, or more properly, Anglo-Saxons, of the period, but which his adroit countrymen managed with great skill. The jealousies entertained by both the Norman and English, at being placed under the temporary command of a Fleming, gradually yielded to the necessity and mechanical skill which he displayed, as well as to a sense of the emergency, which bore down with every moment.

shall see them scattered like dust—Saint George!
they will surely cry thy name now, or never!"

The monk's hands passed men while rapidly through his hands, but many an expression of military impatience mingled itself with his orisons. He could not conceive the cause why such successive throng of mountaineers, led under their different banners, and headed by their respective chieftains, were permitted without interruption, to pass the difficult defile and entered themselves in battle array on the near side of the bridge, while the English, or rather Anglo-Norman cavalry remained stationary, without so much as trying their lances in rear. There appeared, he thought, but one hope—one only rational explaining this unaccountable inactivity—the voluntary surrender of every advantage of ground, when that of numbers was so tremendously on the side of the enemy. Father Aldrovand concluded, that the surrender of the Constable of Chester, and other Lord Marchers must be in the immediate vicinity, and that the Welsh were only permitted to pass the river without opposition, that their retreat might be the more effectually cut off, and thus done, with a deep river in their rear rendered the more signally calamitous.
But even while he clung to this hope, the monk's heart sunk within him, as, looking in every direction from which the expected succours might arrive, he could neither see nor hear the slightest token which announced their approach. In a frame of mind approaching more nearly to despair than to hope, the old man continued alternately to tell his beads, to gaze anxiously around, and to address some words of as-solation in broken phrases to the young lady, until the general shout of the Welsh, ringing from the bank of the river to the battlements of the castle, warned him, in a note of exultation, that the very last of the British had defiled through the pass, and that their whole formidable army stood prompt for action upon the latter side of the river.

This thrilling and astounding clamour, to which each Welshman lent his voice with all the energy of defiance, thirst of battle, and hope of conquest, was at length answered by the blast of the Norman trumpets—the first sign of activity which had been exhibited on the part of Raymond Berenger. But scarcely as they rung, the trumpets, in comparison of the shout which they answered, sounded like the silver whistle of the most hasty stream amid the howling of the tempest.

At the same moment when the trumpets were blown, Berenger gave signal to the archers to discharge their arrows, and the men-at-arms to advance under a hail-storm of shafts, javelins, and stones, shot, dashed, and slung by the Welsh against their scaled and scudrons.

The veterans of Raymond, on the other hand, affected by many victorious recollections, confident in the talents of their accomplished leader, and undismayed even by the desperation of their circumstances, charged the mass of the Welshmen with their usual determined valour. It was a gallant sight to see this little body of cavalry advance to the onset, their plumes floating above their helmets, their lances in rest, and projecting six feet in length before the breasts of their couriers, their shields hanging from their necks, that their left hands might have freedom to guide their horses, and the whole body rushing up with an equal front, and a momentum of speed which increased with every second. Such an onset might have started naked men, (for such were the Welsh, in respect of the warlike-shod Normans,) but it brought no terror to the ancient British, who had long made it their boast that they equaled their bare breasted and white tuned to the lances and swords of the men-at-arms, with as much confidence as if they had been born invulnerable. It was not indeed in their power to withstand the weight of the first shock, which, breaking their ranks, drove as they were arranged, carried the barbed horses into the very centre of their host, and well nigh up to the fatal standard, to which Raymond Berenger, bound by his fatal vow, had that day ascended so much vantage-ground. But they yielded like the billows which give way, indeed, to the gallant ship, but only to swell her sides, and to quite in her wake. With wild and horrible clamours they clouted their tumultuous ranks around Borenger and his devoted followers, and a deadly storm of steel rained.

The best warriors of Wales had on this occasion joined the standard of Gwenvyn, the arrows of the men of Gwentland whose skill in archery almost equalled that of the Normans themselves, rattled on the harness of the men at arms, and the spears of the people of Deheubarth resounded for the sharp time and weight of their stout heads were emphatic against the cuirasses not without fatal effect, not withholding the protection which these afforded to the rider.

It was in vain that the archery belonging to Raymond's little band, stout yeomen, who, for the most part, held possessions by military tenure, exhausted their quivers on the broad mark afforded them by the Welsh army. It is probable that every shaft carried a Welshman a life on its point, yet to have afforded important relief to the cavalry, now closely and inextricably engaged, the slaughter ought to have been twenty fold at least. Mean time the Welsh galls by the incessant discharge answered it by volleys from their own archers, whose numbers made some amends for their inferiority, and who were supported by numerous bodies of footmen and slingers. It was that the Norman archers who had more than once attempted to descend from their position to operate a diversion in favour of Raymond and his devoted band, were now so closely engaged in front, as obliged them to abandon all thoughts of such a movement.

Mean while, that chivalrous leader, who from the first had hoped for no more than an honourable death, laboured with all his power to render his fate signal, by involving in it that of the Welsh Prince, the author of the war. He continually sounded the expectation of his strength by heaving among the British; but, with the shock of his managed horse, repelled the numbers who pressed on him, and leaving the possibility to the words of his companions, shouted his war cry and made his way towards the fatal stand of Gwenvyn's bands, which, discharging at once the duties of a chief leader and a brave soldier, the Prince had stationed himself. Raymond's experience of the Welsh disposition, subject equally to the highest pride and most sudden outbursts of passion, gave him assurance that a successful attack upon this point, followed by the death or capture of the Prince, and the down fall of his standard, might even yet strike such a panic as should change the fortunes of the day, otherwise so nearly desperate. The veteran, therefore, animated his comrades to the charge by voice and example, and, in spite of all opposition, forced his way gradually onward. But Gwenvyn in person, surrounded by his best and noblest champions, offered a defence as obstinate as the assault was unexpected. In vain they were borne to the south by the barbed lances, or bowed down by the insatiable rapiers. Wounded and overthrown, the Britons continued their combat, clung round the legs of the Norman steeds, and resisted their advance, while their brethren, threatening with pikes, pressed every point and covered of the plate and mail, or grasping with the men at arms, strove to pull them from their horses by main force, or bow them down with their mass and Welsh hawks. And we believe that those who were by their various means slain, for the long sharp lances worn by the Welsh men passed them with a hundred wounds, and were then only merciful when the first misdeed was deadly.

The combat was at this point, and had raged for more than half an hour, when Borenger, having fixed his horse within two spans length of the British standard, he and Gwenvyn were so near to each other as to exchange tokens of mutual defiance.

"Turn thee, Wolf of Wales," said Borenger, "and strike, if thou dar'st, one blow of a great knight's sword! Raymond Borenger spurs at thee and thy banner."

"Faire Norman chet!" and Gwenvyn, swinging around his head a spear of prodigious weight, and already clotted with blood, "thy own hand shall protect thy lying tongue, with which I will thus lay the sword."

Raymond made no further answer, but pushed his horse into the Prince, who advanced to meet him with equal resolution. But ere they came within reach of each other's weapons, a Welsh champion, dressed like the Normans who opposed the stepsons of Porthus, finding that the grimoir of Raymond's horse resisted the repeated thrusts of his spear, threw himself under the animal, and established him in the left with his long arms. The noble horse reared and bit, rearing with his weight the Briton who held him, the harness of the ruler burst as if it were a ball, and rolled away from him head, tail, and all, his noble features and gray hairs. He made no more effort to extricate himself from the clasp, but ere he could succeed, received a mortal wound from the hand of Gwenvyn, who had not to strike him down with his mace while a chance of escaping to him.

During the whole of this bloody day, Borenger's horse had kept pace for pace, and he was able to blow with his master's. It seemed as if the different bodies had been moving under some great machine. He sustained his strength as perfectly as he observed his knight did, and was able by his side, when he made the last deadly effort, at that late moment when Raymond Borenger rode on the chief the brave square forced his way up to the standard and grasping it firmly, struggled to overcome it with a giant's effort. He was, in what was had been confident, and who now seemed to him stronger to defend it. Not even while engaged in this mortal struggle, the eye of Marshal Borenger left his master, and when he saw him fall, his own heart seemed by sympathy to abandon him, and the Welsh champions had no longer any trouble in laying him prostrate among the slain.

The victory of the British was now complete. Upon the fall of their leader, the followers of Raymond Borenger would not only have fled as men, but the first was impossible, so closely had they been engaged, and in the end were maintained by the Welsh upon their frontiers, quarter to the standard was out of question. A few of the men at arms were lucky enough to disentangle themselves from the combat, and not even attempting to enter the field in various directions, to carry their own arms among the fragments of the marching, by crossing the line of the battle, and the fate of the first-mentioned Raymond Borenger.

The archers of the fallen leader, as they had been so deeply involved in the combat, which had been chiefly maintained by the cavalry, became so that even the sole object of the exercise was lost. But when they saw the multitude come rushing towards them like a sea, with all its waves, they abandoned the back which they had hitherto held, followed, and began a regular retreat to the east, the best order which they could, as the only means of saving their lives. A few of the light-armed men attempted to interrupt this during the execution of this prudent measure, by interrupting them in their march, and throwing themselves into the hollow way which led to the rear of the main retreat. But the confusion of the light archers, accustomed to retirement of every kind, suggested them as the present occasion. This part of them, armed with javelins and balls, dashed the Welsh from the hollow way, the others being in the opposite direction, and passed into divisions which alternately halted and retreated, maintaining a continuous discharge of missile weapons, and seeking a more discharge of missiles with the Welsh, by which both parties were considerable numbers.

At length, having left more than two-thirds of the brave companions behind, the remnant arrived at a point, which, being recommended by cover and a view from the battlements, might be considered a sort of comparative safety. A valley of large stones and several hundred balls of great size and weight, effectively stopped the further progress of the army, and those who had had it drew back, then dashed forward to the plain, where, with shouts of joy, and tion, their countrymen were employed in mere plunder of the field; while some, impelled by love and revenge, mangled and mutilated the living dead Normans, in a manner unworthy of the civil course and their own courage. The fear with which this dreadful work was conducted, while it struck horror into the minds of the garrison of the Grande Doloureuse, inspired at the same time with the resolution rather to die the bravest to the last extremity, than to submit to the mercy of so vengeful an enemy."

CHAPTER V.

That storm he to his castle fled,
To Harford Castle then did he
The strongest walls were castles to him, unhappy fate of the battle was soon evident anxious spectators upon the watch towers of Grande Doloureuse, which name the castle that a well deserved. With difficulty the commander and his own emotions to control those of the men upon whom he attended, and who were now in their lamentation by many others—women, and infirm old men, the relatives of those they saw engaged in this unavailing contest. Helpless beings had been admitted to the castle since the night, and they had now thronged to the towers, from which Father Aldrovand found it in making them descend, aware that the of them on the towers, that should have been lined with armed men, would be an additional argument to the exertions of the assailants. He the Lady Eveline to set an example to the of helpless, yet untractable mourners. Surviving, at least endeavouring to preserve, even extremity of grief that composure which the of the times enjoined for cavalry had in as well as philosophy. Eveline replied with which she would fain have rendered firm, which was tremulous in her despair. "Yes, you say well—here is no longer ought left for us to look upon. Warlike mood and honoured rank when yonder white plume touched the ground.—Come, maidens, there is no longer left us to me—to man, to woman—the tattered!"

It was wildness in her tone, and when she with the air of one who would lead out a party, she staggered, and would have fallen, but the support of the confessor. Hastily wrapping up in her mantle as if ashamed of the apparel which she could not restrain, and of which the low moaning sounds that issued from the folds enveloping her face, declared the on he suffered Father Aldrovand to conduct her as he would.

"It is gold," he said, "has changed to brass, our to dross, our wisdom to folly—it is His will, confounds the councils of the wise, and shortens of the mighty. To the chapel—to the chapel, Eveline; and instead of vain repining, let us to God and the saints to turn away from the re, and to save the feeble remnant from the f the devouring wolf."

He speaking, he half led, half supported Eveline as at the moment almost incapable of thought, him, to the castle-chapel, where, making her or, she assumed the attitude at least of devotion, her thoughts, despite the pious words which

"God be with you, William—This is by no means strange; the chapel we have just entered. A very handsome one was given to this valley by King Henry II. to a monk of the French Emperor's Monastery of Clugny. The people thought that an ancient might be seen here of all that is left of the island of Great Britain. Henry, in answer to a request, was pleased to take notice among other parts of the extraordinary courage and devotion of the Welsh, who did not shrink from the danger of being captured of the, valiantly shedding their blood in the eyes of their, and purchasing glory at the expense of their lives."

her tongue filtered out mechanically, were upon the field of battle, beside the body of her slaughtered parent. The rest of the mourners imitated their young lady in her devotional posture, and in the absence of her thoughts. The consciousness that so many of the garrison had been cut off in Raymond's incautious rally, added to their sorrows the sense of personal insecurity which was exaggerated by the cruelties which were too often exercised by the enemy who, in the heat of victory, were accustomed to spare neither sex nor age.

The monk, however, assumed among them the tone of authority which his character warranted, rebuked their weeping and ineffectual complaints, and having, as he thought, brought them to such a state of mind as better became their condition, he left them to their private devotions, to indulge his own anxious curiosity by inquiring into the defences of the castle. Upon the outward walls he found Wilkin Plambeck, who, having done the office of a good and skilful captain in the mode of managing his artillery, and beating back, as we have already seen, the advanced guard of the enemy, was now with his own hand measuring out to his little garrison so stinted allowance of wine.

"Have a care, good Wilkin," said the father, "that thou dost not exceed in this matter. Wine is, thou knowest, like fire and water, an excellent servant, but a very bad master."

"It will be long ere it overflow the deep and solid skulls of my countrymen," said Wilkin Plambeck. "Our Flemish courage is like our Flanders horses—the one needs the spur, and the other must have a taste of the wine-pot; but, credit me, father, they are of an enduring generation, and will not shrink in the washing.—But indeed, if I were to give the knaves a cup more than enough, it were not altogether amiss, since they are like to have a platter the less."

"How do you mean?" cried the monk, starting. "I trust in the saints the provisions have been cast for!"

"Not so well as in your convent, good father," replied Wilkin, with the same inextinguishable stolidity of countenance. "We had kept, as you know, very jolly a Christmas to have a very fat Easter. You Welsh hounds, who helped to eat up our victuals, are now like to get into our hold for the lack of them."

"Thou talkest more folly," answered the monk; "orders were last evening given by our lord (whose soul God condone!) to such in the necessary supplies from the country around."

"Ay, but the Welsh were too sharp set to permit us to do that at our ease this morning, which should have been done weeks and months since. Our lord dreamed, if deceased he be, was one of those who trusted to the edge of the sword, and even so hath come of it. Command me to a cross-bow and a well-victualled castle, if I must needs fight at all—You look pale, my good father, a cup of wine will revive you."

The monk motioned away from him the untasted cup, which Wilkin pushed him to with clownish civility. "We have now, indeed," he said, "no refuge, save in prayer!"

"Most true, good father," again replied the impassible Flamming; "pray therefore as much as you will. I will content myself with fasting, which will come whether I will or no."—At this moment a horn was heard before the gate—"Look to the portcullis and the gate, ye knaves!—What news, Neil Hansen?"

"A messenger from the Welsh arrives at the Mill-hill, just within shot of the cross-bow; he has a white flag, and demands admittance."

"Admit him not, upon thy life, till we be prepared for him," said Wilkin. "Send the bonny mangonel upon the place, and shoot him if he dare to stir from the spot where he stands till we get all prepared to receive him," said Flambeck, in his native language. "And, Neil, thou hound-foot, hasten thyself to every pike, lance, and pole in the castle, be ranged along the battlements, and pointed through the shot-holes—cut up some tapestry into the shape of banners, and show them from the highest towers.—"

"Be ready, when I give a signal, to strike naked,* and blow trumpets, if we have any; if not, some cow-horns—any thing for a noise. And hark ye, Neil Hanson, do you, and four or five of your fellows, go to the armory and slip on coats-of-mail, our Netherlands corslets do not appal them so much. Then let the Welsh thief be blindfolded and brought in amongst us. Do you hold up your heads and keep silence—leave me to deal with him—only have a care there be no English among us."

The monk who in his travels had acquired some slight knowledge of the Flemish language, had well nigh started when he heard the last article in Wilkin's instructions to his countrymen, but commanded himself, although a little surprised, both at the suspicious circumstance, and at the readiness and dexterity with which the rough-hewn Fleming seemed to adapt his preparations to the rules of war and of sound policy.

Wilkin, on his part, was not very certain whether the monk had not heard and understood more of what he said to his countryman, than what he had intended. As if to lull asleep any suspicion which Father Aldrovand might entertain, he repeated to him in English most of the directions which he had given, adding, "Well, good father, what think you of it?"

"Excellent well," answered the father, "and done as you had practised war from the cradle, instead of weaving broad cloth."

"Nay, spare not your gibes, father," answered Wilkin. "I know full well that you English think that Flemings have naught in their drunken but sudden beat and cabbage; yet you are there gone wisdom to weaving of webs."

"Right, Master Wilkin Flammeck," answered the father, "but, good Fleming, wilt thou tell me what answer thou wilt make to the Welsh Prince's summons?"

"Reverend father, first tell me what the summons will be," replied the Fleming.

"To surrender this castle upon the instant," answered the monk. "What will be your reply?"

"My answer will be—Nay, unless upon good composition."

"How, Sir Fleming? dare you mention composition and the Castle of the Gards Dolourrou in one sentence?" exclaimed the monk.

"Not if I may do better," answered the Fleming. "But would your reverence have me dilly until the question amongst the garrison be, whether a plump griot or a fat Fleming will be the better flesh to furnish their shambles?"

"Pshaw!" replied Father Aldrovand, "thou canst not mean such folly. Relief must arrive within twenty-four hours at furthest. Raymond Brengor expected it for certain within such a space."

"Raymond Brengor hath been deceived this morning in more matters than one," answered the Fleming.

"Hark thee, Flanderkin," answered the monk, whose retreat from the world had not altogether quenched his military habits and propensities, "I counsel thee to deal uprightly in this matter, as thou dost regard thine own life; for here are as many English left alive, notwithstanding the slaughter of the day, as may well suffice to fling the Flemish bullfrogs into the castle-ditch, should they have cause to think thou meanest falsely, in the keeping of this castle, and the defence of the Lady Evelyn?"

"Let not your reverence be moved with unnecessary and idle fears," replied Wilkin Flammeck—"I am castellan in this house, by command of our lord, and what I hold for the advantage of mine service, that will I do."

"But I," said the angry monk, "I am the servant of the Pope—the chaplain of this castle, with power to bind and to unloose. I fear me thou art no true Christian, Wilkin Flammeck, but dost lean to the heresy of the mountaineers. Thou hast refused to take the blessed cross—thou hast breakfasted, and drunk both ale and wine, ere thou hast heard mass. Thou art not to be trusted, man, and I will not flout thee—I demand to be present at the conference between thee and the Welshman."

"It may not be, good father," said Wilkin, with the same smiling, heavy countenance, which he maintained on all occasions of life, however urgent. "It is true, as thou sayest, good father, that I have my own reasons for not marching quite so far as the gate of Jancho at present, and lucky I have such reasons, since I had not else been here to defend the gate of the Gards Dolourrou. It is also true that I may have been sometimes obliged to visit my mills earlier than the chaplain was called by his lord to the altar, and that my stomach brooks not working ere I break my fast. But for that, father, I have paid a meek even to your worshipful reverence, and methinks more you are pleased to remember the conference as exactly, you should not forget the penance and the absolution."

The monk, in alluding to the secrets of the confessional, had gone a step beyond what the rules of the order and of the church permitted. He was rebuffed by the Fleming's reply, and finding him unmoved by the charge of heresy, he could only answer in some confusion, "You refuse, then, to admit me to your conference with the Welshman?"

"Reverend father," said Wilkin, "it altogether respects secular matters. If ought of religion should intervene, you shall be summoned with delay."

"I will be there in spite of thee, thou Flanderkin," muttered the monk to himself, but in a tone not to be heard by the bystanders; and so speaking, he left the battlements.

Wilkin Flammeck, a few minutes afterwards having first seen that all was arranged on the battlements, so as to give an imposing idea of a strength which did not exist, descended to a small guard-room between the outer and inner gate, where he was attended by half-a-dozen of his own people, dressed in the Norman armour which they had found in the store of the castle,—their strong, tall, and bulky forms, and motionless postures, causing them to look rather like trophies of some past age, than living and animating soldiers. Surrounded by these huge and stately figures, in a little vaulted room which shut excluded daylight, Flammeck received the Welsh envoy, who was led in blindfolded between two Flemings, yet not so carefully watched but that he permitted him to have a glimpse of the preparations on the battlements, which had, in fact, been made chiefly for the purpose of imposing on him. For the same purpose an occasional clatter of arms was sent without, voices were heard, as if officers were giving their rounds, and other sounds of active preparation seemed to announce that a numerous and regular garrison was preparing to receive an attack.

When the bandage was removed from Jorweth's eyes—for the same individual who had formerly brought Gweryn's offer of alliance, now had to summons of surrender—he looked haughtily at him, and demanded to whom he was to deliver the commands of his master, the Gweryn, son of Gwelyor, Prince of Powys.

"His highness," answered Fleming, with the same smiling indifference of manner, "must be accounted a treat with Wilkin Flammeck of the Felling-wick, deputy governor of the Gards Dolourrou."

"Thou deputy governor!" exclaimed Jorweth. "thou!—a low country weaver! it is impossible. Low as they are, the English 'Fringan' cannot be sunk to a point so low, as to be commanded by thee. These men were English, to them I will deliver my message."

"You may if you will," replied Wilkin, "but if they return you any answer save by signs, you shall at me when."

"Is this true?" said the Welsh envoy, looking towards the men-at-arms, as they stood by whom Flammeck was attended; "are you really sunk to this pass? I thought that the mere having been on British earth, though the children of apostate invaders, had inspired you with too much pride to brook the yoke of a base mannan. Oh, if you are ten in armour with one accord nodded their in reply to Jorworth's question, and then motionless as before.

"My whole mills and buildings have been this morning burnt to the earth!"—

"Thou shalt have a thousand marks of silver, man, in the place of thy goods," said the Welshman; but the Fleming continued, without seeming to hear him, to number up his losses.

"My lands are forayed, twenty kine driven off, and"—

"Threescore shall replace them," interrupted Jorworth, "chosen from the most bright-skinned of the spoil."

"But my daughter—but the Lady Eveline"—said the Fleming, with some slight change in his monotonous voice, which seemed to express doubt and perplexity—"You are cruel conquerors, and"—

"To those who trust us we are fearful," said Jorworth, "but not to such as shall deserve clemency by surrender. Gwenvyn will forget the contumacious of Raymond, and raise his daughter to high honour among the daughters of the Cynry. For thine own child, form but a wish for her advantage, and it shall be fulfilled to the uttermost. Now, Fleming, we understand each other."

"I understand thee, at least," said Flammoek.

"And I thee, I trust?" said Jorworth, bending his keen, wild blue eye on the stolid and unexpressive face of the Netherlander, like an eager student who seeks to discover some hidden and mysterious meaning in a passage of a classic author, the direct import of which seems true and trivial.

"You believe that you understand me," said Wilkin; "but here lies the difficulty,—which of us shall trust the other?"

"Darest thou ask?" answered Jorworth. "Is it for thee, or such as thee, to express doubt of the purposes of the Prince of Powys?"

"I know them not, good Jorworth, but through thee; and well I wot thou art not one who will let thy traffic miscarry for want of aid from the breath of thy mouth."

"As I am a Christian man," said Jorworth, hurrying asseveration on asseveration—"by the soul of my father—by the faith of my mother—by the black rood of"—

"Stop, good Jorworth, thou heapest thine oaths too thickly on each other, for me to value them to the right estimate," said Flammoek; "that which is so lightly pledged, is sometimes not thought worth redeeming. Some part of the promised guardon in hand the whilst, were worth a hundred oaths."

"Thou suspicious churl, darest thou doubt my word?"

"No—by no means," answered Wilkin;—"ne'ertheless, I will believe thy word more readily."

"To the point, Fleming," said Jorworth—"What wouldst thou have of me?"

"Let me have some present sight of the money thou didst promise, and I will think of the rest of thy proposal."

"Base silver-broker!" answered Jorworth, "thinkest thou the Prince of Powys has as many money-bags, as the merchants of thy land of sale and barter? He gathers treasures by his conquests, as the waterpout sucks up water by its strength; but it is to disperse them among his followers, as the cloudy column restores its contents to earth and ocean. The silver that I promised thee has yet to be gathered out of the Saxon chests—nay, the casket of Berenger himself must be ransacked to make up the tale."

"Methinks I could do that myself, (having full power in the castle,) and so save you a labour," said the Fleming.

"True," answered Jorworth, "but it would be at the expense of a cord and a noose, whether the Welsh took the place or the Normans relieved it—the one would expect their booty entire—the other their countryman's treasure to be delivered undiminished."

"I may not gainsay that," said the Fleming. "Well, say I were content to trust you thus far, why not return my castle, which are in your own hands, and at your disposal? If you do not pleasure me in something beforehand, what can I expect of you afterwards?"

"I would pleasure you in a greater matter," answered the equally suspicious Welshman. "But what would it avail thee to have thy cattle within the fortress? They can be better cared for on the plain beneath."

"In faith," replied the Fleming, "thou sayst truth—they will be but a trouble to us here, where we have so many already provided for the use of the garrison.—And yet, when I consider it more closely, we have enough of forage to maintain all we have, and more. Now, my cattle are of a peculiar stock, brought from the rich pastures of Flanders, and I desire to have them restored ere your axes and Welsh hooks be busy with their hides."

"You shall have them this night, hide and horn," said Jorworth. "It is but a small earnest of a great boon."

"Thanks to your munificence," said the Fleming; "I am a simple-minded man, and bound my wishes to the recovery of my own property."

"Thou wilt be ready, then, to deliver the castle?" said Jorworth.

"Of that we will talk farther to-morrow," said Wilkin Flammoock; "if these English and Normans should suspect such a purpose, we should have wild work—they must be fully dispersed ere I can hold farther communication on the subject. Mean while, I pray thee, depart suddenly, and as if offended with the tenor of our discourse."

"Yet would I fain know something more fixed and absolute," said Jorworth.

"Impossible—impossible," said the Fleming; "see you not yonder tall fellow begins already to handle his dagger—Oo hence in haste, and angrily—and forget not the cattle."

"I will not forget them," said Jorworth; "but if thou keep not faith with us"—

So speaking, he left the apartment with a gesture of menace, partly really directed to Wilkin himself, partly assumed in consequence of his advice. Flammoock replied in English, as if that all around ought to understand what he said,

"Do thy worst, Sir Welshman! I am a true man; I defy the proposals of rendition, and will hold out this castle to thy shame and thy master's!—Here—let him be blindfolded once more, and returned in safety to his attendants without; the next Welshman who appears before the gate of the Garde Doloureuse, shall be more sharply received."

The Welshman was blindfolded and withdrawn when, as Wilkin Flammoock himself left the guard-room, one of the sleeping men-at-arms who had been present at this interview, said in his ear, in English, "Thou art a false traitor, Flammoock, and shalt die a traitor's death!"

Startled at this, the Fleming would have questioned the man farther, but he had disappeared so soon as the words were uttered. Flammoock was disconcerted by this circumstance, which showed him that his interview with Jorworth hath been observed, and its purpose known or conjectured, by some one who was a stranger to his confidence, and might thwart his intentions; and he quickly after learned that this was the case.

CHAPTER VI.

Blessed Mary, mother dear,
To a maiden hand thine ear;
Virgin, undeliled, to thee
A wretched virgin hands the knee.
Hymn to the Virgin.

The daughter of the slaughtered Raymond had descended from the elevated station whence she had beheld the field of battle, in the agony of grief natural to a child whose eyes have beheld the death of an honoured and beloved father. But her station, and the principles of chivalry in which she had been trained up, did not permit any prolonged or needless indulgence of inactive sorrow. In raising the young and beautiful of the female sex to the rank of princesses, or rather goddesses, the spirit of that singular system extracted from them, in requital, a tone of character, and a line of conduct, superior and sometimes contradictory to that of natural or merely human feeling. Its heroines frequently resembled persons shown by an artificial light—strong and luminous, and which placed in high relief the objects on which it was turned; but having still something of adominant splendour, which, compared with that of the natural day, seemed glaring and exaggerated.

It was not permitted to the orphan of the Garde Doloureuse, the daughter of a line of heroes, whose stem was to be found in the race of Thor, Baldr, Odin, and other deified warriors of the North, whose beauty was the theme of a hundred minstrels, and her eyes the leading star of half the chivalry of the warlike marches of Wales, to mourn her loss with the ineffectual tears of a village maiden. Young as she was, and horrible as was the incident which she had but that instant witnessed, it was not altogether so appalling to her as to a maiden whose eye had not been accustomed to the rough, and often fatal gaze of chivalry, and whose residence had not been among scenes and men where war and death had been its unceasing theme of every tongue, whose imagination had not been familiarised with wild and bloody events, or, finally, who had not been trained up to count an honourable "death under shield," as that of a fall of battle was termed, as a more desirable transition to the life of a warrior, than that lingering and unhonoured fate which comes slowly on, to crush the listless and helpless inactivity of prolonged old age. Eveline, while she wept for her father, let her bosom glow when she recollected that he died a brave blaze of his fame, and amidst heaps of his slaughtered enemies; and when she thought of the engrossed her own situation, it was with the determination to defend her own liberty, and to avenge her father's death, by every means which Heaven had left with her power.

The aids of religion were not forgotten; and according to the custom of the times, and the decree of the Roman church, she endeavoured to purchase the favour of Heaven by vows as well as prayer. In a small crypt, or oratory, adjoining to the chapel, was hung over an altar piece, on which a lamp constantly burned, a small picture of the Virgo Ray, revered as a household and peculiar deity by the family of Berenger, one of whose ancestors had brought from the Holy Land, whither he had gone upon pilgrimage. It was of the period of the Low Empire, a Grecian painting, not unlike those which in Catholic countries are often imputed to the Evangelist Luke. The crypt in which it was placed was accounted a shrine of uncommon sanctity, supposed to have displayed miraculous powers, and visited, by the daily garland of flowers which she offered before the painting, and by the constant prayer with which they were accompanied, had constituted herself the peculiar votaries of Our Lady of the Garde Doloureuse, for so the picture was named.

Now, apart from others, alone, and in secret, sinking in the extremity of her sorrow before the shrine of her patroness, she brought the protection of kindred purity for the defence of her freedom and honour, and invoked vengeance on the wretch and treacherous chieftain who had slain her father, and was now beleaguering her place of strength. Not only did she vow a large donation in lands to the shrine of the protectress whose aid she implored, but the oath passed her lips, (even though they failed, and though something within her remonstrated against the vow) that whatsoever favoured light Our Lady of the Garde Doloureuse might send for her rescue, should obtain from her in gratitude whatever boon she sought honourably grant, save that of her virgin hand at the holy altar. Taught as she was to believe, by the assurances of many a knight, that such a surrender was the highest boon which heaven could bestow, she felt no discharging debt of gratitude when she placed herself entirely at the disposal of the pure and blessed patroness to whose aid she confided. Perhaps there lurked in the devotion some earthly hope of which she was herself scarce conscious, and which recruited her to the indefinite sacrifice thus freely offered. The Virgin

(this flattering hope might sometimes) kindest and most benevolent of patronesses, will use compassionately the power resigned to her, and as will be the favoured champion of Maria, upon whom her votaries would most willingly confer favour.

But if there was such a hope, as something selfish will often mingle with our noblest and purest emotions, it arose unconscious of Eveline herself, who, in the full assurance of implicit faith, and fixing on the representative of her adoration, eyes in which the most earnest supplication, the most humble confidence struggled with unbidden tears, was perhaps more beautiful than when, young as she was, she was selected to bestow the prize of chivalry in the lists of Chester. It was no wonder that, in such a moment of high excitement, when prostrated in devotion before a being of whose power to protect her, and to make her protection assured by a visible sign, she doubted nothing, the Lady Eveline conceived she saw with her own eyes the acceptance of her vow. As she gazed on the picture with an overstrained eye, and an imagination heated with enthusiasm, the expression seemed to alter from the hard outline, fashioned by the Greek painter; the eyes appeared to become animated, and to return with looks of compassion the suppliant entreaties of the votaries, and the mouth visibly arranged itself into a smile of inexpressible sweetness. It even seemed to her that the head made a gentle inclination.

Overpowered by supernatural awe at appearances of which her faith permitted her not to question the reality, the Lady Eveline folded her arms on her bosom, and prostrated her forehead on the pavement, as the posture most fitting to listen to divine communication.

But her vision went not so far; there was neither sound nor voice, and when, after stealing her eyes all around the crypt in which she knelt, she again raised them to the figure of Our Lady, the features seemed to be in the form in which the lunner had sketched them, saying that, to Eveline's imagination, they still retained an august and yet gracious expression, which she had not before remarked upon the countenance. With awful reverence, almost amounting to fear, yet comforted, and even elated with the visitation she had witnessed, the maiden repeated again and again the orisons which she thought most grateful to the ear of her benefactress; and, rising at length, retired backwards, as from the presence of a sovereign, until she attained the outer chapel.

Here one or two females still knelt before the saints which the walls and niches presented for adoration; but the rest of the terrified suppliants, too anxious to prolong their devotions, had dispersed through the castle to learn tidings of their friends, and to obtain some refreshment, or at least some place of repose for themselves and their families.

Bowing her head, and muttering an ave to each saint as she passed his image, (for impending danger makes men observant of the rites of devotion,) the Lady Eveline had almost reached the door of the chapel, when a man-at-arms, as he seemed, entered hastily; and with a louder voice than suited the holy place, unless when need was most urgent, demanded the Lady Eveline. Impressed with the feelings of veneration which the late scene had produced, she was about to rebuke his military rudeness, when he spoke again, and in anxious haste, "Daughter, we are betrayed!" and though the form, and the coat-of-mail which covered it, were those of a soldier, the voice was that of Father Aldrovand, who eager and anxious at the same time, disengaged himself from the mail hood, and showed his countenance.

"Father," she said, "what means this? Have you forgotten the confidence in Heaven which you are wont to recommend, that you bear other arms than your order assigns to you?"

"It may come to that ere long," said Father Aldrovand; "for I was a soldier ere I was a monk. But now I have don'd this harness to discover treachery, not to resist force. Ah! my beloved daughter—we are dreadfully beset—foemen without—traitors within! The false Fleming, Wilkin Flammoock, is treating for the surrender of the castle!"

"Who dares say so?" said a veiled female, who had been kneeling unnoticed in a sequestered corner of the chapel, but who now started up and came boldly between Lady Eveline and the monk.

"Go hence, thou saucy minion," said the monk, surprised at this bold interruption; "this concerns not thee."

"But it doth concern me," said the damsel, throwing back her veil, and discovering the juvenile countenance of Rose, the daughter of Wilkin Flammoock, her eyes sparkling, and her cheeks blushing with anger, the vehemence of which made a singular contrast with the very fair complexion, and almost infantine features of the speaker, whose whole form and figure was that of a girl who has scarce emerged from childhood, and indeed whose general manners were as gentle and bashful as they now seemed bold, impassioned, and undaunted.—"Doth it not concern me," she said, "that my father's honest name should be tainted with treason? Doth it not concern the stream when the fountain is troubled? It doth concern me, and I will know the author of the calumny."

"Damsel," said Eveline, "restrain thy useless passion; the good father, though he cannot intentionally calumniate thy father, speaks, it may be, from false report."

"As I am an unworthy priest," said the father, "I speak from the report of my own ears. Upon the oath of my order, myself heard this Wilkin Flammoock chaffering with the Welshman for the surrender of the Garde Doloureuse. By help of this hanberk and mail hood, I gained admittance to a conference where he thought there were no English ears. They spoke Flemish too, but I knew the jargon of old."

"The Flemish," said the angry maiden, whose headstrong passion led her to speak first in answer to the last insult offered, "is no jargon like your pick-bald English, half Norman, half Saxon, but a noble Gothic tongue, spoken by the brave warriors who fought against the Roman Kaisars, when Britain bent the neck to them—and as for this he has said of Wilkin Flammoock," she continued, collecting her ideas into more order as she went on, "believe it not, my dearest lady; but, as you value the honour of your own noble father, confute, as in the Evangelists, in the honesty of mine!" This she spoke with an imploring tone of voice, mingled with sobs, as if her heart had been breaking.

Eveline endeavoured to soothe her attendant. "Rose," she said, "In this evil time suspicions will light on the best men, and misunderstandings will arise among the best friends. Let us hear the good father state what he hath to charge upon your parent. Fear not but that Wilkin shall be heard in his defence. Thou wert wont to be quiet and reasonable."

"I am neither quiet nor reasonable on this matter," said Rose, with redoubled indignation; "and it is ill of you, lady, to listen to the falsehoods of that reverend mummer, who is neither true priest nor true soldier. But I will fetch one who shall confront him either in casque or cowl."

So saying, she went hastily out of the chapel, while the monk, after some pedantic circumlocution, acquainted the Lady Eveline with what he had overheard between Jorworth and Wilkin; and proposed to her to draw together the few English who were in the castle, and take possession of the innermost square tower, a keep which, as usual in Gothic fortresses of the Norman period, was situated so as to make considerable defence, even after the exterior works of the castle, which it commanded, were in the hand of the enemy.

"Father," said Eveline, still confident in the vision she had lately witnessed, "this were good counsel in extremity; but otherwise, it were to create the very evil we fear, by setting our garrison at odds amongst themselves. I have a strong, and not unwarranted confidence, good father, in our blessed Lady of the Garde Doloureuse, that we shall attain at once vengeance on our barbarous enemies, and escape from our present jeopardy; and I call you to witness the vow I have made, that to him whom Our Lady should employ to work us succour, I will refuse nothing, were it my father's intercession, or the hand of his daughter."

"Ave Maria! Ave Regina Cæli!" said the priest; "on a rock more sure you could not have founded your trust.—But, daughter," he continued, after the proper ejaculation had been made, "have you never heard, even by a hint, that there was a treaty for your hand betwixt our much-honoured lord, of whom we are cruelly bereft, (may God assuage his soul!) and the great house of Lacy?"

"Something I may have heard," said Eveline, dropping her eyes, while a slight tinge suffused her cheek; "but I refer me to the disposal of Our Lady of Succour and Consolation."

As she spoke, Rose entered the chapel with the same vivacity she had shown in leaving it, leading by the hand her father, whose sluggish though firm step, vacant countenance, and heavy demeanour, formed the strongest contrast to the rapidity of her motions, and the anxious animation of her address. The task of dragging him forward might have reminded the spectator of some of those ancient monuments, on which a small cherub, singularly inadequate to the task, is often represented as hoisting upwards towards the empyrean the fleshy bulk of some ponderous tenant of the tomb, whose disproportioned weight bids fair to render ineffectual the benevolent and spirited exertions of its fluttering guide and assistant.

"Rooschen—my child—what grieves thee?" said the Netherlander, as he yielded to his daughter's violence with a smile, which, being on the countenance of a father, had more of expression and feeling than those which seemed to have made their constant dwelling upon his lips.

"Here stands my father," said the impatient maiden; "impeach him with treason, who can or dare! There stands Wilkin Flammock, son of Dieterck, the Cramer of Antwerp, let those accuse him to his face who slandered him behind his back!"

"Speak, Father Aldrovand," said the Lady Eveline; "we are young in our lordship, and, alas! the duty hath descended upon us in an evil hour, yet we will, so may God and Our Lady help us, hear and judge of your accusation to the utmost of our power."

"Thus Wilkin Flammock," said the monk, "however bold he hath made himself in villany, dares not deny that I heard him with my own ears treat for the surrender of the castle."

"Strike him, father!" said the indignant Rose,—"strike the disguised mummer! The steel hauberk may be struck, though not the monk's frock—strike him, or tell him that he lies foully!"

"Peace, Rooschen, thou art mad," said her father, angrily; "the monk hath more truth than sense about him, and I would his ears had been farther off when he thrust them into what concerned him not."

Rose's countenance fell, when she heard her father bluntly avow the treasonable communication of which she had thought him incapable—she dropt the hand by which she had dragged him into the chapel, and stared on the Lady Eveline, with eyes which seemed starting from their sockets, and a countenance from which the blood, with which it was so lately so highly coloured, had retreated to garrison the heart.

Eveline looked upon the culprit with a countenance in which sweetness and dignity were mingled with sorrow. "Wilkin," she said, "I could not have believed this. What! on the very day of thy confiding benefactor's death, canst thou have been tampering with his murderers, to deliver up the castle, and betray thy trust!—But I will not upbraid thee—I deprive thee of the trust reposed in so unworthy a person, and appoint thee to be kept in ward in the western tower, till God send us relief, when, it may be, thy daughter's merits shall atone for thy offences, and save farther punishment.—See that our commands be presently obeyed."

"Yes—yes—yes!" exclaimed Rose, hurrying one word on the other as fast and vehemently as she could articulate—"Let us go—let us go to the darkest dungeon—darkness befits us better than light."

The monk, on the other hand, perceiving that the Fleming made no motion to obey the mandate of arrest, came forward, in a manner more suited his ancient profession, and present disgust, than his spiritual character; and with the words, "I attack thee, Wilkin Flammock, of acknowledged treason to your liege lady," would have laid hand upon him, had not the Fleming stepped back and warned him off with a menacing and determined gesture, while he said,—"Ye are mad!—all of you English are mad when the moon is full, and my silly girl hath caught the malady.—Lady, your honoured father gave me charge, which I purpose to execute to the best of all parties, and you cannot, being a minor, deprive me of it at your idle pleasure.—Father Aldrovand, a monk makes no lawful arrests.—Daughter Rooschen, let your peace and dry your eyes—you are a fool."

"I am I am," said Rose, drying her eyes, and regaining her elasticity of manner—"I am indeed a fool, and worse than a fool, for a moment to doubt my father's probity—Confide in him, dearest lady; he is wise though he is grave, and kind though he is plain and homely in his speech. Should he prove false he will fare the worse! for I will plunge myself from the pinnacle of the Warder's Tower to the bottom of the moat, and he shall lose his own daughter for betraying his master's."

"This is all frenzy," said the monk—"Who were avowed traitors?—Here, Normans, English, to the rescue of your liege lady—Down and bulls—down and bulls!"

"You may spare your throat for your next head, good father," said the Netherlander, "or call a good Flemish, since you understand it, for to no other language will those within hearing reply."

He then approached the Lady Eveline with a cool and affected air of clumsy kindness, and something nearly approaching to courtesy as his manners and features could assume. He bade her good night, and assuring her that he would act for the best, left the chapel. The monk was about to break forth into revellings, but Eveline, with more prudence, checked his zeal.

"I cannot," she said, "but hope that the monk's intentions are honest"—

"Now, God's blessings on you, lady, for that very word!" said Rose, eagerly interrupting her, and taking her hand.

"But if unhappily they are doubtful," continued Eveline, "it is not by reproach that we can bring him to a better purpose. Good father gave us up to the preparations for resistance, and we ought omitted that our means furnish for the defence of the castle."

"Fear nothing, my dearest daughter," said Aldrovand; "there are still some English hearts amongst us, and we will rather kill and eat the Flemings themselves than surrender the castle."

"That were food as dangerous to come by as best venison, father," answered Rose, bitterly, still as for with the idea that the monk treated her nation with suspicion and contumely.

On these terms they separated;—the women to indulge their fears and sorrows in private grief, or alleviate them by private devotion; the monk to go to discover what were the real purposes of Wilkin Flammock, and to counteract them if possible, should they seem to indicate treachery. His eye, however, though sharpened by strong suspicion, saw nothing to strengthen his fears, excepting that the Fleming had, with considerable military skill, placed the principal posts of the castle in the charge of his own countrymen, which must make any attempt to dispossess him of his present authority both difficult and dangerous. The monk at length retired, momentary by the duties of the evening service, and with the determination to be stirring with the light next morning.

CHAPTER VII.

O, sadly shines the morning sun
On Ingeur's castle hall,
When bastions, towers, and battlement,

True to his resolution, and telling his bands so by word of mouth, that he might lose no time, Father Aldrovand began his rounds in the castle so soon as daylight had touched the top of the eastern horizon. A natural instinct led him first to those stalls which, had the fortress been properly victualled for a siege, ought to have been tenanted by cattle; and great was his delight to see more than a score of fat kine and rallocks in the place which had last night been empty! One of them had already been carried to the shambles, and a Fleming or two, who played nuchars on the occasion, were dividing the carcass by the cook's use. The good father had well nigh said out, a miracle; but, not to be too precipitate, he limited his transport to a private exclamation in honour of Our Lady of the Garde Doloureuse.

"Who talks of lack of provender?—who speaks of surrender now?" he said. "Here is enough to maintain us till Hugo de Lacy arrives, were he to sail back from Cyprus to our relief. I did purpose to have fasted this morning, as well to save victuals as on a religious score: but the blessing of the saints must not be slighted.—Sir Cook, let me have half a yard or so of broiled beef presently; bid the paster send me a manchet, and the butler a cup of wine. I will take my running breakfast on the western battlements!"

At this place, which was rather the weakest point of the Garde Doloureuse, the good father found Wilkin Flammock anxiously superintending the necessary measures of defence. He greeted him warmly, congratulated him on the stock of provisions with which the castle had been supplied during the night, and was inquiring how they had been so happily introduced through the Welsh besiegers, when Wilkin took the first occasion to interrupt him.

"Of all this another time, good father; but I wish at present, and before other discourses, to consult thee on a matter which presses my conscience, and more-over deeply concerns my worldly estate."

"Speak on, my excellent son," said the father, enquiring that he should thus gain the key to Wilkin's real intentions. "O, a tender conscience is a jewel! and he that will not listen when it saith, 'pour out thy doubts into the ear of the priest,' shall one day give his own dolorous outcries choked with fire and rimstone. Thou wert ever of a tender conscience, on Wilkin, though thou hast but a rough and boisterous spring."

"Well, then," said Wilkin, "you are to know, good father, that I have had some dealings with my neighbour, Jan Vanwelt, concerning my daughter Rose, and that he has paid me certain gilders on condition will match her to him."

"Pshaw, pshaw! my good son," said the disappointed confessor, "the gear can be over—this is no time for marrying or giving in marriage, when we are all like to be murdered!"

"Nay, but hear me, good father," said the Fleming, "for this point of conscience concerns the present and more nearly than you wot of.—You must know I have no will to bestow Rose on this same Jan Vanwelt, who is old, and of ill conditions; and I could know of you whether I may, in conscience, oblige him my consent?"

"Truly," said Father Aldrovand, "Rose is a pretty one, though somewhat hasty; and I think you may sweetly withdraw your consent, always on paying back the gilders you have received."

"But there lies the pinch, good father," said the Fleming—"the refunding this money will reduce me to utter poverty. The Welsh have destroyed my substance; and this handful of money is all, God bless me! on which I must begin the world again."

"Nevertheless, son Wilkin," said Aldrovand, "thou must keep the word, or pay the forfeit; for what saith he text? Quis habitabit in tabernaculo, quis requiescit in monte sancto?—Who shall ascend to the tabernacle, and dwell in the holy mountain? Is it not answered again, qui fuerat proximo, et non deridet?—Go to, my son—break not thy plighted word or a little filthy lucre—better is an empty stomach and a hungry heart with a clear conscience, than a fattened ox with iniquity and word-breaking.—Sawest thou not our late noble lord, who (may his soul be happy!) chose rather to die in unequal battle, like a true knight, than live a perjured man, though he had but spoken a rash word to a Welshman over a wine flask?"

"Alas! then," said the Fleming, "this is even what I feared! We must e'en render up the castle, or restore to the Welshman, Jorworth, the cattle, by means of which I had schemed to victual and defend it."

"How—wherefore—what dost thou mean?" said the monk in astonishment. "I speak to thee of Rose Flammock, and Jan Vanwelt, or whatever you call him, and you reply with talk about cattle and castles, and I wot not what?"

"No please you, holy father, I did but speak in parables. This castle was the daughter I had promised to deliver over—the Welshman is Jan Vanwelt, and the gilders were the cattle he has sent in, as a part-payment beforehand of my gerdon."

"Parables!" said the monk, colouring with anger at the trick put on him; "what has a boor like thee to do with parables?—But I forgive thee—I forgive thee."

"I am therefore to yield the castle to the Welshman, or restore him his cattle?" said the unpenetrable Dutchman.

"Sooner yield thy soul to Satan!" replied the monk.

"I fear me it must be the alternative," said the Fleming; "for the example of thy honourable lord!"

"The example of an honourable fool!" answered the monk; then presently subjoined, "Our Lady be with her servant!"—This Belgic-brained boor makes me forget what I would say.

"Nay, but the holy text which your reverence cited to me even now," continued the Fleming.

"Go to," said the monk; "what hast thou to do to presume to think of texts?—knowest thou not that the letter of the Scripture slayeth, and that it is the exposition which maketh to live?—Art thou not like one who, coming to a physician, conceals from him half the symptoms of the disease?—I tell thee, thou foolish Fleming, the text speaketh but of promises made unto Christians, and there is in the Rubric a special exception of such as are made to Welshmen." At this commentary the Fleming grinned so broadly as to show his whole case of broad strong white teeth. Father Aldrovand himself grinned in sympathy, and then proceeded to say,—"Come, come, I see how it is. Thou hast studied some small revenge on me for doubting of thy truth; and, in verity, I think thou hast taken it wittily enough. But wherefore didst thou not let me into the secret from the beginning? I promise thee I had foul suspicions of thee."

"What?" said the Fleming, "is it possible I could ever think of involving your reverence in a little matter of deceit? Surely heaven hath sent me more grace and manners.—Hark, I hear Jorworth's horn at the gate."

"He blows like a town swineherd," said Aldrovand, in disdain.

"It is not your reverence's pleasure that I should restore the castle unto him, then?" said Flammock.

"Yes, thus far. Prithes deliver him straightway over the walls such a tub of boiling water as shall scald the hair from his goat-skin cloak. And, hark thee, do thou in the first place try the temperature of the kettle with thy forefinger, and that shall be thy penance for the trick thou hast played me."

The Fleming answered this with another broad grin of intelligence, and they proceeded to the outer gate, to which Jorworth had come alone. Placing himself at the wicket, which, however, he kept carefully barred, and speaking through a small opening, contrived for such purpose, Wilkin Flammock demanded of the Welshman his business.

"To receive rendition of the castle, agreeable to promise," said Jorworth.

* Old Henry Jenkins, in his Reflections of the Abbess, shows that their devotion, has preserved the fact, that roast-hen was delivered out to the guests, not by weight, but by measure.

"Ay? and art thou come on such an errand alone?" said Wilkin.

"No, truly," answered Jorworth; "I have some two score of men concealed among yonder bushes."

"Then thou hadst best lead them away quickly," answered Wilkin, "before our archers let fly a shower of arrows among them."

"How, villain! Dost thou not mean to keep thy promise?" said the Welshman.

"I gave thee none," said the Fleming; "I promised but to think on what thou didst say. I have done so, and have communicated with my ghostly father, who will in no respect hear of my listening to thy proposal."

"And wilt thou," said Jorworth, "keep the cattle which I amply sent into the castle on the faith of our agreement?"

"I will excommunicate and deliver him over to Satan," said the monk, unable to wait the phlegmatic and lingering answer of the Fleming, "if he give him, hood, or hair of them, to such an uncircumcised Philistine as thou or thy master."

"It is well, shrewd priest," answered Jorworth, in great anger. "But mark me—reckon not on your flock for ransom. When Gwerwyn hath taken this castle, as it shall not longer shelter such a pair of faithless traitors, I will have you sewed up each into the carcase of one of these kine, for which your penitent has sworn himself, and lay you where well and snug shall be your only companions."

"Thou wilt work thy will when it is matched with thy power," said the sedate Netherlander.

"Pshaw, Welshman, we defy thee to thy teeth!" answered, in the same breath, the more reasonable monk. "I trust to see the hounds gnaw thy joints ere that day come that ye talk of so proudly."

By way of answer to both, Jorworth drew back his arm with his levelled javelin, and shaking the shaft till it acquired a vibratory motion, he hurled it with equal strength and dexterity right against the aperture in the wicket. It whizzed through the opening at which it was aimed, and flew (harmlessly, however,) between the heads of the monk and the Fleming; the former of whom started back, while the latter only said, as he looked at the javelin, which stood quivering in the door of the guard-room, "That was well aimed, and happily halted."

Jorworth, the instant he had flung his dart, hastened to the ambush which he had prepared, and gave them at once the signal and the example of a rapid retreat down the hill. Pather Aldrovand would willingly have followed them with a volley of arrows, but the Fleming observed that ammunition was too precious with them to be wasted on a few runaways. Perhaps the honest man remembered that they had come within the danger of such a salutation, in some measure, on his own assurance.

When the noise of the hasty retreat of Jorworth and his followers had died away, there ensued a dead silence, well corresponding with the coolness and calmness of that early hour in the morning.

"This will not last long," said Wilkin to the monk, in a tone of foreboding seriousness, which found an echo in the good father's bosom.

"It will not, and it cannot," answered Aldrovand; "and we must expect a shrewd attack, which I should much like, but that their numbers are great, ours few; the extent of the walls considerable, and the obstinacy of these Welsh fiends almost equal to their fury. But we will do the best. I will to the Lady Evadne. She must show herself upon the battlements. She is faster in feature than becometh a man of my order to speak of, and she has withal a breathing of her father's lofty spirit. The look and the word of such a lady will give a man double strength in the hour of need."

"It may be," said the Fleming; "and I will go see that the great breakfast which I have appointed be promptly served forth, it will give my Flemings more strength than the sight of the ten thousand virgins—may their help be with us!—were they all arranged on a fair field."

CHAPTER VIII.

"True when ye raised, 'mid cup and song,
The banner of your righteous king
At your own captain's call,
Who, mistress of woman's art,
Lest motto to the warrior band
That motto'd her motto well."

WILLIAM STEWART BUCHAN.

The morning light was scarce fully spread, when Evadne Deranger, in compliance with her professor's advice, commenced her program around the walls and battlements of the beleaguered rock to confirm by her personal entreaties the minds of the valiant, and to rouse the more timid to hope and exertion. She wore a rich collar and bracelet ornaments which indicated her rank and high descent, and her under tunic, in the manner of the times, was gathered around her slender waist by a girdle, embroidered with precious stones, and fastened by a large buckle of gold. From one side of the girdle was suspended a pouch or purse, splendidly adorned with needle-work, and on the left side it contained a small dagger of exquisite workmanship. A dark coloured mantle, chosen as emblematic of her chaste fortunes, was flung loosely around her, and as she was brought forward, so as to shadow but not hide her beautiful countenance. Her looks had lost the high and ecstatic expression which had been noted by supposed revelation, but they retained a sweet and mild, yet determined character—and, in obeying the summons, she used a mixture of secrecy and command—now throwing herself upon their protection—now demanding in her aid the just tribute of their allegiance.

The garrison was divided, as military skill directed in troops, on the points most liable to attack, or those which an assailing enemy might be best enabled to reach, and it was this unavoidable separation of the men into small detachments, which showed to advantage the extent of walls, compared with the number of the defenders, and though Wilkin Flammé had contrived several means of concealing this deficiency of force from the enemy, he could not deny that from the defenders of the castle, who cast scornful glances on the length of battlements which were unoccupied save by sentinels, and then looked on the fatal field of battle, loaded with the bodies of those who ought to have been their comrades in the hour of peril.

The presence of Evadne did much to rouse the garrison from this state of discouragement. She glided from post to post, from tower to tower of the lofty fortress, as a gleam of light passes over a dark landscape, and, touching its various points a moment, calls them out to beauty and effort. Love and fear sometimes make suffering pleasant. She addressed the various nations who composed the little garrison, each in appropriate language. To the English she spoke as children of the soil, to the Flemings, as men who had become dear to the right of hospitality to the Normans as descendants of the victorious race whose sword had made the nobles and sovereigns of every land who she had been tried. To them she bore the torch of chivalry by whose rules the measures of that time regulated or affected to regulate his actions. To English she reminded of their good faith and honesty of heart, and to the Flemings she spoke of the security of their property, the fruits of their honest industry. To all she proposed vengeance for the death of their leader and his followers, and she recommended confidence in God and Our Lady of the Glorious Deliverance, and she ventured to name all of the strong and victorious bands that were already a march to their relief.

"Will the gallant champions of the cross," she said, "think of leaving their native land, while the word of women and of orphans is in their ears? We were to convert these pagan perfumes into moral oil, and to degenerate from the high fate they have so well won. You fight but valiantly, and perhaps before the very sun that is now showing rising and setting in the sea, you will see it shining on the walls of Shrewsbury and Chester. When all the walls at to hear the clangour of their trumpets, or ling of their wilken banners? Fight bravely—eely but a while!—our castle is strong—our ample—your hearts are good—your arms virtul—God is nigh to us, and our friends are instant. Fight, then, in the name of all that and holy—fight for yourselves, for your wives, children, and for your property—and oh! fight rphan maiden, who hath no other defenders t a sense of her sorrows, and the remembrance ther, may raise up among you!"

speeches as these made a powerful impre- the men to whom they were addressed, hardened, by habits and sentiments, against of danger. The chivalrous Normans swore, ross of their swords, they would die to a man; would surrender their posts—the blunter saxon cried, "Shame on him who would up such a lamb as Eveline to a Welsh wolf, e could make her a bulwark with his body!" the cold Flemings caught a spark of the en- n with which the others were animated, and d to each other praises of the young lady's and short but honest resolves to do the best ght in her defence.

Flammock, who accompanied her lady with two attendants upon her circuit around the seemed to have relapsed into her natural cha- f a shy and timid girl, out of the excited state ich she had been brought by the suspicions in the evening before had attached to her character. She tripped closely but respect- er Eveline, and listened to what she said from time, with the awe and admiration of a child z to its tutor, while only her moistened eye d how far she felt or comprehended the ex- be danger, or the force of the exhortations. as, however, a moment when the youthful s eye became more bright, her step more con- her looks more elevated. Eveline paused, and looking on the broad ex- plain which extended between the site of the d the river, observed how silent and still the ; was rising over what had so lately been a such extensive slaughter

Vol. IV.—4 P

"It will not be so long," answered Flammock; "we shall have noise enough, and that nearer to our ears than yesterday."

"Which way lie the enemy?" said Eveline; "methinks I can spy neither tents nor pavilions."

"They lie none, lady," answered Wilkin Flammock. "Heaven has denied them the grace and knowledge to weave linen enough for such a purpose. Yonder they lie on both sides of the river covered with rought but their white maniles. Would one think that a host of thieves and cut-throats could look so like the finest object in nature—a well-spread bleaching-field? Hark hark! the wasps are be- ginning to buzz, they will soon be pling their stings."

In fact, there was heard among the Welsh army a low and indistinct murmur, like that of

"Does alarm d and mustering in their hives."

Terrified at the hollow menacing sound, which grew louder every moment, Rose, who had all the irrita- bility of a sensitive temperament, clung to her fa- ther's arm, saying, in a terrified whisper, "It is like the sound of the sea the night before the great inun- dation."

"And it betokens too rough weather for women to be abroad in," said Flammock. "Go to your cham- ber, Lady Eveline, if it be your will—and go you too, Rose—God bless you both—ye do but keep us idle here."

And, indeed, conscious that she had done all that was incumbent upon her, and fearful lest the chill which she felt creeping over her own heart should infect others, Eveline took her vassal's advice, and withdrew slowly to her own apartment, often cast- ing back her eye to the place where the Welsh, now drawn out and under arms, were advancing their ridgy battalions like the waves of an approaching tide.

The Prince of Powys had, with considerable mili- tary skill, adapted a plan of attack suitable to the fiery genius of his followers, and calculated to alarm on every point the feeble garrison.

The three sides of the castle which were defended by the river, were watched each by a numerous body of the British, with instructions to confine themselves to the discharge of arrows, unless they should observe that some favourable opportunity of close attack should occur. But far the greater part of Gwen- wyn's forces, consisting of three columns of great strength, advanced along the plain on the western side of the castle, and menaced, with a desperate assault, the walls, which, in that direction, were de- prived of the defence of the river. The first of these formidable bodies consisted entirely of archers, who dispersed themselves in front of the beleagured place and took advantage of every bush and rising ground which could afford them shelter; and then began to bend their bows and shower their arrows on the bat- tlements and loopholes, suffering, however, a great deal more damage than they were able to inflict, as the garrison returned their shot in comparative safety, and with more secure and deliberate aim. Under cover, however, of their discharge of arrows, two very strong bodies of Welsh attempted to carry the outer defences of the castle by storm. They had axes to destroy the palisades, then called barriers; sagots to fill up the external ditches; torches to set fire to night combustible which they might find; and, above all, ladders to scale the walls.

* ARCHERS OF WALES. The Welsh were excellent bowmen, but under favour of Lord Lyttleton they probably did not use the long bow the formidable weapon of the Normans, and afterwards the English弓箭men. That of the Welsh most like y rather resembled the bow of the cognate Celtic tribes of Ireland and of the Highlands of Scotland. It was shorter than the Norman long bow as being drawn to the breast not to the ear more easily strung and the arrow having a heavy club head together in short a less effective weapon. It appears from the following anecdote that there was a difference be- tween the Welsh arrows and those of the English.

In 1122 Henry the II. marching into Powys Land to chastise Merdyt's rebellion and certain rebels in passing a defile was struck by an arrow on the breast. Repelled by the resistance of his breastplate the shaft fell to the ground. When the King felt the blow and saw the shaft, he swore his usual oath, by the death of our Lord, that the arrow came not from a Welsh, but an English bow and, influenced by this belief, hastily put an end to the war.

These detachments rushed with incredible fury towards the point of attack, despite a most obstinate defence, and the great loss which they sustained by missiles of every kind, and continued the assault for nearly an hour, supplied by reinforcements which more than recruited their diminished numbers. When they were at last compelled to retreat, they seemed to adopt a new and yet more harassing species of attack. A large body assailed one exposed point of the fortress with such fury as to draw thither as many of the besieged as could possibly be spared from other defended points, and when there appeared a point less strongly manned than was adequate to defence, that, in its turn, was furiously assailed by a separate body of the enemy.

Thus the defenders of the Garde Delourouse resembled the embarrassed traveller, engaged in repelling a swarm of hornets, which, while he brushes them from one part, fly in swarms upon another, and drive him to despair by their numbers, and the boldness and multiplicity of their attacks. The postern being of course a principal point of attack, Father Aldruvand, whose anxiety would not permit him to be absent from the walls, and who, indeed, where decency would permit, took an occasional share in the active defence of the place, hastened thither, as the point chiefly in danger.

Here he found the Fleming, like a second Ajax, grim with dust and blood, working with his own hands the great engine which he had lately helped to erect, and at the same time giving heedful eye to all the exigencies around.

"How thinkest thou of this day's work?" said the monk in a whisper.

"What shails it talking of it, father?" replied Flemmock; "thou art no soldier, and I have no time for words."

"Nay, take thy breath," said the monk, tucking up the sleeve of his frock; "I will try to help thee this while—although, Our Lady pity me, I know nothing of these strange devices—not even the names. But our rule commands us to labour; there can be no harm, therefore, in turning this winch—or in placing this steel-headed piece of wood opposite to the cord, (leaving his action to his words.) "nor am I aught uncanonical in adjusting the lever thus, or in touching the spring."

The large bolt whizzed through the air as he spoke, and was so successfully aimed, that it struck down a Welsh chief of eminence, to whom Gwenwyn himself was in the act of giving some important charge.

"Well driven, trebuchet—well flown, quarrel!" cried the monk, unable to contain his delight, and giving, in his triumph, the true technical names to the engine, and the javelin which it discharged.

"And well aimed, monk," added Wilkin Flemmock; "I think thou knowest more than is in thy breviary."

"Care not thou for that," said the father; "and now that thou seest I can work an engine, and that the Welsh knaves seem something low in stomach, what think'st thou of our estate?"

"Well enough—for a bad one—if we may hope for speedy succour; but men's bodies are of flesh, not of iron, and we may be at last wearied out by numbers. Only one soldier to four yards of wall, is a fearful odds; and the villains are aware of it, and keep us to sharp work."

The renewal of the assault here broke off their conversation, nor did the active enemy permit them to enjoy much repose until sunset; for, alarming them with repeated menaces of attack upon different points, besides making two or three formidable and furious assaults, they left them scarce time to breathe, or to take a moment's refreshment. Yet the Welsh paid a severe price for their temerity; for while nothing could exceed the bravery with which their men repeatedly advanced to the attack, those which were made later in the day had less of animated desperation than their first onset; and it is probable, that the sense of having sustained great loss, and apprehension of its effects on the spirits of his people, made nightfall, and the interruption of the contest, as acceptable to Gwenwyn as to the exhausted garrison of the Garde Delourouse.

But in the camp or laager of the Welsh there was glee and triumph, for the loss of the past day was forgotten in recollections of the signal victory which had preceded this night, and the desperate game could hear from their walls the laugh and the song, the sound of harping and gawry, which triumphed by usurpation over their surrender.

The sun was for some time sunk, the twilight deepened, and night closed with a blue and cloudless sky, in which the thousand spearguns that decked the firmament received double brilliancy from some slight touch of frost, although the polar planet, the moon, was but in her first quarter. The garrison of the fortress were considerably aggravated by the keeping a very strong and watchful guard, all coming with the weakness of their numbers, at a time which appeared favourable to any sudden nocturnal alarm; and so urgent was this duty, that those who had been more slightly wounded on the preceding day, were obliged to take their share in it, notwithstanding their hurts. The monk and Fleming, who now perfectly understood each other, went in company around the walls at midnight, exhorting the warders to be watchful, and examining with their own eyes the state of the fortress. It was in the course of these rounds, and as they were ascending an elevated platform by a range of narrow and steep steps, something galling to the monk's tread, that they perceived on the summit to which they were ascending, instead of the black corner of the Flemish sentinel who had been placed there, two white forms, the appearance of which struck Wilkin Flemmock with more dismay than he had shown during any of the doubtful events of the preceding day's fight.

"Father," he said, "betake yourself to your two—as speak—there are hobgoblins here!"

The good father had not learned, as a priest, to let the spiritual host, whom, as a soldier, he had deemed more than any mortal enemy; but he began to rub with chattering teeth, the exorcism of the devil. "Conjuro vos omnes, spiritus maligni, nigri, et perversi,"—when he was interrupted by the voice of Keeline, who called out, "Is it you, Father Aldruvand?"

Mock lightened at heart by finding they had no ghost to deal with, Wilkin Flemmock and the priest advanced hastily to the platform, where they met the lady with her faithful Rose, the former with a half pike in her hand, like a sentinel on duty.

"How is this, daughter?" said the monk, "how came you here, and thus armed? and what is this sentinel,—the lazy Flemish hound, that should be kept the post?"

"May he not be a lazy hound, yet not a Flemish one, father?" said Rose, who was ever awake to any thing which admitted a reflection upon her calling. "I have heard of such cure of English boys."

"So you, Rose, you are too misapprehensive for a young maiden," said her father. "Once more, what is Peterkin Vane, who should have kept this post?"

"Let him be blamed for my fault," said Rose, pointing to a place where the Flemish sentinel lay in the shade of the battlement fast asleep—"He was weary with toil—had fought hard through the day, and when I saw him asleep as I came with this, a sleeping spirit that cannot take double repose, I would not disturb the rest which I saw. As he had fought for me, I might, I thought, rest an hour for him; so I took his weapon with the purpose of remaining here till some one should come to relieve him."

"I will relieve the sentinel, with a vengeance!" said Wilkin Flemmock, and advanced the dumb-bell of pumprate wanders with two licks, which made a considerable clatter. The men started to see fast a small alarm, which he would have commenced the next sentinel and to the whole garrison, by crying out that the Welsh were upon the walls, had as the monk covered his broad mouth with his hand as the roar was issuing forth.—"Flemmock, and get me down to the under-bailly," said he;—"don't stir."

by all the policies of war—but, look ye, variety who has saved your worthless neck, by lying while you were dreaming of swine's flesh and ale-pots."

Fleming, although as yet but half awake, was not fully conscious of his situation, to sneak off without reply, after two or three awkward congratulations, to Eveline as to those by whom his repose had been unceremoniously interrupted.

"You deserve to be tied neck and heel, the hounds-said Wilkin. "But what would you have, my countrymen cannot live without rest or sleep."

So saying, he gave a yawn so wide, as if he were about to swallow one of the turrets at an angle of the platform on which he stood, as if it had been a Christmas pasty.

"Good Wilkin," said Eveline; "and do you rest, take some rest, and trust to my watchfulness at least till the guards are relieved. I cannot sleep, I would, and I would not if I could."

"Thank you, lady," said Flammock; "and in truth, this is a central place, and the rounds must pass your way at farthest, I will even close my eyes for a space, for the lids feel as heavy as floodgates." "Father, father!" exclaimed Rose, alive to her unceremonious neglect of decorum—"think of you are, and in whose presence?"

"Ay, good Flammock," said the monk, "remember the presence of a noble Norman maiden is a reason for folding of cloaks and donning of night-gowns."

"Thank him alone, father," said Eveline, who in that moment might have smiled at the readiness with which Wilkin Flammock folded himself in his cloak, extended his substantial form on the bench, and gave the most decided tokens of repose, long ere the monk had done speaking. "Forms and fashions of respect," she continued, "are for times of ease and nicety;—when in the soldier's bedchamber is wherever he can procure for an hour's sleep—his eating-hall, where he can obtain food. Sit thou down by Rose, good father, and tell us of some holy lesson which may pass away these hours of weariness and idleness."

Father obeyed; but however willing to afford attention, his ingenuity and theological skill suggested nothing better than a recitation of the penitential psalms, in which task he continued until fatigue was too powerful for him also, when he committed the same breach of decorum for which he had rebuked Wilkin Flammock, and fell fast asleep in the midst of his devotions.

CHAPTER IX.

"O night of wo," she said and wept,

"O night foreboding sorrow!"

"O night of wo," she said and wept,

"But more I dread the morrow!"

SIR GILBERT ELLIOT.

fatigue which had exhausted Flammock and the monk, was unfelt by the two anxious maidens, remained with their eyes bent, now upon the landscape, now on the stars by which it was lit up, as if they could have read there the events of the morrow was to bring forth. It was a placid melancholy scene. Tree and field, and hill and plain, lay before them in doubtful light, while, at a distance, their eye could with difficulty trace two places where the river, hidden in general darkness and trees, spread its more expanded bosom to the stars, and the pale crescent. All was still, except the solemn rush of the waters, and now and then the shrill tinkle of a harp, which, heard from more than a mile's distance through the midnight silence, announced that some of the Welshmen still enjoyed their most beloved amusement. The wild music, partially heard, seemed like the voice of some evil spirit; and, connected as they were with ideas of and unrelenting hostility, thrilled on Eveline's mind as if prophetic of war and wo, captivity and death. Only other sounds which disturbed the extreme silence of the night, were the occasional step of a sentinel upon his post, or the hooting of the owls, which seemed to wail the approaching downfall of the moonlight turrets, in which they had established their ancient habitations.

The calmness of all around seemed to press like a weight on the bosom of the unhappy Eveline, and brought to her mind a deeper sense of present grief, and keener apprehension of future horrors, than had reigned there during the bustle, blood, and confusion of the preceding day. She rose up—she sat down—she moved to and fro on the platform—she remained fixed like a statue to a single spot, as if she were trying by variety of posture to divert her internal sense of fear and sorrow.

At length, looking at the monk and the Fleming as they slept soundly under the shade of the battlement, she could no longer forbear breaking silence. "Men are happy," she said, "my beloved Rose; their anxious thoughts are either diverted by toilsome exertion, or drowned in the insensibility which follows it. They may encounter wounds and death, but it is we who feel in the spirit a more keen anguish than the body knows, and in the gnawing sense of present ill and fear of future misery, suffer a living death, more cruel than that which ends our woes at once."

"Do not be thus downcast, my noble lady," said Rose; "be rather what you were yesterday, caring for the wounded, for the aged, for every one but yourself—exposing even your dear life among the showers of the Welsh arrows, when doing so could give courage to others; while I—shame on me—could but tremble, sob, and weep, and needed all the little wit I have to prevent my shouting with the wild cries of the Welsh, or screaming and groaning with those of our friends who fell around me."

"Alas! Rose," answered her mistress, "you may at pleasure indulge your fears to the verge of distraction itself—you have a father to fight and watch for you. Mine—my kind, noble, and honoured parent, lies dead on yonder field, and all which remains for me is to act as may best become his memory. But, this moment is at least mine, to think upon and to mourn for him."

So saying, and overpowered by the long-repressed burst of filial sorrow, she sunk down on the banquette which ran along the inside of the embattled parapet of the platform, and murmuring to herself, "He is gone for ever!" abandoned herself to the extremity of grief. One hand grasped unconsciously the weapon which she held, and served, at the same time, to prop her forehead, while the tears, by which she was now for the first time relieved, flowed in torrents from her eyes, and her sobs seemed so convulsive, that Rose almost feared her heart was bursting. Her affection and sympathy dictated at once the kindest course which Eveline's condition permitted. Without attempting to control the torrent of grief in its full current, she gently sat her down beside the mourner, and possessing herself of the hand which had sunk motionless by her side, she alternately pressed it to her lips, her bosom, and her brow—now covered it with kisses, now bedewed it with tears, and amid these tokens of the most devoted and humble sympathy, waited a more composed moment to offer her little stock of consolation in such deep silence and stillness, that, as the pale light fell upon the two beautiful young women, it seemed rather to show a group of statuary, the work of some eminent sculptor, than beings whose eyes still wept, and whose hearts still throbbed. At a little distance, the gleaming corslet of the Fleming, and the dark garments of Father Aldrovand, as they lay prostrate on the stone steps, might represent the bodies of those for whom the principal figures were mourning.

After a deep agony of many minutes, it seemed that the sorrows of Eveline were assuming a more composed character; her convulsive sobs were changed for long, low, profound sighs, and the course of her tears, though they still flowed, was milder and less violent. Her kind attendant, availing herself of these gentler symptoms, tried softly to win the spear from her lady's grasp. "Let me be sentinel for a while," she said, "my sweet lady—I will at least scream louder than you if any danger should approach." She ventured to kiss her cheek, and throw her arms around Evelyn's neck while she spoke; but a mute ceremony, which expressed her sense of the faithful girl's kind intentions to minister if possible to her repose, was the only answer returned. They remained for many minutes silent and in the same posture. Evelyn, like an upright and slender poplar, — Rose, who encircled her lady in her arms, like the woodbine which twines around it.

At length Rose suddenly felt her young mistress shiver in her embrace, and that Evelyn's hand grasped her arm rigidly as she whispered, "Do you hear anything?"

"No—nothing but the hooting of the owl," answered Rose, timorously.

"I heard a distant sound," said Evelyn. "I thought I heard it—hark, it comes again!—Look from the battlements, Rose, while I awaken the priest and thy father."

"Dearest lady," said Rose, "I dare not—What can this sound be that is heard by one only?—You are deceived by the rush of the river."

"I would not alarm the castle unnecessarily," said Evelyn, pausing, "or even break your father's peaceful slumbers by a fancy of mine—But hark—hark—I hear it again—distinct amidst the intermittent sound of the rushing water—a low tremulous sound, mingled with a tinkling like smiths or armourers at work upon their anvils."

Rose had by this time sprung up on the banquet, and flinging back her rich tresses of fair hair, had applied her hand behind her ear to collect the distant sound. "I hear it," she cried, "and it increases—Awake them, for Heaven's sake, and without a moment's delay!"

Evelyn accordingly started the sleepers with the reversed end of the lance, and as they started to their feet in haste, she whispered, in a hoarse but earnest voice, "To arms—the Welsh are upon us!"

"What—where?" said William Flammeck, "where be they?"

"Listen, and you will hear them arming," she replied.

"The noise is but in thine own fancy, lady," said the Fleming, whose organs were of the same heavy character with his form and his disposition. "I would I had not gone to sleep at all, since I was to be awakened so soon."

"Nay, but listen, good Flammeck—the sound of armour comes from the north-east."

"The Welsh be not in that quarter, lady," said Wilkin, "and, besides, they wear no armour."

"I hear it—I hear it!" said Father Aldrovand, who had been listening for some time. "All praise to St. Benedict! Our Lady of the Garde Doloureuse has been gracious to her servants as ever! It is the tramp of horse—it is the clash of armour—the chivalry of the Marches are coming to our relief—Kyrie Eleison!"

"I hear something too," said Flammeck,—"something like the hollow sound of the great sea, when it bursts into my neighbour Klinkerian's warehouse, and rolled his pots and pans against each other. But it were an evil mistake, father, to take foam for friends—we were best rouse the people."

"Tush!" said the priest, "talk to me of pots and bottles! Was I nurse of the baby to Count Stephen Mauleverer for twenty years, and do I not know the tramp of a war horse, or the clash of a mail coat? But call the men to the walls at any rate, and have me the best drawn up in the hall—we may help them by a rally."

That wd. not be rashly undertaken with my consent," murmured the Fleming, "but to the wall if you will, and in good time. But keep your Normans and English silent, Sir Priest, else their unruly and noisy joy will awaken the Welsh camp, and prepare them for their unwelcome visitors."

The monk laid his finger on his lip in sign of intelligence, and they parted in opposite directions, each to rouse the defenders of the castle, who were soon busied drawing from all quarters to their posts upon the walls, with hearts in a very different mood from that in which they had descended from them. The almost custom being used to prevent noise, the opening of the walls was accomplished in silence, and the garrison awaited in breathless expectation the success of the forces who were rapidly advancing to their relief.

The character of the sounds, which now loudly awakened the silence of this eventful night, could no longer be mistaken. They were distinguishable from the rushing of a mighty river, or from the booming sound of distant thunder, by the sharp and angry notes which the clashing of the rulers' arms mingled with the deep bass of the horses' rapid tread. From the long continuance of the sounds, their length, and the extent of horizon from which they seemed to come, all in the castle were satisfied that the approaching relief consisted of several very strong bodies of horse. At once this mighty sound came as if the earth on which they trode had order & ceased the armed squadrons, or had become capable of rebounding to their tramp. The defenders of the Garde Doloureuse concluded that their friends had made a sudden halt to give their horses breath & assume the leaguer of the enemy, and with the aid of the attack upon them. The pause, however, was but momentary.

The British, so alert at surprising their arms, were themselves, on many occasions, liable to surprise. Their men were undisciplined, and somewhat negligent of the patient duties of the sentinel; and besides, their foragers and flying parties, who swept the country during the preceding day, had brought back tidings which had lulled them into false security. Their camp had been therefore carelessly guarded, and confident in the smallness of the garrison, they altogether neglected the important military duty of establishing patrols and outposts at a proper distance from their main body. Thus the cavalry of the Lord Marcher, notwithstanding the noise which accompanied their advance, had approached very near the British camp, without exciting the least alarm. So while they were arranging their forces into regular columns in order to commence the attack, and an increasing clamour among the Welsh announced that they were at length aware of their danger. To shrill and discordant cries by which they endeavoured to assemble their men, each under the banner of his chief, succeeded from their leaguer. But their rallying shouts were soon converted into screams, and cries of horror and dismay, when the thundering charge of the barbed horses and heavily armed cavalry of the Anglo-Normans surprised their undefended camp.

Yet not even under circumstances so adverse did the descendants of the ancient Britons renounce their defence, or forget that old hereditary privilege, to be called the bravest of mankind. Their cries of defence and resistance were heard resounding above the groans of the wounded, the shouts of the triumphing assailants, and the universal tumult of the night battle. It was not until the morning light began to peep forth, that the slaughter or dispersion of Llewelyn's forces was complete, and that the "caruleant voice of victory" arose in uncontrolled and unthought energy of exultation.

Then the bravest, if they could be well or truly looking from their towers over the expanded camp beneath a increased nothing but one wide-spread scene of desolatory flight and unrelaxed pursuit. That the Welsh had been permitted to encamp in feared proximity upon the hither side of the river now rendered their discomfiture more dreadfully fatal. The rapid pass by which they could cross to the other side was now completely choked by fugitives, on whom our eager the echoes of the victorious Normans. But they threw themselves into the river, upon the precarious chance of gaining the farther side, and, except a few who were uncommonly strong, skilful, and arms perched among the rocks and in the currents, others more fortunate, rescued by fords, with which they had accidentally been made acquainted, many dispersed, or, in small bands, fled in reckless despair to—

"It is the sharp and angry clang made by the steel weapons of Norman cavalry ringing against the steel-capped mail of Llewelyn, bringing their approach from a distance. The clank of the armour of knights, armed cap-a-pie, must have been such that every dreamer could were the castle, as if the fortress, which had been their place of refuge, could be a place of refuge to them in their present forlorn condition, while there roamed wildly over the plain, seeking only escape from immediate and instant danger, without knowing whether they ran.

The Normans, mean while, divided into small parties, followed and slaughtered them at pleasure; while, as a rallying point for the victors, the castle of Hugo de Lacy streamed from a small mound, on which Owenwyn had lately pitched his camp, and surrounded by a competent force, both of infantry and horsemen, which the experienced Baron permitted on no account to wander far from it.

The rest, as we have already said, followed the chase with shouts of exultation and of vengeance, singing around the battlements, which resounded with the cry, "Ha, Nigel Edward!—Ha, Nigel Edward!—Strike—slay—no quarter to the Welsh wolves—think on Raymond Berenger!"

The soldiers on the walls joined in these vigorous and victorious clamours, and discharged several sheaves of arrows upon such fugitives as, in their extremity approached too near the castle. They would fain have rallied to give more active assistance in the work of destruction, but the castle-moat being now open with the Constable of Chester, and Wilkin Flammoock considered himself under no obligation to be under the orders of that renowned chief, and refused to listen to the eager admonitions of Father Aldrovand, who would, notwithstanding his ecclesiastical character, have willingly himself taken charge of the rally which he proposed.

At length, the scene of slaughter seemed at an end. The retreat was blown on many a bugle, and knights halted on the plain to collect their persons, followers, muster them under their proper pennons, and then march them slowly back to the great stand of their leader, around which the many banners were again to be assembled, like the clouds which gather around the evening sun—a fanciful notion, which might yet be drawn farther, in respect of the level rays of strong lurid light which shot from those dark battlements, as the beams were flung back from their polished armour.

The plain was in this manner soon cleared of the horsemen, and remained occupied only by the dead bodies of the slaughtered Welshmen. The bands who had followed the pursuit to a great distance were also now seen returning, driving before them the drooping after them, dejected and unhappy captives, to whom they had given quarter when their thirst of blood was satiated.

It was then that, desirous to attract the attention of his hearers, Wilkin Flammoock commanded all the banners of the castle to be displayed, and a general shout of acclamation from those who had fought under them. It was answered by a shout of joy from De Lacy's army, which might even yet have startled such of the Welsh fugitives, as, far distant from this disastrous scene of flight, might have ventured to halt for a moment's repose.

Presently after this greeting had been exchanged, a single rider advanced from the Constable's army towards the castle showing, even at a distance, an unusual dexterity of horsemanship, and great agility of deportment. He arrived at the draw-bridge, which was instantly lowered to admit him, where Wilkin Flammoock and the monk (for the latter, as far as we can ascertain, associated himself with the former in a voluntary capacity) hastened to receive the envoy of their deliverer. They found him just alighted from the palfrey, a creature of speed, which was slightly flecked with black, and was as fleet as an arrow, and still panted with the exertions of the evening, though, answering to the evening, and of his youthful rider, he arched his neck, shook his stout caparison, and snorted, to announce his unabated mettle and unwearied love of combat. The young man's eager look bore the same token of unobscured vigour, mingled with the signs of recent exertion. His helmet hanging at his saddle-bow showed a gallant countenance, colouring highly but not inflamed, which looked out from a rich profusion of short chestnut curls; and although his armour was of a massive and ample form, he moved under it with such elasticity and ease, that it seemed a graceful attire, not a burden or encumbrance. A furled mantle had not sat on him with more easy grace than the heavy hauberk, which complied with every gesture of his noble form. Yet his countenance was so juvenile, that only the down on the upper lip announced decisively the approach to manhood. The females who thronged into the court to see the first envoy of their deliverers, could not forbear mixing praises of his beauty with blessings on his valour, and one comely middle-aged dame, in particular, distinguished by the tightness with which her scarlet hose sat on a well-shaped leg and ankle, and by the cleanness of her coat, pressed close up to the young squire, and, more forward than the rest, doubled the crimson hue of his cheek, by crying aloud, that Our Lady of the Garde Doloureuse had sent them news of their redemption by an angel from the sanctuary, —a speech which, although Father Aldrovand shook his head, was received by her companions with such general acclamation, as greatly embarrassed the young man's modesty.

"Peace, all of ye!" said Wilkin Flammoock—"Know you no respects, you women, or have you never seen a young gentleman before, that you hang on him like bees on a honeysuckle? Stand back, I say, and let us hear in peace what are the commands of the noble Lord of Lacy."

"Those," said the young man, "I can only deliver in the presence of the right noble demesne, Evelyn Berenger, if I may be thought worthy of such honour."

"That thou art, noble sir," said the same forward dame, who had before expressed her admiration so energetically; "I will uphold thee worthy of his presence, and whatever other grace a lady can do for thee."

"Now hold thy tongue, with a wamion!" said the monk; while in the same breath the Fleming exclaimed, "Reware the cucking-stool, Dame Scout-o'-Grace!" while he conducted the noble youth across the court.

"Let my good horse be cared for," said the cavalier, as he put the bridle into the hand of a menial; and, as doing so got rid of some part of his female retinue, who began to pet and praise the steed as much as they had done the rider; and come, in the enthusiasm of their joy, hardly abstained from kissing the stirrups and horse furniture.

But Dame Gillian was not so easily diverted from her own point as were some of her companions. She continued to repeat the word cucking-stool, till the Fleming was out of hearing, and then became more specific in her obprobrium—"And why cucking-stool, I pray, Sir Wilkin Butterbitch? You are the man would stop an English mouth with a Flemish lamash nokin, I trow! Marry quet, my cousin the reaver! And why the cucking stool, I pray?—because my young lady is comely, and the young squire a man of mettle, reverence to his beard that is to come yet! Have we not eyes to see, and have we not a mouth and a tongue?"

"In troth, Dame Gillian, they do you wrong who doubt it," said Evelyn's norm, who stood by; "but I prithee, keep it short now, were it but for womanhood."

"How now, manerly Mrs. Margery?" replied the ever-glib Gillian; "in your heart so high, because you dandled our young lady on your knee fifteen years since?—Let me tell you, the cat will find its way to the cream, though it was brought up on an abbess's lap."

"Home, housewife—home!" exclaimed her husband, the old huntsman, who was weary of this public exhibition of his domestic management—"home, or I will give you a taste of my dog-leash—Here are both the confessor and Wilkin Flammoock wondering at your impudence."

"Jadard!" replied Gillian; "and are not two forty enough for wonderment, that you must come with your grave pates to make up the number three?"

There was a general laugh at the huntsman's exas, apprized all, that the obsequies of the valiant Raymond Berenger were about to commence. From an ent, which had been hastily pitched for the immediate reception of the body, twelve black monks, the inhabitants of a neighbouring convent, began to file in pairs, headed by their abbot, who bore a large cross, and thundered forth the sublime notes of the holy Miserere me, Domine. Then came a company of men-at-arms, training their lances, with their vis reversed and pointed to the earth, and after to the body of the valiant Berenger, wrapped in its own knightly banner, which, regained from the hands of the Welsh, now served its noble owner as of a funeral pall. The most gallant knights and Constable's household (for, like other great lords of that period, he had formed it upon a scale which approached to that of royalty) walked as warriors and supporters of the corpse, which was so upon litters, and the Constable of Chester self, alone and fully armed, excepting the head, swayed as chief mourner. A chosen body of squires, knights-at-arms, and pages of noble descent, brought up rear of the procession, while their masters and masters echoed back from time to time, the melancholy song of the monks, by replying in a note as obvious as their own.

his course of pleasure was arrested, and even that sorrow was for a moment turned from her own fate, to witness the last honours bestowed on him, who had been in life the father and guardian of his child.

the mournful procession traversed slowly the plain which had been within a few hours the scene of such sad events; and, pausing before the outer gate of the baronial castle, invited by a prolonged solemn flourish, the fortress to receive the remains of its late gallant defender. The melancholy summons was answered by the warder's horn—the draw-bridge sunk—the portcullis rose—and Father Aldred appeared in the middle of the gateway, arrayed in sacerdotal habit, whilst a little space behind stood the orphaned damsel, in such weeds of mourning as have admitted, supported by her attendants, and followed by the females of the household.

The Constable of Chester paused upon the threshold of the outer gate, and, pointing to the cross signed in its cloth upon his left shoulder with a lowly veneration, turned to his nephew, Damian, the task attending the remains of Raymond Berenger to chapel within the castle. The soldiers of Hugo Lacy, most of whom were bound by the same oath with himself, also halted without the castle gate, remained under arms, while the death-peal of the great bell announced from within, the progress of the procession.

winded on through those narrow entrances, which were skilfully contrived to interrupt the progress of an enemy, even should he succeed in forcing the outer gate, and arrived at length in the inner court-yard, where most of the inhabitants of the fortress, and those who, under recent circumstances, had taken refuge there, were drawn up, in order to look, for the last time, on their departed lord. Among these were mingled a few of the motley and from without, whom curiosity or the expectation of a dole, had brought to the castle gate, and who, by one argument or another, had obtained the warders permission to enter the interior.

the body was here set down before the door of the chapel, the ancient Gothic front of which formed the side of the court-yard, until certain prayers were read by the priests, in which the crowd around was supposed to join with becoming reverence.

was during this interval, that a man, whose red beard, embroidered girdle, and high crowned of gray felt, gave him the air of a Lombard merchant, addressed Margery the nurse of Eveline in a speaking tone, and with a foreign accent—"I am swelling merchant, good sister, and am come in quest of gain. Can you tell me whether I have any custom in this castle?"

You are come at an evil time, Sir Stranger—you yourself see that this is a place for mourning, not for merchandize."

"Yet mourning times have their own commerce," said the stranger, approaching still closer to the side of Margery, and lowering his voice to a tone yet more confidential. "I have sable scarfs of Persian silk—black bugles, in which a princess might mourn for a deceased monarch—cypress, such as the East hath seldom sent forth—black cloth for mourning hangings—all that may express sorrow and reverence in fashion and attire; and I know how to be grateful to those who help me to custom. Come, bethink you, good dame—such things must be had—I will sell as good ware and as cheap as another; and a kirtle to yourself, or, at your pleasure, a purse with five florins, shall be the meed of your kindness."

"I prithee peace, friend," said Margery, "and choose a better time for venturing your wares—you neglect both place and season; and if you be farther importunate, I must speak to those who will show you the outward side of the castle gate. I marvel the warders would admit pedlars upon a day such as this—they would drive a painful bargain by the bedside of their mother, were she dying, I trow." So saying, she turned scornfully from him.

While thus angrily rejected on the one side, the merchant felt his cloak receive an intelligent twitch upon the other, and, looking round upon the signal, he saw a dame, whose black kerchief was affectingly disposed, so as to give an appearance of solemnity to a set of light laughing features, which must have been captivating when young, since they retained so many good points when at least forty years had passed over them. She winked to the merchant, touching at the same time her under lip with her forefinger, to announce the propriety of silence and secrecy; then gliding from the crowd, retreated to a small recess formed by a projecting buttress of the chapel, as if to avoid the pressure likely to take place at the moment when the hearse should be lifted. The merchant failed not to follow her example, and was soon by her side, when she did not give him the trouble of opening his affairs, but commenced the conversation herself.

"I have heard what you said to our dame Margery. Manfully Margery, as I call her—heard as much, at least, as led me to guess the rest, for I have got an eye in my head, I promise you."

"A pair of them, my pretty dame, and as bright as drops of dew in a May morning."

"Oh, you say so, because I have been weeping," said the scarlet-hooded Gillian, for it was even herself who spoke, "and to be sure, I have good cause, for our lord was always my very good lord, and would sometimes chuck me under the chin, and call me buxom Gillian of Croydon—not that the good gentleman was ever uncivil, for he would thrust a silver twopenny into my hand at the same time.—Oh! the friend that I have lost!—And I have had anger on his account too—I have seen old Raoul as sour as vinegar, and fit for no place but the kennel for a whole day about it; but as I said to him, it was not for the like of me to be affronting our master, and a great baron, about a chuck under the chin, or a hum, or such like."

"No wonder you are so sorry for so kind a master, dame," said the merchant.

"No wonder indeed," replied the dame, with a sigh; "and then what is to become of us?—It is like my young mistress will go to her aunt—or she will marry one of these Lacys that they talk so much of—or, at any rate she will leave the castle; and it's like old Raoul and I will be turned to grass with the lord's old chargers. The lord knows, they may as well hang him up with the old hounds, for he is both footless and fangless, and fit for nothing on earth that I know of."

"Your young mistress is that lady in the mourning mantle," said the merchant, "who so nearly sunk down upon the body just now?"

"In good troth is she, sir—and much cause she has to sink down. I am sure she will be to seek for such another father."

"I see you are a most discerning woman, gossip Gillian," answered the merchant; "and yonder youth that supported her is her bridegroom?"

"Must need she has for some one to support her," said Gillian; "and so have I for that matter, for what can poor old rusty Raoul do?"

"But as to your young lady's marriage?" said the merchant.

"No one knows more, than that such a thing was in treaty between our late lord and the great Lion-able of Chester that came to-day but not in time to prevent the Welsh from cutting his throat, and doing the Lord knoweth what mischief besides. But there is a marriage talked of that is certain, and most folk think it must be for this squelch-checked boy, Damian, as they call him, for though the Constable has gotten a heart which I am somehow hush not, it is something too grazed for a bridegroom's chin—Brides, he goes to the Holy Wars—the fittest place for all elderly warriors—I wish he would take Raoul with him. But what is all this to what you were saying about your mourning wars even now?—It is a sad truth, that my poor Lord is gone—But what then?—Well-a-day, you know the good old saw,— "Cloth must we wear,

But beef and drink bear,
Though the dead go to him."

And for your mer-handing, I am as like to help you with my good word as Manneely Marnory, provided you bid fair for it; more, if the lady loves me not so much, I can turn the steward round my finger."

"Take this in part of our bargain, pretty Mrs. Gillian," said the merchant; "and when my wains come up, I will consider you amply, if I get good sale by your favourable report. But how shall I get into the castle again? for I would wish to consult you, being a sensible woman, before I come in with my luggage."

"Why," answered the complaisant dame, "if our English be on guard, you have only to ask for Gillian, and they will open the wicket to any single man at once; for we English stick all together, were it but to spite the Normans;—but if a Norman be on duty, you must ask for old Raoul, and say you come to speak of dogs and hawks for sale, and I warrant you come to speak of me that way. If the sentinel be a Fleming, you have but to say you are a merchant, and he will let you in for the love of trade."

The merchant repeated his thankful acknowledgment, glided from her side, and mixed among the spectators, leaving her to congratulate herself on having gained a brace of fawns by the indulgence of her natural talkative humour; for which, on other occasions, she had sometimes dearly paid.

The ceasing of the heavy toll of the castle bell now gave intimation that the noble Raymond Berenger had been laid in the vault with his fathers. That part of the funeral attendants who had come from the host of De Lacy now proceeded to the castle hall, where they partook, but with temperance, of some refreshments, which were offered as a death-meal; and presently after left the castle, headed by young Damian, in the same slow and melancholy form in which they had entered. The monks remained within the castle to sing repeated services for the soul of the deceased, and for those of his faithful men-at-arms who had fallen around him, and who had been so much mangled during, and after, the contest with the Welsh, that it was scarce possible to know one individual from another; otherwise the body of Damian Moralt would have obtained, as his faith well deserved, the honours of a separate funeral.*

CHAPTER XI.

—The funeral baked meats
Did coldly furnish forth the marriage tables.—Hamlet.

The religious rites which followed the funeral of Raymond Berenger, endured without interruption for the period of six days, during which, alms were distributed to the poor, and relief administered, at the expense of the Lady Evelina, to all those who had suffered by the late inroad. Death works, as they were termed, were also spread in honour of the deceased; but the lady herself, and most of her attendants, observed a stern course of fast, discipline, and austerities, which appeared to the Normans a more decorous manner of testifying their respect for the dead, than the Saxon and Flemish custom of banqueting and drinking inordinately upon such occasions.

Meantime, the Constable De Lacy retained a large body of his men encamped under the walls of the Garde Doloureuse, for protection against any new irruption of the Welsh, while with the rest he took advantage of his victory, and struck terror on the British by many well-conducted forays, made with ravages scarcely less hurtful than their own. Among the enemy, the evils of discord were added to those of defeat and invasion; for two distant rulers of Gwynwyn contended for the throne he had lately occupied, and on this, as on many other occasions, the Britons suffered as much from internal dissension as from the sword of the Normans. A worse politician, and a less celebrated soldier, than the sagacious and successful De Lacy, could not have failed, under such circumstances, to negotiate as he did an advantageous peace, which, while it deprived Powys of a part of its frontier, and the command of some important passes, in which it was the Constable's purpose to build castles, rendered the Garde Doloureuse more secure than formerly, from any sudden attack on the part of their fiery and restless neighbours. De Lacy's care also went to re-establishing the settlers who had fled from their possessions, and getting the whole lordship, which now descended upon an unprotected female, into a state of defence as perfect as its situation on a hostile frontier could possibly permit.

What thus anxiously provided for the safety of the orphan of the Garde Doloureuse, De Lacy, during the space we have mentioned, sought not to disturb her by any personal intercourse. His nephew, indeed, was deputed by him, every morning to lay before her his uncle's orders, in the soft-flowing language of the day, and acquaint her with the steps which he had taken in her affairs. As a matter due to his relative's high services, Damian was always admitted to her presence on such occasions, and returned charged with her grateful thanks on her implicit acquiescence in whatever the Constable proposed for her consideration.

But when the days of rigid mourning were elapsed, the young De Lacy stated, on the part of his guardian, that his treaty with the Welsh being concluded, and all things in that district arranged as well as circumstances would permit, the Constable of Chester now proposed to return into his own country, in order to resume his instant preparations for the Rhyl Land, which the duty of chastising her resumed in for some days interrupted.

"And will not the noble Constable, before he departs from this place," said Evelina, with a burst of gratitude which the occasion well merited, "return the personal thanks of her that was ready to perish when he so valiantly came to her aid?"

"It was even on that point that I was summoned to speak," replied Damian; "but my uncle's kinsmen were diffident to propose to you that which he most earnestly desires—the privilege of speaking to your own ear certain matters of high import, as with which he judges it fit to interest the third party."

"Surely," said the maiden, blushing, "there can be sought beyond the bounds of immodesty, in my seeing the noble Constable whenever such a pleasure."

"But his vow," replied Damian, "bids my mistress not to come beneath a roof until he sets out in of arranging the ladies of their state entombment. Every one must remember Shakespeare's account, how — "The noble Mortimer,

Leading the men of Herefordshire to fight Against the invader and wild Glendower—
Was, by the rude hands of that Welshman, slain,
And a thousand of his people butcher'd
Upon whose dead corpses there was much mining,
Such basely shameful transformation,
In those Welshmen done, as may well be,
Without much shame, related or spoken of."

* The Welsh, a fierce and barbarous people, were often accused Palatine; and in order to meet him, you must go far as to visit his pavilion—a condensation which, as a knight and Norman noble, he can scarcely ask of a dame of high degree.”

“And is that all?” said Eveleen, who, situated in a remote situation, was a stranger to some of the nice points of etiquette which the diamonds of the time observed in keeping their seats towards the other sex. “Shall I not, she said, go to render my thanks to my deliverer, since he cannot come hither to receive them? Tell the noble Hugo de Lacy that, next to my great debt to Heaven, it is due to him, and to his brave companions in arms. I will rush to his tent as to a holy shrine, and, could such homage please him, I would come bareheaded, were the road strewn with thorns and with thorns.”

“My uncle will be equally honoured and delighted with your resolve,” said Damian, “but it will be his study to save you all unnecessary trouble, and with that view a pavilion shall be instantly pitched before your castle gate, which, if it please you to grace it with your presence, may be the place for the desired interview.”

Eveleen readily acquiesced in what was proposed, as the expedient agreeable to the Constable, and recommended by Damian; but, in the simplicity of her heart, she saw no good reason why under the garb of the latter, she should not instantly, and without farther form, have recovered the little familiar plain on which, when a child, she used to chase her kirtles and gather king’s-cups, and where of later years she was wont to exercise her palfrey on the well-known plain, being the only space, and that of small extent, which separated her from the camp of the Constable.

The youthful enthusiast with whom previous she had now become familiar, retired to acquaint his kinsman and led with the success of his commission; and Eveleen experienced the first sensation of anxiety upon her own account which had agitated her bosom, since the defeat and death of Gwenwyn gave her permission to dedicate her thoughts exclusively to grief, for the loss which she had sustained in the person of her noble father. But now when that grief, though not allayed, was blunted by ordinary indulgence, she felt that she was to appear before the person of whose name she had heard so much, of whose power and protection she had received such recent proofs, her mind necessarily turned upon the nature and consequences of that important interview. She had seen Hugo de Lacy indeed, at the great tournament at Chester, where his valour and skill were the theme of every tongue, and she had received the homage which he rendered her beauty when he assigned to her the prize, with all the gay flutterings of youthful vanity; but of his person and figure she had no distinct idea, excepting that he was a middle-aged man, dressed in particularly rich armour, and that the eagle feathers, which issued out from under the shade of his raised visor, seemed to her juvenile estimate scarcely nearly as old as that of her father. This person, of whom she had such slight recollection, had been the chosen instrument employed by her mother’s persecutions in rescuing her from captivity and in avenging the loss of a father, and she was bound by her vow to consider him as the arbiter of her fate, if indeed he should deem it worth his while to become so. She wandered her memory with vain efforts to recollect so much of his features as might give her some means of guessing at his disposition, and her judgment failed in conjecturing what kind of conduct he was likely to pursue towards her.

The great Baron himself seemed to attach to their meeting a degree of consequence, which was augmented by the formal preparations which he made for it. Eveleen had imagined that he might have ridden to the gate of the castle in five minutes, and that, if a speech were actually necessary to the decorum of their interview, a time could have been transferred from his leisure to the castle gate, and pitched there in ten minutes more. But it was plain that the Constable considered much more form and ceremony as essential to their meeting; for in about half an hour after Damian de Lacy had left the castle, not fewer than twenty soldiers and archers, under the direction of a purveyor, whose shield was decorated with the armorial bearings of the house of Lacy, were employed in erecting before the gate of the Castle Duloerme one of those splendid pavilions, which were employed at tournaments and other occasions of public show. It was of purple silk, valanced with gold embroidery, having the cords of the same rich material. The door-way was formed by six lances, the shafts of which were plated with silver, and the blades composed of the same precious metal. These were pitched into the ground by guises, and crossed at the top, so as to form a sort of succession of arches, which were covered by drapery of emerald green silk, forming a pleasing contrast with the purple and gold.

The interior of the tent was decorated by Dame Gillian and others, whose curiosity induced them to visit it, to be of a splendour agreeing with the outside. There were Oriental carpets, and there were tapestries of Taber and Bruges mingled in gay profusion, while the top of the pavilion, covered with sky blue silk, was arranged so as to resemble the firmament, and richly adorned with a sun, moon, and stars, composed of solid silver. This gorgeous pavilion had been made for the use of the celebrated William of Ypres, who acquired such great wealth as general of the mercenaries of King Stephen, and was by him created Earl of Albemarle; but the chance of war had assigned it to De Lacy after one of the dreadful engagements in which he occurred during the civil wars between Stephen and the Empress Matilda, or Matilda. The Constable had never before been known to use it, for although wealthy and powerful, Hugo de Lacy was, on most occasions, plain and unostentatious, which, to those who knew him, made his present conduct seem the more remarkable. At the hour of noon he arrived nobly mounted, at the gate of the castle, and drawing up a small body of servants, pages, and squires, who attended him in their richest liveries, placed himself at their head, and directed his nephew to intimate to the Lady of the Castle Duloerme, that the husband of her servants awaited the honour of her presence at the castle gate.

Among the spectators who witnessed his arrival, there were many who thought that some part of the taste and splendour attached to his pavilion and his retinue had been better applied to set forth the person of the Constable himself, as his attire was simple even to meanness, and his person by no means of such distinguished bearing as might altogether dispense with the advantages of dress and ornament. The opinion became yet more prevalent, when he descended from his horse, and when time was unobtrusively management of the noble animal he bestowed, gave a dignity to his person and figure, which he lost upon dismounting from his steel saddle. In height, the celebrated Constable scarce attained the middle size, and his limbs, though strongly built and well knit, were deficient in grace and elegance of movement. His legs were slightly curved, and his gait, though good, was altogether as a horseman’s. He was not very slightly, in consequence of one of his legs having been broken by the fall of a charger, and gradually set by an inexperienced surgeon. This was a very a blemish in his department, and though he bore it with a staid and ungraceful character. His language and gestures were those of one seldom used to converse with equals, more seldom and with superiors; short, abrupt, and decisive, almost to the verge of sternness. In the judgment of those who were habitually acquainted with the Constable, there was both dignity and hardness in his large eye and expanded brow, but such as now him for the first time judged less favourably, and pretended to discover a harsh and passionate expression, although they allowed his countenance to have, on the whole, a bold and martial character. His age was in reality not more than two-and-forty, but the fatigues of war and of climate had added in appearance ten years to that period of time. By far the plainest dressed man of the train, he wore only a short Norman mantle, over the close dress of shamoy-leather, which, almost always covered by his armour, was in some places slightly soiled by its pressure. A brown hat, in which he wore a sprig of rosemary in memory of his vow served for his head-gear—his good sword and dagger hung at a belt made of seal-skin.

Thus accoutred, and at the head of a glittering and gilded band of retainers, who watched his slightest glance, the Constable of Chester awaited the arrival of the Lady Eveline Berenger, at the gate of her castle of Dolourous.

The trumpet from within announced her presence—the bridge fell, and, led by Damian de Lacy in his gayest habit, and followed by her train of female, and menial or vassal attendants, she came forth in her loveliness from under the massive and antique portal of her paternal fortress. She was dressed with out ornaments of any kind, and in deep mourning weeds, as best befitting her recent loss; forming, in this respect, a strong contrast with the rich attire of her conductor, whose costly dress gleamed with jewels and embroidery, while their age and personal beauty made them in every other respect the fair counterpart of each other; a circumstance which probably gave rise to the delighted murmur and buzz which passed through the bystanders on their appearance, and which only respect for the deep mourning of Eveline prevented from breaking out into shouts of applause.

The instant that the fair foot of Eveline had made a step beyond the palisades which formed the outward barrier of the castle, the Constable de Lacy came forward to meet her, and, bending his right knee to the earth, craved pardon for the discourtesy which his vow had imposed on him, while he expressed his sense of the honour with which she now graced him, as one for which his life, devoted to her service, would be an inadequate acknowledgment.

The action and speech, though both in consistency with the romantic gallantry of the times, embarrassed Eveline; and the rather that this homage was so publicly rendered. She entreated the Constable to stand up, and not to add to the confusion of one who was already sufficiently at a loss how to acquit herself of the heavy debt of gratitude which she owed him. The constable arose accordingly, after saluting her hand, which she extended to him, and prayed her, since she was so far condescending, to deign to enter the poor hut he had prepared for her shelter, and to grant him the honour of the audience he had solicited. Eveline, without further answer than a bow, yielded him her hand, and, desiring the rest of her train to remain where they were, commanded the attendance of Rose Flainmoch.

"Lady," said the Constable, "the matters of which I am compelled thus hastily to speak, are of a nature the most private."

"This maiden," replied Eveline, "is my lower-woman, and acquainted with my most inward thoughts; I beseech you to permit her presence at our conference."

"It were better otherwise," said Hugo de Lacy with some embarrassment; "but your pleasure shall be obeyed."

He led the Lady Eveline into the tent, and entreated her to be seated on a large pile of cushions, covered with rich Venetian silk. Rose placed herself behind her mistress, half kneeling upon the same cushions, and watched the motions of the all-accomplished soldier and statesman, whom the voice of fame lauded so loudly; enjoying his embarrassment as a triumph of her sex, and scarcely of opinion that his shamoy doublet and square form accorded with the splendour of the scene, or the almost angelic beauty of Eveline, the other actor therein.

"Lady," said the Constable, after some hesitation, "I would willingly say what it is my lot to tell you, in such terms as ladies love to listen to, and which surely your excellent beauty more especially deserves; but I have been too long trained in camps and councils to express my meaning otherwise than simply and plainly."

"I shall the more easily understand you, my lord," said Eveline, trembling, though she scarce knew why.

"My story, then, must be a blunt one. Something there passed between your honourable father and myself, touching a union of our houses. He meant, as a he would have expected Eveline to say something, but, as she was silent, he proceeded. 'I would to God that as he was at the beginning of this treaty, it had,' said Heaven he should have considered and concluded it with his usual wisdom, but what remedy? he has gone the path which we must all tread!'

"Your lordship," said Eveline, "has nobly avenged the death of your noble friend."

"I have but done my duty, lady, as a great knight in defence of an endangered maiden, a lover in protection of the frontier, and a friend in saving his friend. But to the point. Your lordship's line draws near to a close. Of my remnant, small Randal Lacy, I will not speak; for in his life nothing that is good or hopeful, nor have we long one for many years. My nephew, Damian, gave hopeful promise to be a worthy branch of a noble tree, but he is scarce twenty years old, and has a long career of adventure and peril to encounter, or he can honourably propose to himself the duties of domestic privacy or matrimonial engagement. His mother also is English, some abatement perhaps of the recent heat of his arms, yet, had ten years more passed over him with the honours of chivalry, I should have pursued Damian de Lacy for the happiness to which I at present aspire."

"You, you, my lord!—it is impossible!" said Eveline, endeavouring at the same time to suppress that could be offensive in the surprise which she could not help exhibiting.

"I do not wonder," replied the Constable calmly, "for, the veil now being broken, he resumed the natural plainness of his manner and character: that you express surprise at this daring proposal, I have not perhaps the form that pleases a lady's eye, and I have forgotten, that is, if ever I knew them, the words and phrases which please a lady's ear, but, still Eveline, the Lady of Hugh de Lacy will be one of the foremost among the matrons of England."

"It will be better become the individual to whom so high a dignity is offered," said Eveline, "to consider how far she is capable of discharging its duties."

"Of that I fear nothing," said de Lacy. "She who hath been so excellent a daughter, cannot be less estimable in every other relation in life."

"I do not find that confidence in myself, my lord," replied the embarrassed maiden, "with which you are so willing to treat me. And I—forgive me—must crave time for other inquiries as well as those which respect myself."

"Your father, noble lady, had this union written at heart. This scroll, signed with his own hand, will show it. He bent his knee as he gave the paper. 'The wife of de Lacy will have, as the daughter of Raymond Berenger merits, the rank of a princess, his widow, the dowry of a queen.'"

"Mark me out with your knee, my lord, while you plead to me the paternal commands, which, joined to other circumstances." She paused, and sighed deeply. "Leave me, perhaps, but little room for my will!"

Emboldened by this answer, de Lacy, who had hitherto remained on his knee, rose gently and assuming a seat beside the Lady Eveline, continued to press his suit, not indeed in the language of passion, but of a plain spoken man, eagerly urging a point on which his happiness depended. The vision of the miraculous image was, it may be supposed, uppermost in the mind of Eveline, who, laid down by the solemn vow she had made on that occasion, felt herself constrained to return evasive answers, when she might perhaps have given a direct negative, had her own wish alone been to decide her reply.

"You cannot," she said, "expect from me my lord, in this my so recent orphan state, that I should enter so a speedy determination upon an affair of such deep importance. Give me leisure of your nobleness to consideration with myself—for consultation with my friends."

"Alas! fair Eveline," said the Baron, "do not be offended at my urgency. I cannot long delay setting forward on a distant and perilous expedition; and the short time left me for soliciting your favour, must be an apology for my importunity."

"And is it in these circumstances, noble De Lacy, that you would encumber yourself with family ties?" asked the maiden, timidly.

"I am God's soldier," said the Constable, "and He, in whose cause I fight in Palestine, will defend my wife in England."

"Hear then my present answer, my lord," said Eveline Berenger, rising from her seat. "To-morrow I proceed to the Benedictine nunnery at Gloucester, where resides my honoured father's sister, who is Abbess of that reverend house. To her guidance I will commit myself in this matter."

"A fair and maidenly resolution," answered De Lacy, who seemed, on his part, rather glad that the conference was abridged, "and, as I trust, not altogether unfavourable to the suit of your humble suppliant, since the good Lady Abbess hath been long my honoured friend." He then turned to Rose, who was about to attend her lady—"Pretty maiden," he said, offering a chain of gold, "let this carcanet encircle thy neck, and buy thy good-will."

"My good-will cannot be purchased, my lord," said Rose, putting back the gift which he proffered.

"Your fair word, then," said the Constable, again pressing it upon her.

"Fair words are easily bought," said Rose, still rejecting the chain, "but they are seldom worth the purchase-money."

"Do you scorn my proffer, damsel?" said De Lacy; "it has graced the neck of a Norman count?"

"Give it to a Norman countess, then, my lord," said the damsel; "I am plain Rose Flammoek, the weaver's daughter. I keep my good word to go with my good-will, and a latten chain will become me as well as beaten gold."

"Peace, Rose," said her lady; "you are over-male-part to talk thus to the Lord Constable.—And you, my lord," she continued, "permit me now to depart, since you are possessed of my answer to your present proposal. I regret it had not been of some less delicate nature, that by granting it at once, and without delay, I might have shown my sense of your services."

The lady was handed forth by the Constable of Chester, with the same ceremony which had been observed at their entrance, and she returned to her own castle, sad and anxious in mind for the event of this important conference. She gathered closely around her the great mourning veil, that the alteration of her countenance might not be observed; and, without pausing to speak even to Father Aldrovand, she instantly withdrew to the privacy of her own tower.

CHAPTER XII.

Now all ye ladies of this Scotland,
And ladies of England that happy would prove,
Marry never for beauty, nor marry for land,
Nor marry for nothing but only love.

Paddy Quarrail

When the Lady Eveline had retired into her own private chamber, Rose Flammoek followed her unbidden, and proffered her assistance in removing the large veil which she had worn while she was abroad; but the lady refused her permission, saying, "You are forward with service, maiden, when it is not required of you."

"You are displeased with me, lady?" said Rose.

"And if I am, I have cause," replied Eveline. "You know my difficulties—you know what my duty demands; yet, instead of aiding me to make the sacrifice, you render it more difficult."

"Would I had influence to guide your path!" said Rose; "you should find it a smooth one—ay, an honest and straight one, to boot!"

"How mean you, maiden?" said Eveline.

"I would have you," answered Rose, "recall the encouragement—the consent, I may almost call it, you have yielded to this proud baron. He is too great to be loved himself—too haughty to love you as you deserve. If you wed him, you wed gilded misery, and, it may be, dishonour as well as discontent."

"Remember, damsel," answered Eveline Berenger, "his services towards us."

"His services?" answered Rose. "He ventured his life for us, indeed, but so did every soldier in his host. And am I bound to wed any ruffing blade among them, because he fought when the trumpet sounded? I wonder what is the meaning of their devotion as they call it, when it shames them not to claim the highest reward woman can bestow, merely for discharging the duty of a gentleman by a distressed creature. A gentleman, said I? The coarsest boor in Flanders would hardly expect thanks for doing the duty of a man by women in such a case."

"But my father's wishes?" said the young lady.

"They had reference, without doubt, to the inclination of your father's daughter," answered the attendant. "I will not do my late noble lord—(may God amuse him!) the injustice to suppose he would have urged aught in this matter which squared not with your free choice."

"Then my vow—my fatal vow—as I had well nigh called it," said Eveline. "May Heaven forgive me my ingratitude to my patroness!"

"Even this shakes me not," said Rose; "I will never believe our Lady of Mercy would exact such a penalty for her protection, as to desire me to wed the man I could not love. She smiled, you say, upon your prayer. Go—lay at her feet those difficulties which oppress you, and see if she will not smile again. Or seek a dispensation from your vow—seek it at the expense of the half of your estate—seek it at the expense of your whole property. Go a pilgrimage barefooted to Rome—do any thing but give your hand where you cannot give your heart."

"You speak warmly, Rose," said Eveline, still sighing as she spoke.

"Alas! my sweet lady, I have cause. Have I not seen a household where love was not—where, although there was worth and good-will, and enough of the means of life, all was embittered by regrets, which were not only vain, but criminal?"

"Yet, methinks, Rose, a sense of what is due to ourselves and to others, may, if listened to, guide and comfort us under such feelings even as thou hast described."

"It will save us from sin, lady, but not from sorrow," answered Rose; "and wherefore should we, with our eyes open, rush into circumstances where duty must war with inclination? Why row against wind and tide, when you may as easily take advantage of the breeze?"

"Because the voyage of my life has where winds and currents oppose me," answered Eveline. "It is my fate, Rose."

"Not unless you make it such by choice," answered Rose. "O, could you but have seen the pale cheek, sunken eye, and dejected bearing of my poor mother!—I have said too much."

"It was then your mother," said her young lady, "of whose unhappy wedlock you have spoken?"

"It was—it was," said Rose, bursting into tears.

"I have exposed my own shame to save you from sorrow. Unhappy she was, though most guiltless—so unhappy, that the breach of the dyke, and the inundation in which she perished, were but for my sake, to her welcome as night to the weary labourer. She had a heart like yours, formed to love and be loved; and it would be doing honour to yonder proud Baron, to say he had such worth as my father's.—Yet was she most unhappy. O! my sweet lady, be warned, and break off this ill-omened match!"

Eveline returned the pressure with which the affectionate girl, as she clung to her hand, enforced her well-meant advice, and then muttered, with a profound sigh,—"Rose, it is too late."

"Never—never," said Rose, looking eagerly around the room. "Where are those writing materials?—Let me bring Father Aldrovand, and instruct him of your pleasure—or, stay, the good father hath himself an eye on the splendours of the world which he thinks he has abandoned—he will be no safe secretary—I will go myself to the Lord Constable—no his rank cannot dazzle, or his wealth bribe, or his power overawe. I will tell him he doth no knightly part towards you, to press his contract with your father in such an hour of helpless sorrow—no pious part, in delaying the execution of his vows for the purpose of marrying or giving in marriage—no honest part, to press him, as on a maiden whose heart has not decided in his favour—no wise part, to marry one whom he must presently abandon, either to solitude, or to the dangers of a profligate court."

"You have not courage for such an embassy, Rose," said her mistress, sadly smiling through her tears at her youthful attendant's zeal.

"Not courage for it!—and wherefore not?—Try me," answered the Flemish maiden, in return. "I am neither Saracen nor Welshman—his lance and sword scare me not. I follow not his banner—his voice of command concerns me not. I could with your leave, boldly tell him he is a selfish man, veiling with fair and honourable pretext his pursuit of objects which concern his own pride and gratification, and founding high claims on having rendered the services which common humanity demanded. And all for what?—Forsooth, the great De Lacy must have an heir to his noble house, and his fair nephew is not good enough to be his representative, because his mother was of Anglo-Saxon strain, and the real heir must be pure unmixed Norman; and for this Lady Evehne Borenger, in the first bloom of youth, must be wedded to a man who might be her father, and who, after leaving her unprotected for years, will return in such guise as might bewitch her grandfather!"

"Since he is thus scrupulous concerning purity of lineage," said Evehne, "perhaps he may call to mind—what so good a herald as he is cannot fail to know—that I am of Saxon strain by my father's mother."

"Oh," replied Rose, "he will forgive that blot in the banners of the Garde Doloureuse."

"Pie, Rose," answered her mistress, "thou dost him wrong in taxing him with avarice."

"Perhaps so," answered Rose; "but he is undeniably ambitious, and Avarice, I have heard, is Ambition's bastard brother, though Ambition be sometimes ashamed of the relationship."

"You speak too boldly, damsel," said Evehne; "and, while I acknowledge your affection, it becomes me to check your mode of expression."

"Nay, take that tone, and I have done," said Rose.—"To Evehne, whom I love, and who loves me, I can speak freely—but to the Lady of the Garde Doloureuse, the proud Norman damsel, (which when you choose to be you can be,) I can courtesy as low as my station demands, and speak as little truth as she craves to hear."

"Thou art a wild but a kind girl," said Evehne; "no one who did not know thee would think that soft and childish exterior covered such a soul of fire. Thy mother must indeed have been the bringer of feeling and passion you point her; for thy father—nay, nay, never arm in his defence until he be attacked—I only meant to say, that his cold sense and sound judgment are his most distinguished qualities."

"And I would you would avail yourself of them, lady," said Rose.

"In fitting things I will; but he were rather an unskilful counsellor in that which we now treat of," said Evehne.

"You mistake him," answered Rose Flammock, "and underrate his value. Sound judgment is like to the graduated measuring-rod, which, though usually applied only to coarse cloth, will give with equal truth the dime inches of Indian silk, or of cloth of gold."

"Well—well—this affair presses not instantly at least," said the young lady. "Leave me now, Rose, and send Gillian the firewoman hither—I have directions to give about the packing and removal of my wardrobe."

"That Gillian the firewoman hath been a mighty favourite of late," said Rose; "time was when it was otherwise."

"I like her manners as little as thou dost," said Evehne; "but she is old Raoul's wife—she was a sort of half-favourite with my dear father—who, like other men, was perhaps taken by that very freedom which we think unseemly in persons of our sex, and then, there is no other woman in the Castle that hath such skill in unpacking clothes without the risk of their being injured."

"That last reason alone," said Rose, smiling, "I admit, an irresistible pretension to favour, and Dame Gillian shall presently attend you—But take my advice, lady—keep her to her bailes and her maids, and let her not prate to you on what concerns her sex."

So saying, Rose left the apartment, and her young lady looked after her in silence—then murmured to herself—"Rose loves me truly; but she would willingly be more of the mistress than the maid, and then she is somewhat jealous of every other person that approaches me.—It is strange, that I have not seen Damian de Lacy since my interview with the Constable. He anticipates, I suppose, the chance of his finding in me a severe cast!"

But the domestica, who crowded for orders with reference to her removal early on the morrow, began now to divert the current of their lady's thoughts from the consideration of her own particular situation, which, as the prospect presented nothing pleasant, with the elastic spirit of youth, she willingly postponed till further leisure.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE world is not a rest,
There's ever change in changing;
We live by too much trust,
So we'll be up and ranging. —OLD SONG.

EARLY on the subsequent morning, a brilliant company assembled indeed by the deep morning which their progress was left the well-defended bank of the Garde Doloureuse, which had been so lately the scene of such remarkable events.

The sun was just beginning to exhale the heavy dew which had fallen during the night, and to disperse the dun gray mist which rested around trees and battlements, when William Flammock, with all his household on horseback, and as many warriors on foot as could forth from under the Gothic gateway, and crossed the sounding drawbridge. After the advanced guard, came four household warriors well mounted, and after them, as many inferior family attendants, all in mourning. Then rode forth the young Lady Evehne herself, occupying the centre of the little procession, and her long black robes formed a striking contrast to the colour of her milk-white palfrey. Beside her, on a Spanish jennet, the girl of her affectionate father,—who had procured it at a high rate, and who would have given half his substance to gratify his daughter.—sat the girlish friend Rose Flammock, who had so much of juvenile shyness in her manner, so much of feeling and of judgment in her thoughts and actions. Dame Margery followed, mixed in the party escorted by Father Adrovand, whose company she chiefly frequented, for Margery affected a little the character of the devotee, and her influence in the family, as having been Evehne's nurse, was so great as to render her no unimportant companion for the chaplain, when her lady did not require her attendance on her own person. Then came old Raoul the huntsman, his wife, and two of three other officers of Raymond Borenger's household; the steward with his golden chain, velvet cloak, and white wand, bringing up the rear, which was closed by a small band of archers, and last of all arms. The guards, and indeed the greater part of the attendants, were only designed to give the necessary degree of honour to the young lady's movements, by accompanying her a short space from the castle, where they were met by the Constable of Chateau, who, with a retinue of thirty lances, proposed to escort Evehne as far as Châteaufort, the place of her destination. Under his protection no danger was to be apprehended, even if the severe defeat so lately sustained by the Welsh had not of itself been likely to prevent any attempt, on the part of those hostile mountaineers, to disturb the safety of the marches for some time to come.

In pursuance of this arrangement, which permitted the armed part of Eveline's retinue to return for the protection of the castle, and the restoration of order in the district around, the Constable awaited her at the fatal bridge, at the head of the gallant band of selected horsemen whom he had ordered to attend upon him. The parties halted, as if to salute each other; but the Constable, observing that Eveline drew her veil more closely around her, and recollecting the loss she had so lately sustained on that luckless spot, had the judgment to confine his greeting to a mute reverence, so low that the lofty plume which he wore, (for he was now in complete armour,) mingled with the flowing mane of his gallant horse. Wilkin Flammoek next halted, to ask the lady if she had any farther commands.

"None, good Wilkin," said Eveline; "but to be, as ever, true and watchful."

"The properties of a good mastiff," said Flammoek. "Some rude sagacity, and a stout hand instead of a sharp case of teeth, are all that I can claim to be added to them—I will do my best.—Fare thee well, Roehen! Thou art going among strangers—forget not the qualities which made thee loved at home. The spirits bless thee—farewell!"

The steward next approached to take his leave, but in doing so, had nearly met with a fatal accident. It had been the pleasure of Raoul, who was in his own disposition crossgrained, and in person rheumatic, to accommodate himself with an old Arab horse, which had been kept, for the sake of the breed, as lean, and almost as lame as himself, and with a temper as vicious as that of a fiend. Betwixt the rider and the horse was a constant misunderstanding, testified on Raoul's part by oaths, rough checks with the curb, and severe digging with the spurs, which Mahound (so pagenially was the horse named) answered by plunging, bounding, and endeavouring by all expedients to unseat his rider, as well as striking and lashing out furiously at whatever else approached him. It was thought by many of the household, that Raoul preferred this vicious cross-tempered animal upon all occasions when he travelled in company with his wife, in order to take advantage by the chance, that amongst the various kicks, plunges, gambades, lashings out, and other eccentricities of Mahound, his horse might come in contact with Dame Gillian's ribs. And now, when as the important steward spurred up his palfrey to kiss his young lady's hand, and to take his leave, it seemed to the bystanders as if Raoul so managed his bridle and spur, that Mahound jerked out his hoofs at the same moment, one of which coming in contact with the steward's thigh, would have splintered it like a rotten reed, had the parties been a couple of inches nearer to each other. As it was, the steward sustained considerable damage; and they that observed the grin upon Raoul's vinegar countenance entertained little doubt, that Mahound's heels then and there avenged certain nods, winks, and wreathed smiles, which had passed betwixt the gold-chained functionary and the coquettish tiewoman since the party left the castle.

This incident abridged the painful solemnity of parting betwixt the Lady Eveline and her dependants, and lessened at the same time the formality of her meeting with the Constable, and, as it were, resigning herself to his protection.

Hugo de Lacy, having commanded six of his men-at-arms to proceed as an advanced-guard, remained himself to see the steward properly deposited on a palfrey, and then, with the rest of his followers, marched in military fashion about one hundred yards in the rear of Lady Eveline and her retinue, judiciously forbearing to present himself to her society while she was engaged in the orisons which the place where they met naturally suggested, and waiting patiently until the elasticity of youthful temper should require some diversion of the gloomy thoughts which the scene inspired.

Guided by this policy, the Constable did not approach the ladies until the advance of the morning rendered it politeness to remind them, that a pleasant spot for breaking their fast occurred in the neighbourhood, where he had ventured to make some preparations for rest and refreshment. Immediately after the Lady Eveline had intimated her acceptance of this courtesy, they came in sight of the spot he alluded to, marked by an ancient oak which, spreading its broad branches far and wide, reminded the traveller of that of Mamre, under which celestial beings accepted the hospitality of the patriarch. Across two of these huge projecting arms was flung a piece of rose-coloured sarsnet, as a canopy to keep off the morning beams, which were already rising high. Cushions of silk, interchanged with others covered with the fur of animals of the chase, were arranged round a repast, which a Norman cook had done his utmost to distinguish, by the superior delicacy of his art, from the gross meals of the Saxons, and the penurious simplicity of the Welsh tables. A fountain, which bubbled from under a large mossy stone at some distance, refreshed the air with its sound, and the taste with its liquid crystal, while, at the same time, it formed a cistern for cooling two or three flasks of Gascon wine and hippocras, which were at that time the necessary accompaniments of the morning meal.

When Eveline, with Rose, the Confessor, and at some farther distance her faithful nurse, was seated at this Syrian banquet, the leaves rustling to a gentle breeze, the water babbling in the background, the birds twittering around, while the half-heard sounds of conversation and laughter at a distance announced that their guard was in the vicinity, she could not avoid making the Constable some natural compliment on his happy selection of a place of repose.

"You do me more than justice," replied the Baron; "the spot was selected by my nephew, who hath a fancy like a minstrel. Myself am but slow in imagining such devices."

Rose looked full at her mistress, as if she endeavoured to look into her very inmost soul; but Eveline answered with the utmost simplicity,—"And wherefore hath not the noble Damian waited to join us at the entertainment which he hath directed?"

"He prefers riding onward," said the Baron, "with some light horsemen; for, notwithstanding there are now no Welsh knaves stirring, yet the marches are never free from robbers and outlaws; and though there is nothing to fear for a band like ours, yet you should not be alarmed even by the approach of danger."

"I have indeed seen but too much of it lately," said Eveline; and relapsed into the melancholy mood from which the novelty of the scene had for a moment awakened her.

Mean while, the Constable, removing, with the assistance of his squire, his mailed hood and its steel crest, as well as his gauntlets, remained in his flexible coat-of-mail, composed entirely of rings of steel curiously interwoven, his hands bare, and his brows covered with a velvet bonnet of a peculiar fashion, appropriated to the use of knights, and called a marfice, which permitted him both to converse and to act more easily than when he wore the full defensive armour. His discourse was plain, sensible, and manly; and turning upon the state of the country, and the precautions to be observed for governing and defending so disorderly a frontier, it became gradually interesting to Eveline one of whose warmest wishes was to be the protectress of her father's vassals. De Lacy on his part, seemed much pleased; for, young as Eveline was, her questions showed intelligence, and her mode of answering both apprehension and docility. In short, familiarity was so far established betwixt them, that, in the next stage of their journey, the Constable seemed to think his appropriate place was at the Lady Eveline's bedside-rein, and although she certainly did not countenance his attendance, yet neither did she seem willing to discourage it.—Himself no ancient lover, although captivated both with the beauty and the amiable qualities of the fair orphan, De Lacy was satisfied with being endured as a companion, and made no efforts to improve the opportunity which this familiarity afforded him, by recurring to any of the topics of the preceding day.

A halt was made at noon in a small village, where the same purveyor had made preparations for their accommodation, and particularly for that of the Lady Eveline; but, something to her surprise, he himself remained invisible. The conversation of the Constable of Chester was, doubtless, in the highest degree instructive; but at Eveline's years, a maiden might be excused for wishing some addition to the society in the person of a younger and less serious attendant; and when she recollected the regularity with which Damian Lacy had hitherto made his respects to her, she rather wondered at his continued absence. But her reflection went no deeper than the passing thought of one who was not quite so much delighted with her present company as not to believe it capable of an agreeable addition. She was lending a patient ear to the account which the Constable gave her of the descent and pedigree of a gallant knight of the distinguished family of Herbert, at whose castle he purposed to repose during the night, when one of the retinue announced a messenger from the Lady of Baldringham.

"My honoured father's aunt," said Eveline, anxious to testify that respect for age and relationship which the manners of the time required.

"I knew not," said the Constable, "that my gallant friend had such a relative."

"She was my grandmother's sister," answered Eveline, "a noble Saxon lady; but she disliked the match formed with a Norman house, and never saw her sister after the period of her marriage."

She broke off, as the messenger, who had the appearance of the steward of a person of consequence, entered their presence, and, bending his knee reverently, delivered a letter, which, being examined by Father Aldrovand, was found to contain the following invitation, expressed, not in French, then the general language of communication amongst the gentry, but in the old Saxon language, modified as it now was by some intermixture of French.

"If the grand-daughter of Aelfred of Baldringham hath so much of the old Saxon strain as to desire to see an ancient relation, who still dwells in the house of her forefathers, and lives after their manner, she is thus invited to repose for the night in the dwelling of Ermengarde of Baldringham."

"Your pleasure will be, doubtless, to decline the present hospitality?" said the Constable de Lacy; "the noble Herbert expects us, and has made great preparation."

"Your presence, my lord," said Eveline, "will more than console him for my absence. It is fitting and proper that I should meet my aunt's advances to reconciliation, since she has condescended to make them."

De Lacy's brow was slightly clouded, for seldom had he met with any thing approaching to contradiction of his pleasure. "I pray you to reflect, Lady Eveline," he said, "that your aunt's house is probably defenceless, or at least very imperfectly guarded. Would it not be your pleasure that I should continue my dutiful attendance?"

"Of that, my lord, mine aunt can, in her own house, be the sole judge; and methinks, as she has not deemed it necessary to request the honour of your lordship's company, it were unbecoming in me to permit you to take the trouble of attendance; you have already had but too much on my account."

"But for the sake of your own safety, madam," said De Lacy, unwilling to leave his charge.

"My safety, my lord, cannot be endangered in the house of so near a relative, whatever precautions she may take on her own behalf, will doubtless be amply sufficient for mine."

"I hope it will be found so," said De Lacy; "and I will at least add to them the security of a patrol around the castle during your abode in it." He stopped, and then proceeded with some hesitation to express his hope, that Eveline, now about to visit a kinswoman whose prejudices against the Norman race were generally known, would be on her guard against what she might hear upon that subject.

Eveline answered with dignity, that the daughter of Raymond Berenger was unlikely to listen to any opinions which would affect the dignity of that good knight's nation and descent; and with this assurance the Constable finding it impossible to obtain any which had more special reference to himself and his suit, was compelled to remain satisfied. He recollected also that the castle of Herbert was within two miles of the habitation of the Lady of Baldringham, and that his separation from Eveline was but for one night, yet a sense of the difference betwixt their youth and perhaps of his own deficiency in those higher qualifications by which the female heart is supposed to be most frequently won, rendered even this temporary absence matter of anxious thought and apprehension; so that, during their afternoon journey, he rode in silence by Eveline's side, rather meditating what might chance to-morrow, than endeavouring to avail himself of present opportunity. In this unusual manner they travelled on until the point was reached where they were to separate for the evening.

This was an elevated spot, from which they could see, on the right hand, the castle of Amelot Herber, rising high upon an eminence, with all its Gothic pinnacles and turrets; and on the left, low embowed amongst oaken woods, the rude and lonely dwelling in which the Lady of Baldringham still maintained the customs of the Anglo-Saxons, and looked with contempt and hatred on all innovations that had been introduced since the battle of Hastings.

Here the Constable de Lacy, having charged some of his men to attend the Lady Eveline to the house of her relation, and to keep watch around it with the utmost vigilance, but at such a distance as might not give offence or inconvenience to the family, kissed her hand, and took a reluctant leave. Eveline proceeded onwards by a path so little trodden, as to show the solitary condition of the mansion to which she went. Large flocks of an uncommon and valuable breed were feeding in the rich pastures around, and now and then fallow deer, which appeared to have lost the shyness of their nature, tripped across the glades of the woodland, or stood and lay in small groups under some great oak. The transient pleasure which such a scene of rural quiet was calculated to afford, changed to more serious feelings, when a sudden turn brought her at once in front of the mansion-house, of which she had seen nothing since she first beheld it from the point where she parted with the Constable, and which she had more than one reason for regarding with some apprehension.

The house, for it could not be termed a castle, was only two stories high, low and massively built, with doors and windows forming the heavy round arch which is usually called Saxon; the walls were covered with various creeping plants, which had crept along them undisturbed; grass grew up to the very threshold, at which hung a buffalo's horn suspended by a brass chain. A massive door of black oak closed a gate, which much resembled the ancient entrance of a ruined sepulchre, and not a soul appeared to acknowledge or greet their arrival.

"Were I you, my Lady Eveline," said the officious dame Gillian, "I would turn bridle yet; for this old dungeon seems little likely to afford food or shelter to Christian folks."

Eveline imposed silence on her indiscreet attendant, though herself exchanging a look with Rose who confessed something like timidity, as she commanded Raoul to blow the horn at the gate. "I have heard," she said, "that my aunt loves the ancient customs so well, that she is loath to admit into her hall any thing younger than the time of Edward the Confessor."

Raoul, in the mean time, cursing the rude instrument which baffled his skill in sounding a regular call, and gave voice only to a tremendous and discordant noise which seemed to shake the old walls, thick as they were, repeated his summons three times before the gate opened, and a numerous retinue of servants of both sexes appeared in the dark and narrow hall, the upper end of which a great fire of wood was sending its furnace-blast up an antique chimney, when as extensive as that of a modern kitchen, was covered over with ornaments of massive stone, and shed on the top with a long range of niches, from one of which frowned the image of some Saxon whose barbarous name was scarce to be found in the Romish calendar.

The same officer who had brought the invitation to his lady to Eveline, now stepped forward, as was supposed, to assist her from her palfrey; but in reality to lead it by the bridle-rein into the hall itself, and up to a raised platform, or dais, the upper end of which she was at length permitted to mount. Two matrons of advanced years, and young women of gentle birth, educated by the lady of Ermengarde, attended with reverence the lady of her kinswoman. Eveline would have inclined to them for her grand-aunt, but the matrons much respect laid their fingers on their mouths, to enjoin her silence; a gesture which, united to the regularity of her reception in other respects, still more excited her curiosity to see her venerable relative.

She was soon gratified; for, through a pair of folding-doors, which opened not far from the platform on which she stood, she was ushered into a large low chamber hung with arras; at the upper end of which, under a species of canopy, was seated the ancient Lady of Baldringham. Four-score years had dimmed the brightness of her eyes, or bent and bowed her stately height; her gray hair was still so white as to form a tier, combined as it was with a wreath of ivy leaves; her long dark-coloured gown with ample folds, and the brodered girdle, which encircled it around her, was fastened by a buckle of gold studded with precious stones, which were worth a knight's ransom; her features, which had once been full, or rather majestic, bore still, though faded and wrinkled, an air of melancholy and stern grandeur, well assorted with her garb and deportment. She held a staff of ebony in her hand; at her feet rested a large aged wolf-dog, who pricked his ears and bristled up his neck, as the step of a stranger, a sound so seldom heard in those halls, approached the chair in which his aged mistress sat motionless.

"Welcome, Thryme," said the venerable dame; "and thou, daughter of the house of Baldringham, approach, and fear not their ancient servant."

The hound sunk down to his couchant posture as she spoke, and, excepting the red glare of his eyes, which might have seemed a hieroglyphical emblem, at the feet of some ancient priestess of Woden, the appearance of Ermen-garde with her rod and her chaplet, corresponded with the customs of the days of Paganism. Yet he who had seemed of her would have done therein much more to a venerable Christian matron, who had given many a hide of land to holy church, in honour of Saint Dunstan.

Ermengarde's reception of Eveline was of the antiquated and formal cast with her mansion and her exterior. She did not at first arise from her seat when the noble maiden approached her, nor did she even admit her to the salute which she advanced; but, laying her hand on Eveline's arm, she held her as she advanced, and perused her countenance with an earnest and unsparing eye of minute observation.

"Berwine," she said to the most favoured of the attendants, "our niece hath the skin and eyes of a Saxon hue; but the hue of her eye-brows and her hair is from the foreigner and alien.—Thou art, nevertheless, welcome to my house, maiden," she added, turning to Eveline, "especially if thou canst bear to admit that thou art not absolutely a perfect creature, as these flatterers around thee have taught thee to believe."

Saying, she at length arose, and saluted her niece with a kiss on the forehead. She released her not, however, from her grasp, but proceeded to give the lady to her garments which she had hitherto thrown upon her features.

"Saint Dunstan keep us from vanity!" she said; "so this is the new guise—and modest maidens wear such tunics as these, showing the shape of their persons as plain as if (Saint Mary defend us!) they were altogether without garments! And see, Berwine, these gauds on the neck, and that neck itself uncovered as low as the shoulder—these be the guises which strangers have brought into merry England! and this pouch, like a player's placket, hath but little to do with housewifery, I wot; and the dagger, too, like a glee-man's wife, that rides a mumming in masculine apparel—dost thou ever go to the wars, maiden, that thou wearest steel at thy girdle?"

Eveline, equally surprised and disobliged by the depreciating catalogue of her apparel, replied to the last question with some spirit,—"The mode may have altered, madam; but I only wear such garments as are now worn by those of my age and condition. For the poniard, may it please you, it is not many days since I regarded it as the last resource betwixt me and dishonour."

"The maiden speaks well and boldly, Berwine," said Dame Ermengarde; "and, in truth, pass we but over some of these vain fripperies, is attired in a comely fashion.—Thy father, I hear, fell knight-like in the field of battle."

"He did so," answered Eveline her eyes filling with tears at the recollection of her recent loss.

"I never saw him," continued Dame Ermengarde; "he carried the old Norman scorn towards the Saxon stock, whom they wed but for what they can make by them, as the bramble clings to the elm;—nay, never seek to vindicate him," she continued, observing that Eveline was about to speak, "I have known the Norman spirit for many a year ere thou wert born."

At this moment the steward appeared in the chamber, and, after a long genuflection, asked his lady's pleasure concerning the guard of Norman soldiers who remained without the mansion.

"Norman soldiers so near the house of Baldringham!" said the old lady, fiercely; "who brings them hither, and for what purpose?"

"They came, as I think," said the steward, "to wait on and guard this gracious young lady."

"What, my daughter," said Ermengarde, in a tone of melancholy reproach, "darest thou not trust thyself unguarded for one night in the castle of thy forefathers?"

"God forbid else!" said Eveline. "But these men are not mine, nor under my authority. They are part of the train of the Constable De Lacy, who left them to watch around the castle, thinking there might be danger from robbers."

"Robbers," said Ermengarde, "have never harmed the house of Baldringham, since a Norman robber stole from it its best treasure in the person of thy grandmother.—And so, poor bird, thou art already captive—unhappy flutterer! But it is thy lot, and wherefore should I wonder or repine? When was there fair maiden with a wealthy dower, but she was ere maturity destined to be the slave of some of those petty kings, who allow us to call nothing ours that their passions can covet? Well—I cannot aid thee—I am but a poor and neglected woman, feeble both from sex and age.—And to which of these De Lacys art thou the destined household drudge?"

A question so asked, and by one whose prejudices were of such a determined character, was not likely to draw from Eveline any confession of the real circumstances in which she was placed, since it was but too plain her Saxon relation could have afforded her neither sound counsel nor useful assistance. She replied therefore briefly, that as the Lacys, and the Normans in general, were unwelcome to her kinswoman, she would entreat of the commander of the patrol to withdraw it from the neighbourhood of Baldringham.

"Not so, my niece," said the old lady; "as we cannot escape the Norman neighbourhood, or get beyond the sound of their curfew, it signifies not whether they be near our walls or more far off so that they enter them not.—And, Berwine, bid Hundwolf drench the Normans with liquor and gorge them with food—food of the best, and liquor of the strongest. Let them not say the old Saxon hag is churlish of her hospitality. Broach a piece of wine, for I warrant their gentle stomachs brook no ale."

Berwine, her huge bunch of keys jangling at her girdle, withdrew to give the necessary directions, and presently returned. Mean while Ermengarde proceeded to question her niece more closely. "Is it that thou wilt not, or canst not, tell me to which of the De Lacys thou art to be boudswoman?—to the overweening Constable, who, sheathed in impenetrable armour, and mounted on a swift and strong horse as invulnerable as himself, takes pride that he rides down and stabs at his ease, and with perfect safety, the naked Welshmen?—or is it to his nephew, the beardless Damian?—or must thy possessions go to mend a breach in the fortunes of that other cousin, Randal Lacy, the decayed reveller, who, they say can no longer ruffle it among the debauched crusaders for want of means?"

"My honoured aunt," replied Eveline, naturally displeased with this discourse, "to none of the Lacys, and I trust to none other, Saxon or Norman, will your kinswoman become a household drudge. There was, before the death of my honourable father, some treaty betwixt him and the Constable, on which account I cannot at present decline his attendance; but what maybe the issue of it, fate must determine."

"But I can show thee, niece, how the balance of fate inclines," said Ermengarde, in a low and mysterious voice. "Those united with us by blood have, in some sort, the privilege of looking forward beyond the points of present time, and seeing in their very bud the thorns or flowers which are one day to encircle their head."

"For my own sake, noble kinswoman," answered Eveline, "I would decline such foreknowledge, even were it possible to acquire it without transgressing the rules of the Church. Could I have foreseen what has befallen me within these last unhappy days, I had lost the enjoyment of every happy moment before that time."

"Nevertheless, daughter," said the Lady of Baldringham, "thou, like others of thy race, must within this house conform to the rule, of passing one night within the chamber of the Red-Finger.—Berwine, see that it be prepared for my niece's reception."

"I—I—have heard speak of that chamber, gracious aunt," said Eveline, timidly, "and if it may consist with your good pleasure, I would not now choose to pass the night there. My health has suffered by my late perils and fatigues, and with your good-will I will delay to another time the usage, which I have heard is peculiar to the daughters of the house of Baldringham."

"And which, notwithstanding, you would willingly avoid," said the old Saxon lady, bending her brows angrily. "Has not such disobedience cost your house enough already?"

"Indeed, honoured and gracious lady," said Berwine, unable to forbear interference, though well knowing the obstinacy of her patroness, "that chamber is in disrepair, and cannot easily on a sudden be made fit for the Lady Eveline; and the noble damsel looks so pale, and hath lately suffered so much, that, might I have the permission to advise, this were better delayed."

"Thou art a fool, Berwine," said the old lady, sternly; "thinkest thou I will bring anger and misfortune on my house, by suffering this girl to leave it without rendering the usual homage to the Red-Finger? Go to—let the room be made ready—small preparation may serve, if she cherish not the Norman nicety about bed and lodging. Do not reply; but do as I command thee.—And you, Eveline—are you so far degenerated from the brave spirit of your ancestry that you dare not pass a few hours in an ancient apartment?"

"You are my hostess, gracious madam," said Eveline, "and must assign my apartment where you judge proper—my courage is such as innocence and some pride of blood and birth have given me. It has been, of late, severely tried; but, since such is your pleasure, and the custom of your house, my heart is yet strong enough to encounter what you propose to subject me to."

She paused here in displeasure; for she resented, in some measure, her aunt's conduct, as unkind and inhospitable. And yet when she reflected upon the foundation of the legend of the chamber to which she was consigned, she could not but regard the Lady of Baldringham as having considerable reason for her conduct, according to the traditions of the family, and the belief of the times, in which Eveline herself was devout.

CHAPTER XIV.

Sometimes, methinks, I hear the groans of ghosts,
Then hollow sounds and lamentable screams;
Then, like a dying echo from afar,
My mother's voice, that cries, "Wed not, Almeyda—Forewarned, Almeyda, marriage is thy crime."

Don Sebastian.

The evening at Baldringham would have seemed of portentous and unendurable length, had it not been that apprehended danger makes time pass quickly betwixt us and the dreaded hour, and that if Eveline felt little interested or amused by the conversation of her aunt and Berwine, which turned upon the long deduction of their ancestors from the warlike Horsa and the feats of Saxon champions, and the miracles of Saxon monks, she was still better pleased to listen to these legends, than to anticipate her retreat to the destined and dreaded apartment where she was to pass the night. There lacked not, however, such amusement as the house of Baldringham could afford to pass away the evening. Blessed by a grave old Saxon monk, the chaplain of the house, a sumptuous entertainment, which might have sufficed twenty hungry men, was served up before Ermengarde and her niece, whose sole assistants, besides the reverend man, were Berwine and Rose Flammock. Eveline was the less inclined to do justice to this excess of hospitality, that the dishes were all of the gross and substantial nature which the Saxons admired, but which contrasted disadvantageously with the refined and delicate cookery of the Normans, as did the moderate cup of light and high-flavoured Gascon wine, tempered with more than half its quantity of the purest water, with the mighty ale, the high-spiced pigment and hippocras and the other potent liquors, which, one after another, were in vain proffered for her acceptance by the steward Hundwolf, in honour of the hospitality of Baldringham.

Neither were the stated amusements of the evening more congenial to Eveline's taste, than the profusion of her aunt's solid refection. When the boards and tresses, on which the viands had been served, were withdrawn from the apartment, the menials under direction of the steward, proceeded to light several long waxen torches, one of which was graduated for the purpose of marking the passing time, and dividing it into portions. These were announced by means of brassen balls, suspended by threads from the torch, the spaces betwixt them being calculated to occupy a certain time in burning; so that, when the flame reached the thread, and the balls fell, each in succession, into a brassen basin, placed for its reception, the office of a modern clock was in some degree discharged. By this light the party was arranged for the evening.

The ancient Ermengarde's lofty and ample chair was removed, according to ancient custom, from the middle of the apartment to the warmest side of a large grate, filled with charcoal, and her guest was placed on her right, as the seat of honour. Berwine then arranged in due order the females of the household, and having seen that each was engaged with her own proper task, sat herself down to ply the spindle and distaff. The men, in a more remote circle betook themselves to the repairing of their implements of husbandry, or new furbishing weapons of the chase, under the direction of the steward Hundwolf. For the amusement of the family thus assembled, an old glee-man sung to a harp, which had but four strings, a long and apparently interminable legend, upon some religious subject, which was rendered almost unintelligible to Eveline, by the extreme and complicated affectation of the poet, who, in order to indulge in the alliteration which was accounted one great ornament of Saxon poetry, had sacrificed sense to sound, and used words in the most forced and remote sense, provided they could be compelled into his service. There was also all the obscurity arising from elision, and from the most extravagant and hyperbolical epithets.

Eveline, though well acquainted with the Saxon language, soon left off listening to the singer, to reflect for a moment on the gay fabliaux and imaginative lais of the Norman minstrels, and then to anticipate, with anxious apprehension, what nature of visitation she might be exposed to in the mysterious chamber in which she was doomed to pass the night.

The hour of parting at length approached. At half an hour before midnight, a period ascertained by the consumption of the huge waxen torch, the ball which was secured to it fell clanging into the brazen basin placed beneath, and announced to all the hour of rest. The old glee-man paused in his song instantaneously, and in the middle of a stanza, and the household were all on foot at the signal, some retiring to their own apartments, others lighting torches or bearing lamps to conduct the visitors to their places of repose. Among these last was a bery of bower-women, to whom the duty was assigned of conveying the Lady Eveline to her chamber for the night. Her aunt took a solemn leave of her, crossed her forehead, kissed it, and whispered in her ear, "Be courageous, and be fortunate."

"May not my bower-maiden, Rose Flammock, or my tirewoman, Dame Gillian, Raoul's wife, remain in the apartment with me for this night?" said Eveline.

"Flammock—Raoul!" repeated Ermengarde, angrily; "is thy household thus made up? The Flemings are the cold palsy to Britain, the Normans the burning fever!"

"And the poor Welsh will add," said Rose, whose resentment began to surpass her awe for the ancient Saxon dame, "that the Anglo-Saxons were the original disease, and resemble a wasting pestilence."

"Thou art too bold, sweetheart," said the Lady Ermengarde, looking at the Flemish maiden from under her dark brows; "and yet there is wit in thy words. Saxon, Dane, and Norman, have rolled like successive billows over the land, each having strength to subdue what they lacked wisdom to keep. When shall it be otherwise?"

"When Saxon, and Briton, and Norman, and Fleming," answered Rose boldly, "shall learn to call themselves by one name, and think themselves alike children of the land they are born in."

"Ha!" exclaimed the Lady of Baldringham, in the tone of one half surprised, half pleased. Then turning to her relation, she said, "There are words and wit in this maiden; see that she use, but do not abuse them."

"She is as kind and faithful, as she is prompt and ready-witted," said Eveline. "I pray you, dearest aunt, let me use her company for this night."

"It may not be—it were dangerous to both. Alone you must learn your destiny, as have all the females of our race, excepting your grandmother; and what have been the consequences of her neglecting the rules of our house? Lo! her descendant stands before me an orphan, in the very bloom of youth."

"I will go then," said Eveline, with a sigh of resignation; "and it shall never be said I incurred future woe, to shun present terror."

"Your attendants," said the Lady Ermengarde, "may occupy the anteroom, and be almost within your call. Berwine will show you the apartment—I cannot; for we, thou knowest, who have once entered it, return not thither again. Farewell, my child, and may heaven bless thee!"

With more of human emotion and sympathy than she had yet shown, the lady again saluted Eveline, and signed to her to follow Berwine, who, attended by two damsels bearing torches, waited to conduct her to the dreaded apartment.

Their torches glared along the rudely built walls and dark arched roofs of one or two long winding passages; these by their light enabled them to descend the steps of a winding stair, whose inequality and ruggedness showed its antiquity; and finally led into a tolerably large chamber on the lower story of the edifice, to which some old hangings, a lively fire on the hearth, the moonbeams stealing through a latticed window, and the boughs of a myrtle plant which grew around the casement, gave no uncomfortable appearance.

"This," said Berwine, "is the resting-place of your attendants," and she pointed to the couches which had been prepared for Rose and Dame Gillian; "we," she added, "proceed farther."

She then took a torch from the attendant maidens both of whom seemed to shrink back with fear, which was readily caught by Dame Gillian, although she was not probably aware of the cause. But Rose Flammock, unbidden, followed her mistress without hesitation, as Berwine conducted her through a small wicket at the upper end of the apartment, clenched with many an iron nail, into a second but smaller anteroom or wardrobe, at the end of which was a similar door. This wardrobe had also its casement mantled with evergreens, and, like the former, it was faintly enlightened by the moonbeam.

Berwine paused here, and pointing to Rose, demanded of Eveline, "Why does she follow?"

"To share my mistress's danger, be it what it may," answered Rose, with her characteristic readiness of speech and resolution. "Speak," she said, "my dearest lady," grasping Eveline's hand, while she addressed her; "You will not drive your Rose from you? If I am less high-minded than one of your boasted race, I am bold and quick-witted in all honest service.—You tremble like the aspen! Do not go into this apartment—do not be gulled by all this pomp and mystery of terrible preparation; bid defiance to this antiquated, and, I think, half-pagan superstition."

"The Lady Eveline must go, minion," replied Berwine, sternly; "and she must go without any malepert adviser or companion."

"Must go—must go!" repeated Rose; "Is this language to a free and noble maiden?—Sweet lady, give me once but the least hint that you wish it, and their 'must go' shall be put to the trial. I will call from the casement on the Norman cavaliers, and tell them we have fallen into a den of witches, instead of a house of hospitality."

"Silence, madwoman!" said Berwine, her voice quivering with anger and fear; "you know not who dwells in the next chamber!"

"I will call those who will soon see to that," said Rose, flying to the casement, when Eveline, seizing her arm in her turn, compelled her to stop.

"I thank thy kindness, Rose," she said, "but it cannot help me in this matter. She who enters yonder door, must do so alone."

"Then I will enter it in your stead, my dearest lady," said Rose. "You are pale—you are cold—you will die of terror if you go on. There may be as much of trick as of supernatural agency in this matter—ne they shall not deceive—or if some stern spirit craves a victim,—better Rose than her lady."

"Forbear, forbear," said Eveline, rousing up her own spirits; "you make me ashamed of myself. This is an ancient ordeal, which regards the females descended from the house of Baldringham as far as in the third degree, and them only. I did not indeed expect, in my present circumstances, to have been called upon to undergo it; but, since the hour summons me, I will meet it as freely as any of my ancestors."

So saying, she took the torch from the hand of Berwine, and wishing good-night to her and Rose, gently disengaged herself, from the hold of the latter, and advanced into the mysterious chamber. Rose pressed after her so far as to see that it was an apartment of moderate dimensions, resembling that through which they had last passed, and lighted by the moonbeams, which came through a window lying on the same range with those of the anterooms. More she could not see, for Eveline turned on the threshold, and kissing her at the same time, thrust her gently back into the smaller apartment which she had just left, shut the door of communication, and barred and bolted it, as if in security against her well meant intrusion.

Berwina now exhorted Rose, as she valued her life, to retire into the first anteroom, where the beds were prepared, and detain herself, if not till rest at least to miracle and devotion, but the faithful English girl stoutly refused her entreaties, and repeated her commands.

"Talk not to me of danger," she said. "There I remain, that I may be at least within hearing of my mistress's danger, and so baffle those who shall offer her injury! Take notice, that twenty Norman spears surround this inhospitable dwelling, except to avenge whatever injury shall be offered to the daughter of Raymond Berenger."

"Reserve your throats for those who are mortal," said Berwina, in a low, but piercing whisper, "the owners of your chamber fear them not. Farewell—thy danger be on thine own head!"

She departed leaving Rose strangely agitated by what had passed, and somewhat appalled at her last words. "Those Saxons, and the maidens with them," she said, "are but half converted after all. I had many of their old heathen rites in the worst of the military spirits. Their very accents are full of the accents of any German country, and have, as it were, a look of something savage and godless. Their names sound pagan and diabolical. It is fearful to stand alone here—and all is silent as death in the apartment into which my lady has been thus straggled. Shall I call up Gellian?—but no, she has neither sense, nor courage, nor principle, to aid me on such an occasion—better alone than have a false friend for company. I will see if the Normans are on their post, since it is to them I must trust, if a moment of need should arrive."

Thus reflecting, Rose Flammoek went to the window of the little apartment, in order to satisfy herself of the vigilance of the sentinels, and to survey at the same time the exact situation of the corps de garde. The moon was at the full, and enabled her to see with accuracy the nature of the ground without. In the first place, she was rather disappointed to find, that instead of being so near the earth as she supposed, the range of windows, which gave light as well to the two ante-chambers as to the mysterious chamber itself, looked down upon an ancient moat, by which they were elevated from the level ground on the farther side. The level of which these fountains afforded seemed to have been long neglected, and the bottom, entirely dry, was checked in many places with bushes and low trees, which ran up against the wall of the castle, and by means of which it seemed to Rose the windows might be easily scaled, and the mansion entered. From the level plain beyond, the space adjoining to the castle was in a considerable degree clear, and the moat beams slumbered on its close and beautiful turf, marked with long shadows of the towers and trees. Beyond this esplanade lay the forest ground, with a few granite oaks scattered individually along the skirt of its dark and ample domain, like champions who take their ground of defiance in front of a line of armed battle.

The calm beauty and repose of a scene so lovely, the outlines of all around, and the more marked reflections which the whole suggested, qualified in some measure, the apprehensions which the events of the evening had inspired. "After all," she reflected, "why should I be so anxious on account of the Lady Eveline? There is among the proud Normans and the dogged Saxons scarce a single faithful knight, but most needs be held distinguished from others by some superstitious observance peculiar to their race, as if they thought it scorn to go to Heaven like a poor simple Fleming, such as I am. Could I but see a Norman sentinel, I would hold myself satisfied of my mistress's security. And yonder one stalks along the gloom, wrapped in his long white mantle, and the moon tipping the point of his lance with silver—What he, Sir Cavalier?"

The Norman turned his steps, and approached the ditch as she spoke. "What is your pleasure demanded?" he demanded.

"The window next to mine is that of the Lady Berenger, whom you are appointed to guard. Place a good watch upon this side of the castle."

"Doubt it not, lady," answered the cavalier, and enveloping himself in his long shaggy, or silken watch cloak, he withdrew to a large oak-tree at some distance, and stood there with folded arms, leaning on his lance, more like a trophy of arms than a living warrior.

Emboldened by the consciousness, that a man of good account was close at hand, Rose drew back into her little chamber, and having ascertained by looking that there was no noise or stirring in that of Eodem, she began to make some preparations for her own repose. For this purpose she went into the second anteroom, where Dame Gellian, whose leave had given way to the superstitious effects of a super-draught of hite-ale, (mild ale of the first strength and quality) slept as sound as that good Norman beverage could procure.

Muttering an indignant curse on her slutt and indifference, Rose caught, from the empty nest which had been destined for her own use the quilt covering, and dragging it with her into the anteroom, disposed it so as, with the assistance of the rushes which strewed that apartment, to form a sort of couch upon which, half seated, half reclined she resolved to pass the night in as close attendance upon her mistress as circumstances permitted.

Thus seated, her eye on the pale planet which ended in full glory through the blue sky of midnight she proposed to herself that sleep should not visit her eyelids till the dawn of morning should announce the Eve's end of her misery.

Her thoughts, mean while rested on the humble and shadowy world beyond the grave and on the great and perhaps yet undecided question, what the separation of its inhabitants from those of the temporal sphere is absolute and decided, or what influenced by motives which we cannot approach they continue to hold shadowy communion with them yet existing in earthly reality of flesh and blood? To have denied this, would, in the age of chivalry and of miracles, have incurred the guilt of heresy, but Rose's firm good sense led her to doubt at least the frequency of supernatural interference, and to comfort herself with an opinion, conveyed however, by her own involuntary starts and shudderings at every leaf which moved, that in relation to the performance of the rite imposed on her, Eodem incurred no real danger, and only sacrificed to a moderate family superstition.

As this conviction strengthened on Rose's mind, her purpose of vigilance began to decline—her thoughts wandered to objects towards which they were directed, like sheep which stray beyond the day of their shepherd—her eyes no longer brought her to her a distinct apprehension of the broad, red silvery orb on which they continued to gaze. Length they closed, and rested on the folded mantle her back resting against the wall of the apartment and her white arms folded on her bosom, Rose Flammoek fell fast asleep.

Her repose was fearfully broken by a shrill and piercing shriek from the apartment where he lay exposed. To start up and fly to the door was the work of a moment with the generous girl, who was permitted here to struggle with love or duty. The door was secured with both bar and bolt; and with fainter scream, or rather groan, seemed to say, it must be instant, or in vain. Rose next rushed to the window, and screamed rather than called to the Norman sentinel, who distinguished by the whistle of his watch-clank, still retained his position under the old oak-tree.

At the cry of "Help, help!—the Lady Berenger is murdered!" the morning star, starting a man into active exertion, sped with the swiftness of a race-horse to the brink of the moat, and was determined to cross it, opposite to the spot where Rose and the open casement, urging him to speed by vocal gestures.

"Not here—not here?" she exclaimed with loud and precipitant, as she saw him make towards her which the latter had occupied, and placed her in one of their beds, where Rose, dismissing the others (Gillian excepted) to seek repose where they could find it, continued to watch her mistress. For some time she continued very much disturbed, but, gradually, fatigue, and the influence of some narcotic which Gillian had sense enough to recommend and prepare, seemed to compose her spirits. She fell into a deep slumber, from which she did not awaken until the sun was high over the distant hills.

CHAPTER XV.

I see a hand you cannot see,
Which beckons me away;
I hear a voice you cannot hear,
Which says I must not stay.

MALLET.

WHEN Eveline first opened her eyes, it seemed to be without any recollection of what had passed on the night preceding. She looked round the apartment, which was coarsely and scantily furnished, as one destined for the use of domestics and menials, and said to Rose, with a smile, "Our good kinswoman maintains the ancient Saxon hospitality at a homely rate, so far as lodging is concerned. I could have willingly parted with last night's profuse supper, to have obtained a bed of a softer texture. Methinks my limbs feel as if I had been under all the flails of a Franklin's barn-yard."

"I am glad to see you so pleasant, madam," answered Rose, discreetly avoiding any reference to the events of the night before.

Dame Gillian was not so scrupulous. "Your ladyship last night lay down on a better bed than this," she said, "unless I am much mistaken; and Rose Flammock and yourself know best why you left it."

If a look could have killed, Dame Gillian would have been in deadly peril from that which Rose shot at her by way of rebuke for this ill-advised communication. It had instantly the effect which was to be apprehended, for Lady Eveline seemed at first surprised and confused; then, as recollections of the past arranged themselves in her memory, she folded her hands, looked on the ground, and wept bitterly, with much agitation.

Rose entreated her to be comforted, and offered to fetch the old Saxon chaplain of the house to administer spiritual consolation, if her grief rejected temporal comfort.

"No—call him not," said Eveline, raising her head and drying her eyes—"I have had enough of Saxon kindness. What a fool was I to expect, in that hard and unfeeling woman, any commiseration for my youth—my late sufferings—my orphan condition! I will not permit her a poor triumph over the Norman blood of Berenger, by letting her see how much I have suffered under her inhuman infliction. But first, Rose, answer me truly, was any inmate of Baldringham witness to my distress last night?"

Rose assured her that she had been tended exclusively by her own retinue, herself and Gillian, Blanche and Ternotte. She seemed to receive satisfaction from this assurance. "Hear me, both of you," she said, "and observe my words, as you love and as you fear me. Let no syllable be breathed from your lips of what has happened this night. Carry the same charge to my maidens. Lend me thine instant aid, Gillian, and thine, my dearest Rose, to change these disordered garments, and arrange this dishevelled hair. It was a poor vengeance she sought, and all because of my country. I am resolved she shall not see the slightest trace of the sufferings she has inflicted."

As she spoke thus, her eyes flashed with indignation, which seemed to dry up the tears that had before filled them. Rose saw the change of her manner with a mixture of pleasure and concern, being aware that her mistress's predominant failing was incident to her, as a spoiled child, who, accustomed to be treated with kindness, deference, and indulgence, by all around her, was apt to resent warily whatever resembled neglect or contradiction.

"God knows," said the faithful bower-maiden, "I would hold my hand out to catch drops of motten lead, rather than endure your tears; and yet, my sweet mistress, I would rather at present see you grieved than angry. This ancient lady hath, it would seem, but acted according to some old superstitious rite of her family, which is in part yours. Her name is respectable, both from her conduct and possessions; and, hard-pressed as you are by the Normans, with whom your kinswoman, the Prioress, is sure to take part, I was in hope you might have had some shelter and countenance from the Lady of Baldringham."

"Never, Rose, never," answered Eveline; "you know not—you cannot guess what she has made me suffer—exposing me to witchcraft and fiends. Thyself said it, and said it truly—the Saxons are still half Pagans, void of Christianity, as of nurture and kindness."

"Ay, but," replied Rose, "I spoke then to dissuade you from a danger; now that the danger is passed and over, I may judge of it otherwise."

"Speak not for them, Rose," replied Eveline, angrily; "no innocent victim was ever offered up at the altar of a fiend with more indifference than my father's kinswoman delivered up me—me an orphan, bereaved of my natural and powerful support. I hate her cruelty—I hate her house—I hate the thought of all that has happened here—of all, Rose, except my matchless faith and fearless attachment. Go, bid our train saddle directly—I will be gone instantly—I will not attire myself," she added, rejecting the assistance she had at first required—"I will have no ceremony—tarry for no leave-taking."

In the hurried and agitated manner of her mistress, Rose recognised with anxiety another mood of the same irritable and excited temperament, which had before discharged itself in tears and fits. But perceiving, at the same time, that remonstrance was in vain, she gave the necessary orders for collecting their company, saddling, and preparing for departure; hoping that, as her mistress removed to a farther distance from the scene where her mind had received so severe a shock, her equanimity might, by degrees, be restored.

Dame Gillian, accordingly, was busied with arranging the packages of her lady, and all the rest of Lady Eveline's retinue, in preparing for instant departure, when, preceded by her steward, who acted also as a sort of gentleman-usher, leaning upon her confidential Berwine, and followed by two or three more of the most distinguished of her household, with looks of displeasure on her ancient yet lofty brow, the Lady Ermengarde entered the apartment.

Eveline, with a trembling and hurried head, a burning cheek, and other signs of agitation, was herself busied about the arrangement of some baggage, when her relation made her appearance. At once, to Rose's great surprise, she exerted a strong command over herself, and, repressing every external appearance of disorder, she advanced to meet her relation, with a calm and haughty stateliness equal to her own.

"I come to give you good morning, our niece," said Ermengarde, haughtily indeed, yet with more deference than she seemed at first to have intended. "How much did the bearing of Eveline impose respect upon her;—" I find that you have been pleased to shift that chamber which was assigned you, in conformity with the ancient custom of this household, and bestir yourself to the apartment of a menial."

"Are you surprised at that, lady?" demanded Eveline in her turn; "or are you disappointed that you find me not a corpse, within the limits of the chamber which your hospitality and affection allotted to me?"

"Your sleep, then, has been broken?" said Ermengarde, looking fixedly at the Lady Eveline, as she spoke.

"If I complain not, madam, the evil must be deemed of little consequence. What has happened is over and past, and it is not my intention to trouble you with a recital."

"She of the ruddy finger," replied Ermengarde triumphantly, "loves not the blood of the stranger."

"She had less reason, while she walked the earth"

so that of the Saxon," said Eveline, "unless her id speaks false in that matter; and unless, as I suspect, your house is haunted, not by the soul of a dead who suffered within its walls, but by evil as, such as the descendants of Hengist and Horsa and still in secret to worship."

"You are pleasant, maiden," replied the old lady, "fully; but, if your words are meant in earnest, shaft of your censure has glanced aside. A a, blessed by the holy Saint Dunstan, and by loyal and holy Confessor, is no abode for evil."

"The house of Baldriugham," replied Eveline, "is bode for those who fear such spirits; and as I with all humility, avow myself of the number, all presently leave it to the custody of Saint Dunstan."

"Not till you have broken your fast, I trust!" said Lady of Baldriugham; "you will not, I hope, do ears and our relationship such foul disgrace?" "ardon me, madam," replied the Lady Eveline; "who have experienced your hospitality at I have little occasion for breakfast in the morn-Rose, are not those loitering knaves assembled a court yard, or are they yet on their couches, ng up for the slumber they have lost by midnight rances?"

as announced that her train was in the court, and ted; when, with a low reverence, Eveline en-oured to pass her relation, and leave the apart- without farther ceremony. Ermenegarde at first vited her with a grim and frowning glance, which ed to show a soul fraught with more rage than lin blood and rigid features of extreme old age the power of expressing, and raised her elbow as if about even to proceed to some act of per- violence. But she changed her purpose, and only made way for Eveline, who passed without er parky; and as she descended the staircase, h conducted from the apartment to the gateway, ward the voice of her aunt behind her, like that a aged and offended wyb, denouncing wrath and pon her insolence and presumption.

"ride," she exclaimed, "goath before destruction, a haughty spirit before a fall. She who scorneth taur of her forefathers, a stone from its battle- ta shall crush her! She who mocks the gray t of a parent, never shall one of her own locks dured with age! She who weds with a man of and of blood, her end shall neither be peaceful bloodless!"

urrying to escape from these and other ominous minations, Eveline rushed from the house, mount- ed palfrey with the precipitation of a fugitive, and, deded by her attendants, who had caught a part ey alarm, though without conjecturing the cause, heavily into the forest, old Raoul, who was well ac- quainted with the country, acting as their guide.

retained more than she was willing to confess to ill, by thus leaving the habitation of so near a ion, loaded with maledictions instead of the ings which are usually bestowed on a departing woman, Eveline hastened forward, until the huge trees with intervening arms had hidden from her the fatal mansion.

er trampling and galloping of horse was soon heard, announcing the approach of the patrol y the Constable for the protection of the manand who now, collecting from their different oas, came prepared to attend the Lady Eveline t farther road to Gloucester, great part of which rough the extensive forest of Deane, then a vil- agion of large extent, though now much denuded w for the service of the iron mines. The cava- zation up to join the retinue of Lady Eveline, with ur glittering in the morning rays, trumpets ling, horses prancing, neighing, and thrown, by his chivalrous rider, into the attitude best led to exhibit the beauty of the steed and dex- of the horseman; while the lancers, streaming on; pennoncelles, were brandished in every man- hich could display elation of heart and readi- of hand. The aspect of the military character of x-countrymen of Normandy gave to Eveline a feeling at once of security and of triumph, which ope- rated towards the dispelling of her gloomy thoughts, and of the feverish disorder which affected her nerves. The rising sun also—the song of the birds among the towers—the lowing of the cattle as they were driven to pasture—the sight of the hind, who, with her fawn trailing by her side, often crossed some forest glade within view of the travellers—all contributed to dispel the terror of Eveline's nocturnal visions, and soothe to rest the more angry passions which had agitated her bosom at her departure from Baldriugham. She suffered her palfrey to slacken his pace, and, with female attention to propriety, began to adjust her riding robes, and compose her head-dress, disordered in her hasty departure. Rose saw her cheek assume a paler but more settled hue, instead of the angry hectic which had coloured it—saw her eye become more steady as she looked with a sort of triumph upon her military attendants, and pardoned (what on other occasions she would probably have made some reply to) her enthusiastic exclamations in praise of her countrymen.

"We journey safe," said Eveline, "under the care of the princely and victorious Normans. There is the noble worth of the lion, which destroys or is opposed at once—there is no guile in their romantic affection, no sullenness mixed with their generous indignation—they know the duties of the hall as well as those of battle; and were they to be surpassed in the arts of war (which will only be when Philistinism is removed from its base,) they would still remain superior to every other people in generosity and courtesy."

If I do not feel all their merits so strongly as if I shared their blood," said Rose, "I am at least glad to see them around us, in woods which are said to abound with dangers of various kinds. And I confess, my heart is the lighter, that I can now no longer observe the least vestige of that ancient madness, in which we passed so unpleasant a night, and the recollection of which will always be odious to me."

Eveline looked sharply at her. "Confess the truth, Rose; thou wouldst give thy best kirtle to know all of my horrible adventure."

"It is but confessing that I am a woman," answered Rose; "and did I say a man, I dare say the difference of sex would imply but a small abatement of curiosity."

"Thou makest no parade of other feelings, which prompt thee to inquire into my fortunes," said Eveline; "but, sweet Rose, I give thee not the less credit for them. Believe me, thou shalt know all—but, I think, not now."

"At your pleasure," said Rose; "and yet, methinks, the bearing in your solitary boom such a fearful secret will only render the weight more intolerable. On my solemn word you may rely as on that of the Holy Image, which bears us confess what it never reveals. Besides, such things become familiar to the imagination when they have been spoken of, and that which is familiar gradually becomes stripped of its terrors."

"Thou speakest with reason, my prudent Rose; and surely in this gallant troop, borne like a flower on a bush by my good palfrey Ysaute—fresh gales blowing round us, flowers opening and birds singing, and having thee by my bridle-rein, I ought to feel this a fitting time to communicate what thou hast so good a title to know. And—yes!—thou shalt know all! Thou art not, I presume, ignorant of the qualities of what the Saxons of this land call a Hake-crast?"

"Pardon me, lady," answered Rose, "my father never raised my listening to such discourses. I might see evil enough, he said, without my imagination being taught to form such as were fantastical. The word Hake-crast, I have heard used by Gillelm and other Saxons; but to me it only conveys some idea of indefinite terror, of which I have never asked nor received an explanation."

"Know then," said Eveline, "it is a spectre, usually the image of a departed person, who, either for wrong sustained in some particular place during life, or through treasure hidden there, or from some such other came, haunts the spot from time to time, becomes familiar to those who dwell there, takes an interest in their fate, occasionally far good in other instances or times for evil. The Paganism of those fore, sometimes regarded as a good genius, sometimes as the avenging fiend, attached to, and a part of, the life and cleanness of men. It is the lot of the family of Baldingham (of no mean note in another respect) to be subject to the visits of such a being.

"May I ask the cause (if it be a way of such visitation)?" said Rosa, desirous to avail herself to the uttermost of the communication of her young lady, which might not perhaps last very long.

"I know the legend but imperfectly," replied Evelyn, proceeding with a degree of reserve, the result of strong exertion over her mental anxiety, but in general it ran thus: Baldrick, the Norman hero who first possessed yonder dwelling, became enamoured of a fair Briton, said to have been descended from those Druids of whom the Welsh speak so much, and deemed not unacquainted with the arts of sorcery, which they practised, when they offered up human sacrifices amid those circles of ink-worm and living rock, of which thou hast seen so many. After more than two years wedlock, Baldrick became weary of his wife to such a point, that he formed the cruel resolution of putting her to death. Some say he doubted her fidelity—some that the matter was pressed on him by the church, as she was suspected of heresy—some that he removed her to make way for a more wealthy marriage—but all agree in the result. He sent two of his Cuchis to the house of Baldingham, to put to death the unfortunate Vanda, and commanded them to bring him the ring which had adorned her finger on the day of wedlock, as token that her words were accomplished. The men were ruthless in their office; they strangled Vanda in yonder apartment, and as the hand was so swollen that neither could draw off the ring, they obtained possession of it by severing the finger. But long before the return of those cruel perpetrators of her death, the shadow of Vanda had appeared before her appalled husband, and, holding up to him her bloody hand, made him fearfully sensible how well his assassins' commands had been obeyed. After haunting him in peace and war, in desert, court, and camp, until he died despairingly on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, the Bahr-gest, or ghost of the murdered Vanda, became so terrible in the House of Baldingham, that the ancient Saint Dunstan was itself scarcely sufficient to put bounds to her visitation. Yet, the blessed saint, when he had succeeded in his exorcism, did, in requital of Baldrick's crime, impose a strong and enduring penalty upon every female descendant of the house, in the third degree, namely, that each in their lives, and before their twenty-first year, they should each spend a solitary night in the chamber of the murdered Vanda, saying therein certain prayers, as well for her repose, as for the suffering soul of her murderer. During that awful space, it is generally believed that the spirit of the murdered person appears to the female who observes the rite, and shows some sign of her future good or bad fortune. If favourable, she appears with a smiling aspect, and craves them with her undivided heart; but she announces evil fortune by showing the hand from which the finger was severed, with a stern countenance, as if pointing upon the destruction of her husband, his children, or herself. Sometimes she was to speak. Then, for instance, I learned from some Norman, old Norman—the son of one of our Margery, who had been an attendant on some grand mother, and left the House of Baldingham when she made her escape from it with my father's father.

"Did your grandmother ever render this homage, said Rosa, "which seems to me under favour of Saint Dunstan—to bring humankind to a knowledge of their course with a being of a doubtful nature?"

"My grandfather thought so, and never permitted my grandmother to revisit the House of Baldingham after her marriage, henceforward between him and his son on the one part, and the members of that family on the other. They had sundry misfortunes, and particularly the loss of male heirs which at that time befell them, to my parent's not having done the hereditary homage to the bloody-ghost Bahr-gest."

"And how could you, my dearest lady," said Rosa, "knowing that they held among them a man of wisdom, think of accepting the invitation of Lady Fremengarde?"

"I can hardly answer you the question," said Evelyn. "Partly I feared my father's recent calamity to be slain (as I have heard him say his own going proved of him) by the enemy he most dreaded, might be the result of this rite having been neglected; and partly I feared that if my mind should be agitated at the danger when it presented itself close to me, it could not be urged on me in courtesy of humanity. I saw how soon my cruel-hand would be poured upon the opportunity, and how possible it became for me, bearing the name, and trust, the spirit of Fremengarde, to escape from the net which I had involved myself."

"No regard for name or rank should have urged me," replied Rosa, "to place myself where such a danger even without the terrors of a real phantom might have punished my presumption with death. But what in the name of Heaven, did you see in this horrible resolution?"

"As there is the question," said Evelyn, "may her hand to her brow. "How I could witness the which I distinctly saw, yet be able to retain command of thought and recollection—I had received the parental directions for the minister and his vicar, and lay down on the couch which was assigned me, had I made such of my clothes as might impede my work. I had surmounted, in short, the first shock which I experienced in committing myself to this mystic chamber, and I hoped to pass the night in sleep as sound as my thoughts were innocent. But I was fearfully disappointed. I cannot judge how long I slept, when my bosom was oppressed by an awful weight, which seemed at once to stifle my soul, and the beating of my heart, and prevent me from drawing my breath, and when I looked up to discover the cause of this horrible suffocation, the form of a murdered British matron stood over my couch, in then life, shadowy, and with a countenance whose traits of dignity and beauty were mingled with the expression of vengeful exultation. She held out to the hand which bore the bloody marks of her husband's cruelty, and seemed as if she urged me to devote me to destruction; while, with an awful tone, she uttered these words—

"Widow's wife and wedded maid, Betrayed, betrayed, and betrayed!"

The phantom stooped over me as she spoke, and lowered her gory fingers, as if to touch my hair, the terror giving me the power of which at first I doubted me. I screamed aloud, the casement of the apartment was thrown open with a loud noise,—and—But she signifies my telling all this to thee, Rosa, who dost so plainly, by the movement of eye and lip, that I consider me as a silly and childish dreamer."

"Do not angry, my dear lady," said Rosa, "I indeed believe that the witch we call Mara has been dealing with you; but she, you know, is by looks considered as no real phantom, but solely the work of our own imagination, disordered by causes which arise from bodily indisposition."

"Thou art learned, maiden," said Evelyn, "but previously, "but when I assure thee that my last angel came to my assistance in a human form—at his appearance the fiend vanished—and I was transported me in his arms out of the chamber of terror, I think thou wilt see a good Christian more sooth in that which I tell you."

"Indeed, indeed, my sweetest matron, I must repeat Rosa. "It is even that circumstance of the guardian angel which makes me consider the whole as a dream. A Norman sentinel, whom I had called from his post on purpose, did indeed come to your assistance, and, breaking into your apartment transported you to that where I myself rescued you from his arms in a lifeline condition."

"A Norman soldier, he?" said Evelyn, "and

"so," said Eveline; "and if you find him among

He struck her palfrey with the rod, and accom-

He then went to make the necessary inquiries

Rose, "and dare not tell the truth—I shall have

A cloud of dust now announced the approach of the Constable of Chester and his retinue, augmented by the attendance of his host Sir William Herbert, and some of his neighbours and kinsmen, who came to pay their respects to the orphan of the Garde Doloureuse, by which appellation Eveline was known upon her passage through their territory.

Eveline remarked, that, at their greeting, De Lacy looked with displeased surprise at the disarrangement of her dress and equipage, which her hasty departure from Baldringham had necessarily occasioned; and she was, on her part, struck with an expression of countenance which seemed to say, "I am not to be treated as an ordinary person, who may be received with negligence, and treated slightly with impunity."
For the first time, she thought that, though always deficient in grace and beauty, the Constable's countenance was formed to express the more angry passions with force and vivacity, and that she who shared his rank and name must lay her account with the implicit surrender of her will and wishes to those of an arbitrary lord and master.

But the cloud soon passed from the Constable's brow; and in the conversation which he afterwards maintained with Herbert and the other knights and gentlemen, who from time to time came to greet and accompany them for a little way on their journey, Eveline had occasion to admire his superiority, both of sense and expression, and to remark the attention and deference with which his words were listened to by men too high in rank, and too proud, readily to admit any pre-eminence that was not founded on ac-knowledgeed merit. The regard of women is generally much influenced by the estimation which an individual maintains in the opinion of men; and Eveline, when she concluded her journey in the Benedictine nunnery in Gloucester, could not think without respect upon the renowned warrior, and celebrated politician, whose acknowledged abilities appeared to place him above every one whom she had seen approach him.
His wife, Eveline thought (and she was not without ambition,) if relinquishing some of those qualities in a husband which are in youth most captivating to the female imagination, must be still generally honoured and respected, and have contentment, if not romantic felicity, within her reach.

CHAPTER XVI.

THE Lady Eveline remained nearly four months with her aunt, the Abbess of the Benedictine nunnery, under whose auspices the Constable of Chester saw his suit advance and prosper as it would probably have done under that of the deceased Raymond Berenger, her brother. It is probable, however, that, but for the supposed vision of the Virgin, and the vow of gratitude which that supposed vision had called forth, the natural dislike of so young a person to a match so unequal in years might have effectually opposed his success. Indeed Eveline, while honouring the Con-stable's virtues, doing justice to his high character, and admiring his talents, could never altogether divest herself of a secret fear of him, which, while it prevented her from expressing any direct disapproba-tion of his addresses, caused her sometimes to shudder, she scarce knew why, at the idea of their becoming successful.

The ominous words, "betraying and betrayed," would then occur to her memory; and when her aunt (the period of the deepest mourning being elapsed) had fixed a day for her betrothal, she looked forward to it with a feeling of terror, for which she was unable to account to herself, and which, as well as the particulars of her dream, she concealed even from Father Aldrovand in the hours of confession. It was not aversion to the Constable—it was far less preference to any other suitor—it was one of those instinctive movements and emotions by which Nature seems to warn us of approaching danger, though furnishing no information respecting its nature, and suggesting no means of escaping from it.

So strong were these intervals of apprehension, that if they had been seconded by the remonstrances of Rose Flammock, as formerly, they might perhaps have led to Evelyn's even yet forming some resolution unfavourable to the suit of the Constable. But, on more anxious for her lady's honour than even for her happiness, Rome had strictly forbore every effort which could affect Evelyn's purpose, when she had once expressed her approbation of De Lacy's address, and whatever she thought of anticipated conducting the proposed marriage, she seemed from the moment to consider it as an event which must soon surely take place.

De Lacy himself, as he learned more intimately to know the merit of the girl which he was desirous of possessing, looked forward with different feelings to wards the union, than those with which he had first proposed the marriage to Raymond Bragor. It was then a mere match of interest and convenience which had occurred to the mind of a proud and political lord, as the best mode of consolidating the power and perpetuating the line of his family. Nor did even the splendour of Evelyn's beauty make the impression upon De Lacy, which it was calculated to do on the fiery and impassioned chivalry of the age. He was past that period of life when the war is excited by outward form, and might have said with truth, as well as with discretion, that he could have wished his beautiful bride several years older, and possessed of a more moderate portion of personal charms. In order to have rendered the match more fitted for his own age and disposition. This stoicism, however, vanished, when, on repeated interviews with his destined bride, he found that she was indeed distinguished in life, but desirous to be guided by superior wisdom, and that, although gifted with high spirit and a disposition which began to recover its natural elastic gaiety, she was gentle, docile, and, above all, endowed with a firmness of principle, which seemed to give assurance that she would tread uprightly, and without spot, the slippery path in which youth, rash, and beauty, are doomed to move.

As feelings of a warmer and more impassioned kind towards Evelyn began to glow in De Lacy's bosom, his engagements as a crusader became more and more burdensome to him. The Benedictine Abbot, the natural guardian of Evelyn's happiness, added to these feelings by his reasoning and remonstrances. Although a nun and a devotee, she held in reverence the holy state of matrimony, and comprehended as much of it as to be aware, that its important purposes could not be accomplished while the whole continent of Europe was interrupted between the married pair, for as to a hint from the Constable, that his young spouse might accompany him into the dangerous and distant provinces of the Crusaders' camp, the good lady crossed herself with horror at the proposal, and never permitted it to be a second time mentioned in her presence.

It was not however, uncommon for kings, princes, and other persons of high consequence, who had taken upon them the vow to rescue Jerusalem, to obtain delays, and even a total remission of their engagements, by proper application to the Church of Rome. The Constable was sure to possess the full advantage of his sovereign's interest and countenance, in seeking permission to remain in England, for he was the noble to whose valour and policy Henry had chiefly intrusted the defence of the disorderly Welsh marches, and it was by no means with his good will that so useful a subject had ever assumed the cross.

It was settled, therefore, in private betwixt the Abbot and the Constable, that the latter should solicit at Rome, and with the Pope's Legate in England, a suspension of his vow for at least two years—a favour which it was thought could scarce be refused to one of his worth and influence, backed as it was with the most liberal offers of assistance towards the redemption of the Holy Land. His offers were indeed multiplied, for he proposed, if his own personal attendants were despatched with, to send a hundred lance-archers, three archers, and a variety of horse-bay, being double the ransom by which his own person was to have been accompanied. He offered besides to defray the sum of two thousand marks to the general expenses of the expedition, to surrender to the use of the Christian ornaments those equipped vessels which he had provided, and which even now awaited the embarkation of himself and his followers.

Yet, while making these magnificent offers, the Constable could not help feeling they would be inadequate to the expectations of the great private knight, who, as he had himself reached the cross, and brought the Constable and many others into the holy engagement, most needs see with discontented work at his departure, endangered, by the ruin of so important an associate from his favourite campaign. To soften, therefore, his disappointment as much as possible, the Constable offered to the Archbishop, in the event of his obtaining licence to return to Britain, his sword should be lent by his nephew, De Lacy, already renowned for his ardent love of chivalry, the present hope of his house, and the heir of his own lady, its future hand and eyes.

The Constable took the most prudent method of communicating this proposal to the Archbishop, by way, through a mutual friend, on whom great reliance could depend, and whose interest with the Pope was regarded as great. But notwithstanding the splendour of the proposal, the Protest heard a cold and obscure silence, and referred to give to a personal conference with the Constable on the point of day, when concerns of the church would the Archbishop to the city of Winchester. The offer of the archbishop was such as induced the Constable to expect a severe struggle with the proud and powerful churchman, but, himself proud and powerful, backed by the favour of his sovereign, he did not expect to be failed in the contest.

The necessity that this point should be given adjourned, as well as the recent loss of Evelyn, gave an air of privacy to De Lacy's words, and prevented his being signified by manner and loss of military skill, in which he would be been otherwise desirous to display his address to eyes of his mistress. The rules of the court prevented his giving entertainments of dancing, or other more pacific revells, and although he could display his affection by the most costly gifts to his future bride and her attendants, he still, as the opinion of the sagacious Dame still prevailed more with the solemnity of a heart, in the light pace of an approaching bride.

The bride herself felt something of this, and thus occasionally it might have been lightened by the eye of young Damian, in whose age, so nearly corresponding to her own, she might have expected relief from the formal courtship of his great age. But he came not, and from what the Countess of concerning him, she was led to imagine that the lessons had for a time at least exchanged appearance and character. The older De Lacy could not, in solemn observance of his vow to sit in a pavilion by the gates of Winchester, but he soon donned his armour, substituted easily mail and silk for his war-worn chimney cloth, and lectured at his advanced time of life more genteel attire than his contemporaries remembered as approaching his early youth. His nephew on the contrary remained almost constantly on the marches of Wales, occupied in settling by persuasion, or taking by main force, the various disturbances to which those provinces were continually agitated, and he was learned with surprise, that it was with difficulty which had prevailed on him to be present at the ceremony of their being betrothed to each other, as the Normans studied the ceremony that he studied. This engagement, which provided the old marriage for a man more or less according to circumstances, was usually celebrated with a solemn corresponding to the rank of the contracting pair.

The Constable added, with expressions of regret that Damian gave himself too little care, reminding his early youth, slept too little, and indulged in a custom a disposition, that his health was failing, and that a learned Jewish leech, whom he had been taken, had given his advice that the warm and more genial climate was necessary to restore his constitution to its general and natural vigour.

Evelyn heard this with much regret, for she remembered Damian as the angel of good tidings, who first brought her news of deliverance from the forces of the Welsh; and the occasions on which they had met, though mournful, brought a sort of pleasure in recollection, so gentle had been the youth's deportment, and so consoling his expressions of sympathy. She wished she could see him, that she might herself judge of the nature of his illness; for, like other damsels of that age, she was not entirely ignorant of the art of healing, and had been taught by Father Aldrovand, himself no mean physician, how to extract healing essences from plants and herbs gathered under planetary hours. She thought it possible that her talents in this art, slight as they were, might perhaps be of service to one already her friend and liberator, and soon about to become her very near relation.

It was therefore with a sensation of pleasure, mingled with some confusion, (at the idea, doubtless, of assuming the part of medical adviser to so young a patient,) that one evening, while the convent was assembled about some business of their chapter, she heard Gillian announce that the kinsman of the Lord Constable desired to speak with her. She snatched up the veil, which she wore in compliance with the customs of the house, and hastily descended to the parlour, commanding the attendance of Gillian, who, nevertheless, did not think proper to obey the signal.

When she entered the apartment, a man whom she had never seen before advanced, kneeled on one knee, and taking up the hem of her veil, saluted it with an air of the most profound respect. She stepped back, surprised and alarmed, although there was nothing in the appearance of the stranger to justify her apprehension. He seemed to be about thirty years of age, tall of stature, and bearing a noble though wasted form, and a countenance on which disease, or perhaps youthful indulgence, had anticipated the traces of age. His demeanour seemed courteous and respectful, even in a degree which approached to excess. He observed Eveline's surprise, and said, in a tone of pride, mingled with emotion, "I fear that I have been mistaken, and that my visit is regarded as an unwelcome intrusion."

"Arise, sir," answered Eveline, "and let me know your name and business. I was summoned to a kinsman of the Constable of Chester."

"And you expected the stripling Damian," answered the stranger. "But the match with which England rings will connect you with others of the house besides that young person; and amongst these, with the luckless Randal de Lacy. Perhaps," continued he, "the fair Eveline Berenger may not even have heard his name breathed by his more fortunate kinsman—more fortunate in every respect, but most fortunate in his present prospects."

This compliment was accompanied by a deep reverence, and Eveline stood much embarrassed how to reply to his civilities; for although she now well remembered to have heard this Randal slightly mentioned by the Constable when speaking of his family, it was in terms which implied that there was no good understanding betwixt them. She therefore only returned his courtesy by general thanks for the honour of his visit, trusting he would then retire; but such was not his purpose.

"I comprehend," he said, "from the coldness with which the Lady Eveline Berenger receives me, that what she has heard of me from my kinsman (if indeed he thought me worthy of being mentioned to her at all) has been, to say the least, unfavourable. And yet my name once stood as high in fields and courts, as that of the Constable; nor is it aught more disgraceful than what is indeed often esteemed the worst of disgraces—poverty, which prevents my still aspiring to places of honour and fame. If my youthful follies have been numerous, I have paid for them by the loss of my fortune, and the degradation of my condition; and therein my happy kinsman might, if he pleased, do me some aid—I mean not with his purse or estate; for, poor as I am, I would not live on alms extorted from the reluctant hand of an estranged friend; but his countenance would put him to no cost, and, in so far, I might expect some favour."

"In that my Lord Constable," said Eveline, "must judge for himself. I have—as yet, at least—no right to interfere in his family affairs; and if I should ever have such right, it will well become me to be cautious how I use it."

"It is prudently answered," replied Randal; "but what I ask of you is merely, that you, in your gentleness, would please to convey to my cousin a suit, which I find it hard to bring my ruder tongue to utter with sufficient submission. The usurers, whose claims have eaten like a canker into my means, now menace me with a dungeon; a threat which they dared not mutter, far less attempt to execute, were it not that they see me an outcast, unprotected by the natural head of my family, and regard me rather as they would some unfriended vagrant, than as a descendant of the powerful House of Lacy."

"It is a sad necessity," replied Eveline; "but I see not how I can help you in such extremity."

"Easily," replied Randal de Lacy. "The day of your betrothal is fixed, as I hear, reported; and it is your right to select what witnesses you please to the solemnity, which may the saints bless! To every one but myself, presence or absence on that occasion is a matter of mere ceremony—to me it is almost life or death. So am I situated, that the marked instance of slight or contempt, implied by my exclusion from this meeting of our family, will be held for the signal of my final expulsion from the House of the De Lacys, and for a thousand bloodhounds to assail me without mercy or forbearance, whom, cowards as they are, even the slightest show of countenance from my powerful kinsman would compel to stand at bay. But why should I occupy your time in talking thus?—Farewell, madam—be happy—and do not think of me the more harshly, that for a few minutes I have broken the tenor of your happy thoughts, by forcing my misfortunes on your notice."

"Stay, sir," said Eveline, affected by the tone and manner of the noble suppliant; "you shall not have it to say that you have told your distress to Eveline Berenger, without receiving such aid as is in her power to give. I will mention your request to the Constable of Chester."

"You must do more, if you really mean to assist me," said Randal de Lacy, "you must make that request your own. You do not know," said he, continuing to bend on her a fixed and expressive look, "how hard it is to change the fixed purpose of a De Lacy—a twelvemonth hence you will probably be better acquainted with the firm texture of our resolutions. But, at present, what can withstand your wish should you deign to express it?"

"Your suit, sir, shall not be lost for want of my advancing it with my good word and good wishes," replied Eveline; "but you must be well aware that its success or failure must rest with the Constable himself."

Randal de Lacy took his leave with the same air of deep reverence which had marked his entrance; only that, as he then saluted the skirt of Eveline's robe, he now rendered the same homage by touching her hand with his lip. She saw him depart with a mixture of emotions, in which compassion was predominant; although in his complaints of the Constable's unkindness to him there was something offensive, and his avowal of follies and excess seemed uttered rather in the spirit of wounded pride, than in that of contrition.

When Eveline next saw the Constable, she told him of the visit of Randal, and of his request; and strictly observing his countenance while she spoke, she saw, that at the first mention of his kinsman's name, a gleam of anger shot along his features. He soon subdued it, however, and fixing his eyes on the ground, listened to Eveline's detailed account of the visit, and her request "that Randall might be one of the invited witnesses to their fiancailles."

The Constable paused for a moment, as if he were considering how to elude the solicitation. At length he replied, "You do not know for whom you ask this, or you would perhaps have forborne your request;

neither are you apprised of its full import, though my crafty spouse well knows, that when I do him the grace which he asks, I bind myself, as it were, in the eye of the world once more—and it will be for the third time—to interfere in his affairs, and place them on such a footing as may afford him the means of re-establishing his fallen consequence, and repairing his numerous errors.

"And whither now, my lord?" said the generous Eveline. "If he has been ruined only through folly, he is now of an age when there are no longer tempting errors, and if his heart and head be good, he may yet be an honour to the House of De Lacy."

The Constable shook his head. "He hath indeed," he said, "a heart and hand fit for service, God knoweth, whether in good or evil. But never shall it be said that you, my fair Eveline, made request of Hugh de Lacy, which he was not to his uttermost willing to comply with. Randall shall attend at our banquet, there is indeed the more cause for his attendance, as I somewhat fear we may lack that of our valued nephew Damian, whose melody rather increases than decreases, and, as I hear, with strange symptoms of an untoward disturbance of mind and state of temper, to which the youth hath not hitherto been subject."

CHAPTER XVII.

Ring out the merry bells, the bride approaches.
The blushing bride has changed the evening,
For that is dancing night—O'er, good night.
These clouds betoken night of evil omen. —OLD FRENCH.

THE day of the banquet, or espousals, was now approaching, and it seemed that neither the professors of the Abbey, nor his practice at least, were so rigid as to prevent her selecting the great parlour of the convent for that holy rite, although necessarily introducing many male guests within those sacred precincts, and notwithstanding that the ritual itself was the preliminary to a state which the inmates of the cloister had renounced for ever. The Abbess's Norman pride of birth, and the real interest which she took in her niece's advancement, overcame all scruples, and the venerable mother might be seen in unwearied bustle, now giving orders to the gardeners for decking the apartment with flowers, now to her cellarer, her procurator, and the lay sisters of the kitchen, for preparing a splendid banquet, mingling her commands on these worldly subjects with an occasional speculation on their vanity and worthlessness, and every now and then converting the busy and anxious looks which she threw upon her preparations into a solemn turning upward of eyes and folding of hands, as one who sighed over the mere earthy pomp which she took such trouble in superintending. At another time the good lady might have been seen in close consultation with Father Adrovand, upon the canonical, civil and religious, which was to govern the solemnity of such consequence.

While the reins of discipline, although relaxed for a season, were not entirely thrown away, the outer court of the convent was at this time opened for the reception of the guests, but the younger sisters and novices of it were carefully secluded in the more inner apartments of the extensive building, under the immediate eye of a grim old nun, or, as the conventional rule designed her, an ancient, and, various persons, termed Maistress of the Novices, were not permitted to pollute their eyes by looking on waving plumes and trailing mantles. A few sisters, indeed, of the Abbess's own standing, were left at liberty, being such goods as it was thought could not, in any case, be taken from the air, and which are therefore left lying loose on the counter. These gaudy dames went merrily about with much affected indifference, and a great deal of real curiosity, endeavouring indirectly to get information concerning names, and dresses, and quarrels, without daring to show much interest in these vanities as actual questions on the subject might have implied.

A stout band of the Constable's spearmen guarded the gate of the nursery, admitting within the halllowed precinct the few only who were to be present at the solemnity, with their principal attendants, and while the former were ushered with all due ceremony into the apartments dressed out for the occasion, the attendants, although detained in the outer court, were liberally supplied with refreshments of the most substantial kind, and had the amusement, as day is the normal classes, of examining and criticizing the masters and maistresses, as they passed into the outer apartments prepared for their reception.

Amongst the domestics who were thus employed, were old Raoul the huntsman and his jolly daughter, gay and glorious, in a new coat of green velvet, she gracious and comely, in a kirtle of yellow silk, fringed with miniver, and that of no mean value equally banded in beholding the gay couple. The most inveterate were here their occasional use of wine, the most better and best of weather, hours of warmth and of calmness, and so was with the matrimonial horizon of the amiable pair, which, usually cloudy, had now for a brief space cleared up. The splendour of their new apparel, the worth of the spectacle around them, with the perhaps, of a bowl of murraine, qualified by Raoul, and a cup of hippocras topped by his wife, had indeed drawn them rather more agreeably, in each other's eyes than was their wont; good cheer being a rare case, as oil is to a rusty lock, the turning of many of their valves move smoothly and gliding, while others were work not together at all, or by strange and groans express their reluctance to move at all. The pair had stuck themselves into a kind of sofa, three or four steps from the ground, which seemed a small stone bench, whence their curious eyes and avowals with advantage every guest who entered the court.

Thus placed, and in their present state of temporary concord, Raoul with his frosty visage formed a most representative of January, the better suited the year, and though Gillian was past the bloom of youthful May, yet the melting fire of a still black eye, and the genial glow of a ripe and comely cheek, made her a lively type of the fruitful and good August. Dame Gillian used to make it her business that she could please every body with her gaze, when she chose it from Raymond Borenger down to Robert the horse-boy; and like a good housewife who, to keep her hand in use, will sometimes condescend to dress a dish for her husband's eating, she now thought proper to practise her power of pleasing on old Raoul, fairly comparing, in her successful million of worth and sense, not only to cynical temperament towards all human kind, to his peculiar and special disposition to be torn by his spouse. Her jokes, such as they were, and the coquetry with which they were delivered, had not an effect on the Timon of the woods, that he could up his cynical nose, displayed his few straight teeth like a cat about to bite, broke out into a bellowing laugh, which was more like the cry of one of his own kind, stopped short in the explosion, as if he had suddenly recollected that it was out of character, yet, as he resumed his accustomed gravity, he cast such a glance at Gillian as made his old eyes jump, puffed eyes, and convulsed nose, but a small resemblance to one of those fantastic faces which decorate the upper end of old beam ends.

"Is not this better than laying your dog-lamb at your loving wife's, as if she were a brach of the breed?" said August to January.

"In truth it is," answered January, in a firm tone, "and so it is also better than doing the brach-tricks which bring the lamb into exercise."

"Humph!" said Gillian, in the tone of one who thought her husband's proposition might have been disputed, but instantly changing the note to that of tender complaint, "Ah! Raoul, she said, 'do not remember how you once had me bound at late last. Our Lady soothe him!—took my cross-breath for a penny rose!'"

"Ay ay," said the huntsman, "I remember of old master would make such matches—Our Lady soothe him! as you say—The best bound will be country."

"And how could you think, dearest Raoul, to let the wife of thy bosom go so long without a new kirtle?" said his helpmate.

"Why thou hast got one from our young lady that might serve a countess," said Raoul, his concord jarred by her touching this chord—"how many kirtles wouldst thou have?"

"Only two, kind Raoul; just that folk may not count their children's age by the date of Dame Gillian's last new gown."

"Well, well—it is hard that a man cannot be in good humour once and away without being made to pay for it. But thou shalt have a new kirtle at Michaelmas, when I sell the bucks' hides for the season. The very antlers should bring a good penny this year."

"Ay, ay," said Gillian; "I ever tell thee, husband, the horns would be worth the hide in a fur market."

Raoul turned bristly round as if a wasp had stung him, and there is no guessing what his reply might have been to this seemingly innocent observation, had not a gallant horseman at that instant entered the court, and, dismounting like the others, gave his horse to the charge of a squire, or squerry, whose attire blazed with embroidery.

"By Saint Hubert, a proper horseman, and a dandy for an earl," said Raoul; "and my Lord Constable's horses woe!—yet I know not the gallant."

"But I do," said Gillian; "It is Randal de Lacy, the Constable's kinsman, and as good a man as ever came of the name."

"Oh! by Saint Hubert, I have heard of him—men say he is a reveller, and a jangler, and a waster of his goods."

"Man he now and then," said Gillian, drily.

"And women also," replied Raoul;—"why, methinks he winked on thee just now."

"That right eye of thine saw never true since our good lord—Saint Mary rent him!—flung a cup of wine in thy face, for pressing ever boldly into his withdrawing room."

"I marvel," said Raoul, as if he heard her not, "that yonder ruffler comes hither. I have heard that he is suspected to have attempted the Constable's life, and that they have not spoken together for five years."

"He comes on my young lady's invitation, and that I know full well," said Dame Gillian; "and he is less like to do the Constable wrong than to have wrong at his hand, poor gentleman, as indeed he has had enough of that already."

"And who told thee so?" said Raoul, bitterly.

"No matter, it was one who knew all about it very well," said the dame, who began to fear that, in displaying her triumph of superior information, she had been rather over-communicative.

"It must have been the devil, or Randal himself," said Raoul, "for no other mouth is large enough for such a lie.—But hark ye, Dame Gillian, who is he that goes forward next, like a man that scarce sees how he goes?"

"Even your angel of grace, my young Squire Damian," said Dame Gillian.

"It is impossible!" answered Raoul—"Call me blind if thou wilt,—but I have never seen man so changed in a few weeks—and his attire is flung on him so wildly as if he wore a horse-cloth round him instead of a mantle.—What can ail the youth?—he has made a dead pause at the door, as if he saw something on the threshold that debared his entrance.—Saint Hubert, but he looks as if he were self-stricken!"

"You ever thought him such a treasure?" said Gillian; "and now look at him as he stands by the side of a real gentleman, how he starts and trembles as if he were distraught."

"I will speak to him," said Raoul, forgetting his lameness, and springing from his elevated station—"I will speak to him; and, if he be unwell, I have my lancets and flames to bleed man as well as brute."

"And a fit physician for such a patient," muttered Gillian,—"a dog-leech for a dreaming meddler, that neither knows his own disease nor the way to cure it."

Mean while the old huntsman made his way towards the entrance, before which Damian remained standing, in apparent uncertainty whether he should enter or not, regardless of the crowd around, and at the same time attracting their attention by the singularity of his deportment.

Raoul had a private regard for Damian; for which, perhaps, it was a chief reason, that of late his wife had been in the habit of speaking of him in a tone more disrespectful than she usually applied to handsome young men. Doubtless, he understood the youth was a second Sir Tristram in silver armour by word and river, and there needed no more to set on Raoul's soul to him with hands of steel. He saw with great concern his conduct attract general notice, mixed with some ridicule.

"He stands," said the town-jester, who had crowded into the gay throng, "before the gate, like Belshazzar's case in the Mystery, when the animal sees so much more than can be seen by any one else."

A cut from Raoul's ready laugh rewarded the felicity of this application, and sent the fool howling off to seek a more favourable audience for his pleasantry. At the same time Raoul pressed up to Damian, and with an earnestness very different from his usual dry causticity of manner, begged him, for God's sake not to make himself the general spectacle, by standing there as if the devil sat on the doorway, but either to enter, or, what might be as becoming, to return, and make himself more fit in apparel for attending on a solemnity so nearly concerning his house.

"And what ails my apparel, old man?" said Damian, turning sternly on the huntsman, as one who has been hastily and uncivilly roused from a reverie.

"Only, with respect to your valour," answered the huntsman, "men do not usually put old mantles over new doublets; and methinks, with submission, that of yours neither accords with your dress nor is fitted for this noble presence."

"Then art a fool!" answered Damian, "and as green in wit as grey in years. Know you not that in these days the young and old consort together—contract together—wed together? and should we take more care to make our apparel consistent than our actions?"

"For God's sake, my lord," said Raoul, "forbear these wild and dangerous words! they may be heard by other ears than mine, and construed by worse interpreters. There may be here those who will pretend to track mischief from light words, as I would find a buck from his fraying. Your cheek is pale, my lord, your eye is bloodshot; for Heaven's sake return!"

"I will not return," said Damian, with yet more distemperature of manner, "till I have seen the Lady Eveleen."

"For the sake of all the saints," ejaculated Raoul, "not now!—You will do my lady meritable injury by forcing yourself into her presence in this condition."

"Do you think so?" said Damian, the remark coming to operate as a sedative which enabled him to collect his scattered thoughts—"Do you really think so? I thought that to have looked upon her once more—but no—you are in the right, old man."

He turned from the door as if to withdraw, but ere he could accomplish his purpose, he turned yet more pale than before, staggered, and fell on the pavement ere Raoul could afford him his support, unless as that might have proved. Those who raised him were surprised to observe that his garments were smirched with blood, and that the stains upon his cloak, which had been criticised by Raoul, were of the same complexion. A grave-looking personage, wrapped in a red-coloured mantle, came forth from the crowd.

"I knew how it would be," he said; "I made venesection this morning, and commanded repose and sleep according to the aphorisms of Hippocrates; but if young gentlemen will neglect the ordinance of their physician, medicine will avenge herself. It is impossible that my handage or ligature, laid by these fingers, should have started but to avenge the neglect of the precepts of art."

"I am he," answered the elder De Lacy; "but if thy business be not the more hearty, I cannot now speak with thee—I am bound on matters of life and death."

"I take all Christian people to witness that I have discharged my duty," said the paritor, putting into the hand of the Constable a slip of parchment.

"How is this, fellow?" said the Constable in great indignation "for whom or what does your master the Archbishop take me, that he deals with me in this uncourteous fashion, citing me to compare before him more like a delinquent than a friend or a nobleman."

"My gracious lord," answered the paritor, haughtily, "is accountable to no one but our Holy Father the Pope, for the exercise of the power which is entrusted to him by the canons of the Church. Your lordship's answer to my citation?"

"Is the Archbishop present in this city?" said the Constable, at a moment's reflection. "I knew not of his purpose to travel hither, or of his purpose to exercise authority within these bounds."

"My gracious lord the Archbishop," said the paritor, "is but now arrived in this city of which he is metropolitan, and besides, by his apostolic commission, a legate a latere hath plenary jurisdiction throughout all England, so that he may bid (whatsoever be the degree) who may dare to disobey his summons."

"Hark thee, fellow," said the Constable, regarding the paritor with a grim and angry countenance, "were it not for certain respects, which I promise thee thy towny hood hath little to do with, thou wert better have swallowed thy citation, and all that delivered it to me with the addition of such unbecoming terms. Go hence, and tell your master I will see him within the space of an hour, during which time I am delayed by the necessity of attending a sick relation."

The paritor left the apartment with more humility in his manner than when he had entered, and left the assembled guests to look upon each other in silence and dismay.

The reader cannot fail to remember how severely the yoke of the Roman supremacy pressed both on the clergy and laity of England during the reign of Henry II. Even the attempt of that wise and courageous monarch to make a stand for the independence of his throne in the memorable case of Thomas a Becket, had such an unhappy issue, that, like a suppressed rebellion, it was found to add new strength to the domination of the Church. Since the subjugation of the king in that ill-fated struggle, the voice of Rome had double potency whenever it was heard, and the boldest peers of England held it more wise to submit to her imperious dictates, than to provoke a spiritual censure which had so many secular consequences. Hence the slight and scornful manner in which the Constable was treated by the prelate Baldwin struck a chill of astonishment into the assembly of friends whom he had collected to witness his espousals, and as he glanced his haughty eye around, he saw that many who would have stood by him through life and death in any other quarrel, had it even been with his sovereign, were turning pale at the very thought of a collision with the Church. Embarrassed, and at the same time incensed at their timidity, the Constable heaved to dismiss them, with the general assurance that all would be well—that his nephew's indisposition was a trifling complaint, exaggerated by a concerted physician, and by his own want of care—and that the message of the Archbishop, so unceremoniously delivered, was but the consequence of their mutual and friendly familiarity, which induced them sometimes, for the peer's sake, to reverse or neglect the ordinary forms of intercourse.—"If I wanted to speak to the prelate Baldwin on express business and in haste, such as the humility and indifference to form of that worthy pillar of the Church, that I should not fear offence," said the Constable, "did I send the meanest horse-boy in my troop to ask an audience of him?"

So he spoke—but there was something in his countenance which contradicted his words; and his friends and relations retired from the splendid and joyful company of his espousals as from a funeral feast, with anxious thoughts and with downcast eyes.

Randal was the only person, who, having attentively watched the whole progress of the affair during the evening, ventured to approach his cousin as he left the house, and asked him, "in the name of their reputed friendship, whether he had nothing to commend him?" assuring him, with a look more expressive than his words, that he would not find him cold in his service.

"I have naught which can deserve your aid, fair cousin," replied the Constable, with the air of one who partly questioned the speaker's sincerity; and the parting reverences with which he accompanied his words, left Randal no pretext for continuing his attendance, as he aimed to have designed.

CHAPTER XVIII.

Oh, were I seated high as my ambition,

It should this necked fast on necks of mortals.

Myrtles Bower.

THE most anxious and unhappy moment of Hugo de Lacy's life, was unquestionably that in which, by espousing Eveline with all civil and religious solemnity, he seemed to approach to what for some time he had considered as the prime object of his wishes. He was assured of the early possession of a beautiful and amiable wife, endowed with such advantages of worldly goods, as gratified his ambition as well as his affections—Yet, even in this fortunate moment, the horizon darkened around him in a manner which presaged naught but storm and calamity. At his nephew's lodging he learned that the pulse of the patient had risen, and his delirium had augmented, and all around him spoke very doubtfully of his chance of recovery or surviving a crisis which seemed speedily approaching. The Constable stole towards the door of the apartment which his feelings permitted him not to enter and listened to the reviving which the fever gave rise to. Nothing can be more melancholy than to hear the mind at work concerning its ordinary occupations, when the body is stretched in pain and danger upon the couch of severe sickness; the contrast between the ordinary state of health, its joys or its labours, renders doubly affecting the actual helplessness of the patient before whom these visions are rising, and we feel a corresponding degree of compassion for the sufferer whose thoughts are wandering so far from his real condition.

The Constable felt this acutely, so he heard his nephew shout the war-cry of the family repeatedly, appearing, by the words of command and direction, which he uttered from time to time, to be actively engaged in leading his men-at-arms against the Welsh. At another time he muttered various terms of the manage, of falconry, and of the chase—he mentioned his uncle's name repeatedly on these occasions, as if the idea of his kinsmen had been connected alike with his martial encounters, and with his sports by wood and river. Other sounds there were, which he muttered so low as to be altogether undistinguishable.

With a heart even still more distressed towards his kinsman's sufferings from hearing the points on which his mind wandered, the Constable twice opened his hand to the latch of the door, in order to enter the bedroom, and twice forbore, his eyes running faster with tears than he chose should be witnessed by the attendants. At length, relinquishing his purpose, he hastily left the house, mounted his horse and, followed only by four of his personal attendants, rode towards the palace of the Bishop, where, as he learned from public rumour, the Archbishop Baldwin had taken up his temporary residence.

The train of riders and of led horses, of sumpter-mules, and of menials and attendants, both lay and ecclesiastical, which thronged around the gate of the episcopal mansion, together with the gaping crowd of inhabitants who had gathered around, some to gaze upon the splendid show, some to have the chance of receiving the benediction of the Holy Prelate, was so great as to impede the Constable's approach at the palace-door; and when this obstacle was surmounted, he found another in the obduracy of the Archbishop's attendants, who permitted him not, though announced by name and title, to cross the threshold of the mansion, until they should receive the express command of their master to that effect.

The Constable felt the full effect of this slighting reception. He had dismounted from his horse in full confidence of being instantly admitted into the palace at least, if not into the Prelate's presence; and as he now stood on him arriving, he surveyed grimly, and henceforth of the spirit was used, he was so much disgusted that his first impulse was to remount his horse and return to his parsonage, for the time being, the city walls were high. The Bishop to seek him there if he was sojourning at his residence. But the necessity of expiating almost instantaneously rushed on his mind and subdued the first, though impulsive of his offended pride. "If not now King," he said to himself, "hath heid he sitting at the Prelate of Canterbury when living, and subjected to the most degrading attentions before his shrine when dead, surely I need not be more scrupulous towards his greatly exalted in the same overgrown authority." Another thought, which he dared hardly to acknowledge, recommended the same humble and submissive course. He could not but feel that, in endeavouring to evade his vows as a crusader, he was incurring some just censure from the church, and he was not unwilling to hope, that his present cold and scornful reception on Baldwin's part, might be meant as a part of the penance which his conscience informed him his conduct was about to receive.

After a short interval, De Lacy was at length invited to enter the palace of the Bishop of Gloucester, in which he was to meet the Primate of England, but there was more than one brief pause, in hall and antechamber, ere he at length was admitted to Baldwin's presence.

The account of the celebrated Becket had neither the extensive view, nor the inspiring spirit, of that sublimated personage, but, on the other hand, since as the latter had become, it may be questioned, whether, in his professions for the weal of Christendom, he was half so sincere as was the present Archbishop. Baldwin was, in truth, a man well qualified to defend the powers which the Church had gained, though perhaps of a character too sincere and candid to be active in extending them. The advancement of the Crusade was the chief business of his life, his success the principal cause of his pride; and, if the action of possessing the powers of eloquent personage, and still to bend the minds of men to his purposes, was blessed with his religious soul, still the terror of his life, and afterwards his death before Pontremone, showed that the liberation of the Holy Sepulchre from the infidels was the unfeigned object of all his exertions. Hugo de Lacy well knew this, and the difficulty of managing such a temper appeared much greater to him on the eve of the interview in which the attempt was to be made, than he had suffered himself to suppose when the crusade was yet distant.

The Primate, a man of a handsome and stately form, with features rather too severe to be pleasing, received the Constable in all the pomp of ecclesiastical dignity. He was seated on a chair of oak, richly carved with Gothic ornaments, and placed above the rest of the floor under a niche of the same workmanship. His dress was the rich episcopal robe, ornamented with costly embroidery and fringed around the neck and cuffs; it opened from the throat and in the middle and showed an under garment of embroidery between the folds of which, as if imperfectly concealed, peeped the close shirt of haircloth which the Primate constantly wore under all his pompous attire. His mitre was placed beside him on an ornate table of the same workmanship with his throne, against which also rested his pastoral staff, representing a shepherd's crook of the simplest form, yet which had proved more powerful and fruitful than lance or cross, when wielded by the hand of Becket.

A chaplain in a white surplice knee distance before a desk, and read forth in a loud voice some portion of a the book, in which Baldwin appeared so dim that he did not seem to notice the Constable, who, highly displeased at sight, stood on the floor of the hall, whether to interrupt the reader and to leave at once, or to withdraw without a call. Ere he had formed a resolution had arrived at some convenient point where the Archbishop stopped him on his way.

It was in vain that the proud would conceal the embarrassment with which watched the Prelate, whose attitude assumed for the purpose of impressing and solicitude. He tried, indeed, to maintain of such calm as might charade friendship, or at least of such indifference for the possession of perfect tranquility in both, and his address exposed pride, mixed with no ordinary degree of meanness. The genius of the Catholic Church such occasions were to perform its duty on that of the last.

"I perceive," said De Lacy, collecting and ashamed to find he had difficulty. "I perceive that an old friendship with Archbishop Hugo de Lacy might have other messenger to summon him to your presence, and that another welcome should on his arrival."

The Archbishop raised himself slowly and made a half inclination towards the man, by an instinctive desire of courtesy, and it lower than he had intended, or this courtesy meant. The Prelate at the signing to his chaplain, the latter arose and receiving permission in the phrase "I retreated reverentially, without either turn or looking upwards, his eyes fixed on the hands still folded in his habit, and cross between."

When this mute attendant had duly Prelate's brow became more open, yet still shade of grave displeasure, and he replied, "I shall not owe my lord to my brave Constable of Chester has been a great Baldwin, or with what love and loyalty I have seen the holy sign of the cross to honour him by whom he has himself to honour, vow himself to the deliverance of Holy Land. If I will see that which I see, in the same holy resolution let me joyful truth, and I will lay aside riches and tend his horse like a groom, if it be so much mental service to show the cardinal to him."

"Reverend father," answered De Lacy, "I had hoped that the proposals were made to you on my part by the Duke, might have secured more satisfactory eyes." Then, regaining his native and proceeded with more assurance as usual, for the cold inflexible looks of the irritated him. "If these proposals can be my lord, let me know in what points, and your pleasure shall be done, even if it is somewhat unreasonable. I would have lord, with Holy Church, and at the last day, as her mandate. This has been his field, and remains in the east, the day my services have merited could be long ago from the Primate of England."

"Do you applaud the Church with your own men?" said Baldwin. "I tell the Lord, that what Heaven hath wrought in the hand of man, had it been the day have been achieved with as much ease as out horse-boy in thy hand. It is then that in being the chosen instrument by which great things have been wrought in Israel—Nay, interrupt me not—I tell thee, proud baron, that, in the sight of heaven, thy wisdom is but as folly, thy courage, like thou dost boast, but the cowardice of a village idiot—thy strength weakness—thy spear an oven, thy sword a bulrush.”

“All this I know—good father,” said the Constable, “but have ever heard it repeated when such poor things as I may have rendered are given and just owing, when there was need for my helping hand, I am the very great lord of priests and prelates, and one should be honoured and prayed for with patrons and founders who sleep in the choir and under the high altar. There was no thought, I trow, of such an offence, when I have been prayed to catch my own or draw my weapon. It is only when they are assured that they and their own are understood all, my reverend father, be it so—if the Church can be the Saracens from the Holy Land by grooves of horse-bays, wherefore do you preach knights and blasphemers from the houses and the countries which they learn to protect and defend?”

The Archbishop looked steadily on him as he replied, but for the sake of their earthly aims do we disturb our knights and barons in their prosecution of heretic sects, and murderous deeds, which you call saving these houses and protecting their domains?—Is that Omnipotence requires their arm of flesh to wage the great productive work of liberation,—for the weal of their immortal souls. These last words he pronounced with great emphasis.

The Constable paced the floor impatiently, and muttered to himself. Such is the very guerdon for which our hosts have been drawn from Europe to drench sands of Palestine with their gore—such the vain names for which we are called upon to barter our very, our lands, and our lives.”

“Is it Hugo de Lacy speaks thus?” said the Archbishop, arising from his seat and qualifying his tone somewhat with the appearance of shame and of regret—“Is it he who underpins the renown of a knight—the virtue of a Christian—the advancement of an earthly honour—the more calculable profit of a mortal soul? Is it he who desires a solid and actual recompense in lands or treasure to be by warring on his less powerful neighbours?”

“While knightly honour and religious faith, his due a knight and his baptism as a Christian, call for a more glorious and more dangerous strife?”

“Is it indeed Hugo de Lacy, the mirror of the Norman chivalry, whose thoughts can contain such sentiments, whose words can utter them?”

“Tactless and fast speech, suitably mixed with lies and reproaches, my lord,” answered the Constable, colouring and biting his lip, “may carry your weight with others, but I am of a temper too solid to be whistled or goaded into measures of imbecility. Further therefore, this strain of affected sentiment, and believe me, that whether he goes to the Crusade or abides at home, the character of Hugo de Lacy will remain as unimpaired as that of the Archbishop Baskwin in point of nobility.”

“Nay, it stands much higher,” said the Archbishop, “than the reputation with which you vouchsafe to regard it; but a blame may be ascribed as well to me; and I tell the Constable of Chester, that those which has cut on his banner for so many years may sit from it in one moment, never to be used.”

“Who dares to say so?” said the Constable, trembling alive to the honour for which he had encountered so many dangers.

“A friend,” said the Prelate, “whose stripes should be revered as benefits. You think of pay, Sir Constable, and of guerdon, as if you still stood in the dust, free to chaffer on the terms of your service. No, you are no longer your own master—you, by the blessed badge you have voluntarily assumed, the emblem of God himself, nor can you fly to your standard without such infamy as even fools or grooves are unwilling to wear.”

“You deal all too hardly with us, my lord,” said

Hugo de Lacy, stopping short in his troubled walk. “You of the spirituality make us laymen the purchasers of your own concerns, and climb to ambitious heights by the help of our overburdened shoulders; but all both in haste—Heckel transgressed it, and”

A gloomy and expressive look corresponded with the tone in which he spoke these broken sentences; and the Prelate, at no loss to comprehend his meaning, replied, in a firm and determined voice, “And he was murdered!” that is what you dare to hint to me—ever to me, the successor of that glorious saint—as a motive for complying with your selfish and selfish wish to withdraw your hand from the plough. You know not to whom you address such a threat. True, Heckel, from a saint militant on earth, arrived, by the bloody path of martyrdom, to the dignity of a saint in Heaven, and no less true as it that, to attain a seat a thousand degrees beneath that of his blessed predecessor, the unworthy Heiden were willing to submit, under our Lady’s protection, to whatever the worst of wicked men can inflict on his earthly frame.”

“There needs not this show of courage, reverend father,” said De Lacy, recollecting himself, “where there neither is, nor can be danger. I pray you, let us debate this matter more deliberately. I have never meant to break off my purpose for the Holy Land, but only to postpone it. Methinks the offers that I have made are few and ought to obtain for me what has been granted to others in the like case—a slight delay in the hour of my departure.”

“A slight delay on the part of such a leader as you, noble De Lacy,” answered the Prelate, “were a death-blow to our holy and most gallant enterprise. To meaner men we might have granted the privilege of marrying and giving in marriage, even although they care not for the sorrows of Jacob; but you, my lord, are a main prop of our enterprise, and, being withdrawn, the whole fabric ever fall to the ground. Who in England will deem himself obliged to press forward, when Hugo de Lacy falls back? Think, my lord, how upon your plighted bride, and more on your plighted word, and believe not that a woman can ever come to grief, which shakes your purpose towards our blessed undertaking for the honour of Christendom.”

The Constable was embarrassed by the pertinacity of the Prelate and began to give way to his arguments, though most reluctantly, and only because the habits and opinions of the time left him no means of combating his arguments, otherwise than by subterfuge. “I admit,” he said, “my engagements for the Crusade, nor have I—I repeat it—further delay than that brief interval which may be necessary to place my important affairs in order. Mean while, my vessels led by my nephew.”

“Promise that which is within thy power,” said the Prelate. “Who knows whether in remembrance of thy oath, or that thy things there are much duly done, thy nephew may not be called home, even while we speak together?”

“God forbid!” said the Baron, starting up, as if about to depart, “I am a good man; then suddenly pausing, he turned to the Prelate a look and investigating gaze. “It is not well,” he said, “that your reverence should thus tarry with the dangers which threaten—Heaven! I am in a great need for his own good qualities, but for the sake of my only brother. My waiting time is but a few days when we were in our business with each other. I, my lord, your words are much to be valued, and I will not be so much as to say so.”

The Archbishop perceived he had at length touched the chord to which his religious position’s heart strings must needs vibrate. He replied with enthusiasm, as well knowing with whom he had to deal. “Far be it from me to presume to interpret the counsels of Heaven!” he said, “in Scripture, that when the fathers are not present on the earth of the children are set on edge. What a reason is so that we should be punished for our own and customary, by a judgment specially calculated to abate and bend that spirit of antiquity?” You yourself best know if this disease clung to thy nephew before you had meditated defection from the banner of the Cross."

• Self-interest, or corruption.

Hugo de Lacy hastily recollected himself, and found that it was indeed true, that, until he thought of his union with Eveline, there had appeared no change in his nephew's health. His silence and confusion did not escape the artful Prelate. He took the hand of the warrior as he stood, before him overwhelmed in doubt, lest his preference of the continuance of his own house to the rescue of the Holy Sepulchre should have been punished by the disease which threatened his nephew's life. "Come," he said, "noble De Lacy—the judgment provoked by a moment's presumption may be even yet averted by prayer and penitence. The diabolical went back at the prayer of the good King Hezekiah—down, down upon thy knees, and doubt not that, with confession, and penance, and absolution, thou mayst yet atone for thy falling away from the cause of Heaven."

Borne down by the dictates of the religion in which he had been educated, and by the fears lest his delay was punished by his nephew's indisposition and danger, the Constable sunk on his knees before the Prelate, whom he had shortly before well nigh braved, confessed, as a sin to be deeply repented of, his purpose of delaying his departure for Palestine, and received, with patience at least, if not with willing acquiescence, the penance inflicted by the Archbishop; which consisted in a prohibition to proceed farther in his proposed wedlock with the Lady Eveline, until he was returned from Palestine, where he was bound by his vow to abide for the term of three years.

"And now, noble De Lacy," said the Prelate, "once more my best beloved and most honoured friend—is not thy bosom lighter since thou hast thus nobly acquitted thee of thy debt to Heaven, and cleansed thy gallant spirit from those selfish and earthly stains which dimmed its brightness?"

The Constable sighed. "My happiest thoughts at this moment," he said, "would arise from knowledge that my nephew's health is amended."

"Be not discomfited on the score of the noble Damian, your hopeful and valorous kinsman," said the Archbishop, "for well I trust shortly ye shall hear of his recovery; or that, if it shall please God to remove him to a better world, the passage shall be so easy, and his arrival in yonder haven of bliss so speedy, that it were better for him to have died than to have lived."

The Constable looked at him, as if to gather from his countenance more certainty of his nephew's fate than his words seemed to imply; and the Prelate, to escape being farther pressed on a subject on which he was perhaps conscious he had adventured too far, rung a silver bell which stood before him on the table, and commanded the chaplain who entered at the summons, that he should despatch a careful messenger to the lodging of Damian Lacy, to bring particular accounts of his health.

"A stranger," answered the chaplain, "just come from the sick chamber of the noble Damian Lacy, waits here even now to have speech of my Lord Constable."

"Admit him instantly" said the Archbishop—"my mind tells me he brings us joyful tidings.—Never knew I such humble penitence, such willing resignation of natural affections and desires to the doing of Heaven's service, but it was rewarded with a guerdon either temporal or spiritual."

As he spoke, a man singularly dressed entered the apartment. His garments, of various colours and showily disposed, were none of the newest or cleanest, neither were they altogether fitting for the presence in which he now stood.

"How now arrah!" said the Prelate; "when was it that jugglers and minstrels pressed into the company of such as we without permission?"

"So please you," said the man, "my instant business was not with your reverend lordship, but with my lord the Constable, to whom I will hope that my good news may atone for my evil apparel."

"Speak, arrah, does my kinsman live?" said the Constable eagerly.

"And is like to live, my lord," answered the man—

"a favourable crisis (so the leeches call it) hath taken place in his disorder, and they are no longer under any apprehensions for his life."

"Now, God be praised, that hath granted me so much mercy!" said the Constable.

"Amen, amen!" replied the Archbishop solemnly.—"About what period did this blessed change take place?"

"Scarcely a quarter of an hour since," said the messenger, "a soft sleep fell on the sick youth, like dew upon a parched field in summer—he breathed freely—the burning heat abated—and, as I said, the leech no longer fear for his life."

"Marked you the hour, my Lord Constable?" said the Bishop, with exultation—"even then you slept to those counsels which Heaven suggested through the meanness of its servants! But two words availing penitence—but one brief prayer—and some tall saint has interceded for an instant hearing, and liberal granting of thy petition. Noble Hugo's continued, grasping his hand in a species of ecstacy, 'surely Heaven designs to work high things by the hand of him whose faults are thus readily forgiven—whose prayer is thus instantly heard. First shall Tu Deus Laudamus be said in each church, and each convent of Gloucester, ere the world is a day older."

The Constable, no less joyful, though perhaps unable to perceive an especial providence in his nephew's recovery, expressed his gratitude to the messenger of the good tidings, by throwing him his purse.

"I thank you, noble lord," said the man; "but stoop to pick up this taste of your bounty, it is only to restore it again to the donor."

"How now, arrah?" said the Constable, "methinks thy coat seems not so well lined as needs make thee spurn at such a guerdon."

"He that designs to catch larks, my lord," said the messenger, "must not close his net upon sparrows—I have a greater boon to ask of your lordship, and therefore I decline your present gratuity."

"A greater boon, ha!" said the Constable.—"I am no knight-errant, to band myself by promise to get it ere I know its import; but do thou come to my pavilion to-morrow, and thou wilt not find me unwilling to do what is reason."

So saying, he took leave of the prelate, and returned homeward, failing not to visit his nephew's lodge as he passed, where he received the same pleasant assurances which had been communicated by the messenger of the parti-coloured mantle.

CHAPTER XIX.

He was a minstrel—in his mood
Was wisdom mix'd with folly;
A tame companion to the good,
But wild and free among the rude,
And jovial with the jolly.

ARCHBISHOP'S ADDRESS

THE event of the preceding day had been of so much so interesting, and latterly so harassing, that the Constable felt weary as after a severely contested battle-field and slept soundly until the earliest beams of dawn saluted him through the opening of the tent. It was then that, with a mingled feeling of peace and satisfaction, he began to review the change which had taken place in his condition since the previous morning. He had then arisen an ardent braggart, anxious to find favour in the eyes of his barons, and scrupulous about his dress and appointments, as if he had been as young in years as in hopes of war. This was over, and he had now before him the painful task of leaving his betrothed for a term of years, even before wedlock had united them inseparably, and reflecting that she was exposed to all the dangers which assail female constancy in a situation thus critical. When the immediate anxiety for his nephew was removed, he was tempted to think that he had been something hasty in listening to the arguments of the Archbishop, and in believing that Damian's death or recovery depended upon his own accomplishing, to the letter, and without delay, his vow for the Holy Land. "How many prayers ga," he thought to himself, "have assumed the sea, and delayed or renounced it, yet lived and died wealth and honour, without sustaining such a visitation as that with which Baldwin threatened me, and what case or particular did such men deserve more allegiance than I? But the die is now cast, and it needs little to inquire whether my obedience to the mandates of the Church has saved the life of my body, or whether I have not fallen, as laymen are apt to fall, whenever there is an encounter of wit with them and those of the spirituality. I would God it may prove otherwise, since, girding on my sword as Heaven's champion, I might the better exact Heaven's protection for her whom I must unhappily leave behind me."

As these reflections passed through his mind, he saw the warders at the entrance of his tent challenge some one whose footsteps were heard approaching. The person stopped on their challenge, and presently after was heard the sound of a rote, (a small kind of lute,) the strings of which were managed by means of a small wheel. After a short prelude, a soft voice, of good compass, sung verses, which, translated into modern language, might run nearly as:

I.

"Soldier, wake—the day is peeping,
Honour ne'er was won in sleeping.
Never when the men-became still Lay unreflected on the hill
Till when they are glinted back
From axe and armour spear and jack,
That they promise future glory,
Many a page of deathless glory
Shall be that are the foemen's terror,
Ever are the morning's murmur.

II.

"Arm and up—the morning beams
Hath call'd the rustic to his team,
Hath call'd the fisher to the lake,
Hath call'd the huntsman to the beak;
The early student ponders o'er
His dusty tomes of ancient lore,
Soldier, wake—thy harvest, come,
Thy steady conquest war, thy game,
Shield, that would be foemen's terror,
Still should gleam the morning's murmur.

III.

"Poor hire repays the rustic's pain;
More paltry still the sportsman's gain;
Vainest of all, the student's theme
Ends in some metaphysical dream
Yet each is up, and each has toil'd
Since first the peep of dawn has smiled,
And each is eager in his aim
Then he who bartereth life for fame,
Up, up, and arm thee, son of terror!
Do thy bright shield the morning's murmur."

When the song was finished, the Constable heard him talking without, and presently Philip Guarnier entered the pavilion to tell that a person, come hither by the Constable's appointment, waited permission to speak with him.

"By my appointment?" said De Lacy; "admit immediately."

The messenger of the preceding evening entered tent, holding in one hand his small cap and her, in the other the rote on which he had been playing. His attire was fantastic, consisting of more than one inner dress of various colours, all of brightest and richest dyes, and disposed so as to meet with each other—the upper garment was a short Norman cloak of bright green. An embroidered girdle sustained, in lieu of offensive weapons, inkhorn with its appurtenances on the one side, the other a knife for the purposes of the table. His hair was cut in imitation of the clerical tonsure, which was designed to intimate that he had arrived to a high rank in his profession; for the Joyous Science, the profession of minstrelsy was termed, had its own ranks, like the degrees in the church and in chivalry. The features and manners of the man seemed to be at variance with his profession and its garb; for, as the latter was gay and fantastic, the man had a cast of gravity, and almost of sternness, which, unless when kindled by the enthusiasm of his poetical and musical exertions, seemed rather to indicate deep reflection, than the thoughtless vivacity of observation which characterized most of his brethren. His countenance, though not handsome, had therefore something in it striking and impressive, even from its very contrast with the party-coloured hues and fluttering shape of his vestments, and the Constable felt something inclined to patronise him, as he said, "Good morrow, friend, and I thank thee for thy morning greeting; it was well sung and well meant, for when we call forth any one to bethink him how time passes, we do him the credit of supposing that he can employ to advantage that flitting treasure."

The man, who had listened in silence, seemed to pause and make an effort ere he replied, "My intentions, at least, were good, when I ventured to disturb my lord thus early; and I am glad to learn that my boldness hath not been evil received at his hand."

"True," said the Constable, "you had a boon to ask of me. Be speedy, and say thy request—my leisure is short."

"It is for permission to follow you to the Holy Land, my lord," said the man.

"Thou hast asked what I can hardly grant my friend," answered De Lacy—"Thou art a minstrel, art thou not?"

"An unworthy graduate of the Gay Science, my lord," said the musician; "yet let me say for myself, that I will not yield to the king of minstrels, Geoffrey Ridel, though the King of England hath given him four manors for one song. I would be willing to contend with him in romance, lay, or fable, were the judge to be King Henry himself."

"You have your own good word, doubtless," said De Lacy, "nevertheless, Sir Minstrel, thou goest not with me. The Crusade has been already too much encumbered by men of thy idle profession; and if thou dost add to the number, it shall not be under my protection. I am too old to be charmed by thy art, charm thou never so wisely."

"He that is young enough to seek for and to win the love of beauty," said the minstrel, but in a submissive tone as if fearing his freedom might give offence, "should not term himself too old to feel the charms of minstrelsy."

The Constable smiled, not insensible to the flattery which assigned to him the character of a younger gallant. "Thou art a jester," he said, "I warrant me, in addition to thy other qualities?"

"No," replied the minstrel, "it is a branch of our profession which I have for some time renounced—my fortunes have put me out of tune for jesting."

"Nay, comrade," said the Constable, "if thou hast been handsomely dealt with in the world, and canst comply with the rules of a family so strictly ordered as mine, it is possible we may agree together better than I thought. What is thy name and country? thy speech, methinks, sounds somewhat foreign."

"I am an Armoncan, my lord, from the merry shores of Morbihan; and hence my tongue hath some touch of my country speech. My name is Renault Vidal."

"Such being the case, Renault," said the Constable, "thou shalt follow me, and I will give orders to the master of my household to have thee attired something according to thy function, but in more orderly guise than thou now appearest in. Dost thou understand the use of a weapon?"

"Indifferently, my lord," said the Armoncan; at the same time taking a sword from the wall, he drew it, and made a pass with it so close to the Constable's body as he sat on the couch, that he started up, crying, "Villain, forbear!"

"La you! noble sir," replied Vidal, lowering with all submission the point of his weapon—"I have already given you a proof of sleight which has alarmed even your experience—I have an hundred other besides."

"It may be so," said De Lacy, somewhat ashamed at having shown himself moved by the sudden and lively action of the juggler; "but I love not jostling with edged tools, and have too much to do with sword and sword-blows in earnest, to toy with them; so I pray you let us have no more of this, but call me my squire and my chamberlain, for I am about to array me and go to mass."

The religious duties of the morning performed, it was the Constable's intention to visit the Lady Abbess, and communicate, with the necessary precautions and qualifications, the altered relations in which he was placed towards her niece, by the resolution he had been compelled to adopt, of departing for the Crusade before accomplishing his marriage, in the terms of the precontract already entered into. He was conscious that it would be difficult to reconcile the good lady to this change of measures, and he delayed some time ere he could think of the best mode of communicating and softening the unpleasant intelligence. An interval was also spent in a visit to his nephew, whose state of convalescence continued to be as favourable, as if in truth it had been a miraculous consequence of the Constable's having complied with the advice of the Archbishop.

From the lodging of Damian, the Constable proceeded to the convent of the Benedictine Abbess. But she had been already made acquainted with the circumstances which he came to communicate, by a still earlier visit from the Archbishop Baldwin himself. The Primate had undertaken the office of mediator on this occasion, conscious that his success of the evening before must have placed the Constable in a delicate situation with the relations of his betrothed bride, and willing, by his countenance and authority, to reconcile the disputes which might ensue. Perhaps he had better have left Hugo de Lacy to plead his own cause; for the Abbess, though she listened to the communication with all the respect due to the highest dignitary of the English Church, drew consequences from the Constable's change of resolution which the Primate had not expected. She ventured to oppose no obstacle to De Lacy's accomplishment of his vows, but strongly argued that the contract with her niece should be entirely set aside, and each party left at liberty to form a new choice.

It was in vain that the Archbishop endeavoured to dazzle the Abbess with the future honours to be won by the Constable in the Holy Land, the splendour of which would attach not to his lady alone, but to all in the remotest degree allied to or connected with her. All his eloquence was to no purpose, though upon so favourite a topic he exerted it to the utmost. The Abbess, it is true, remained silent for a moment after his arguments had been exhausted, but it was only to consider how she should intimate, in a suitable and reverent manner, that children, the usual attendants of a happy union, and the existence of which he looked to for the continuation of the house of her father and brother, could not be hoped for with any probability, unless the precontract was followed by marriage, and the residence of the married parties in the same country. She therefore insisted, that the Constable having altered his intentions in this most important particular, the fiançailles should be entirely abrogated and set aside; and she demanded of the Primate, as an act of justice, that, as he had interfered to prevent the bridegroom's execution of his original purpose, he should now assist with his influence wholly to dissolve an engagement which had been thus materially innovated upon.

The Primate, who was sensible he had himself occasioned De Lacy's breach of contract, felt himself bound in honour and reputation to prevent consequences so disagreeable to his friend, as the dissolution of an engagement in which his interest and inclinations were alike concerned. He removed the Lady Abbess for the time, and secured views which she was ignorant of the Archbishop entertained upon the subject of matrimony, and concerning the interest of her house. He even upbraided her with selfishly preferring the continuation of the union of Berenger to the recovery of the Holy Sepulchre and Jerusalem to her; that Heaven would be avenged on a shortsighted and merely human policy, which postponed the interests of Christendom to those of a individual family.

After this severe harangue the Primate took his departure leaving the Abbess highly annoyed, though she prudently forbore returning any answer to his paternal admonition.

In the humour the venerable lady was found by the Constable himself, when, with some embarrassment, he presented to explain to her the necessity of his present departure for Palestine.

She received the communication with calm dignity, her ample black robe and scalpter coming on were allowed out in yet prouder folds as she listened to the reasons and the emergencies which compelled the Constable of Chapter to defer the marriage, which he avowed was the dearest wish of his heart, until after his return from the Crusade, for which he was about to set forth.

"Methinks," replied the Abbess, with much calmness, "the communication is meant for serious, as if there were no fit business—I myself no fit person to be sitting with, methinks the Constable's reasons should have been proclaimed to us yesterday, when the franciscans had united his truth with that of the Holy Scripture, under expectations very different from those which he now announces."

"On the word of a knight and a gentleman, my lady," said the Constable, "I had not the slightest thought that I should be called upon to say a step so less distressing to me, than, as I see on your face, it is unpleasant to you."

"I can scarcely conceive," replied the Abbess, "the current reasons, which, arising as they must have done yesterday, have nevertheless delayed their revelation till to-day."

"I can," said De Lacy, reluctantly, "that I entertained the ready hope of obtaining a remission for my vows, which my Lord of Canterbury had obtained for Heaven's service, destined it otherwise to be."

"At least, then," said the Abbess, veiling her sentiments under the appearance of extreme calmness, "yourship will do us the justice to place me in some position in which we stood yesterday saying 'adieu' by joining with my niece and her husband in desiring the abrogation of a marriage contract entered into with very different views from those which you now entertain, put a young person in a state of liberty of which she is at present deprived by her contract with you?"

"Ah, madam!" said the Constable, "what do you ask of me?" and in a tone how cold and indignant did you demand me to renounce hopes, the dream which has become ever entertained since the blessed war-time!"

"I am unacquainted with language belonging to such language, my lord," replied the Abbess, "methinks the prospects which could be so easily obtained for years, might, by a little, and a very little further self-control, be altogether abandoned."

Hugo de Lacy paced the room in agitation, as if he answered until after a considerable pause. "If your ladyship," shared the sentiments which you have expressed I could not, indeed, with justice to her, perhaps to myself, desire to retain that marriage which your solemn espousals have given me. But I must know my doom from her own lips; and if it be as severe as that which your expressions had implied, I will go to Palestine the better soldier of Heaven, that I shall have little left on earth that can trouble me."

The Abbess, without farther answer, called on by Precentor, and desired her to command her attention immediately. The Precentor bowed reverently, and withdrew.

"May I presume to inquire," said De Lacy, "whether the Lady Evelyn hath been pronounced of her reinstatement which have occasioned this sudden alteration in my purpose?"

"I have communicated the whole to her, for part I cannot," said the Abbess, "even as it was planned to me this morning by my Lord of Canterbury, for with him I have already spoken upon the subject, and confirmed but now by your ladyship's own message."

"I am little obliged to the Archbishop," said De Lacy, "for having forestalled my cousin's departure where it was most important for us to be they should be accurately stated, and favourably received."

"That," said the Abbess, "is but an item of the account betwixt you and the Prelate,—it concerns not us."

"Dare I venture to hope," continued De Lacy, without taking offence at the dryness of the Abbess's manner, "that Lady Eveline has heard this most unhappy change of circumstances without emotion.—I would say, without displeasure?"

"She is the daughter of a Berenger, my lord," answered the Abbess, "and it is our custom to punish a breach of faith, or to condemn it—never to grieve over it. What my niece may do in this case, I know not. I am a woman of religion, sequestered from the world, and would advise peace and Christian forgiveness, with a proper sense of contempt for the unworthy treatment which she has received. She has followers and vassals, and friends, doubtless, and advisers, who may not, in blinded zeal for worldly honour, recommend to her to sit down slightly with this injury, but desire she should rather appeal to the King, or to the arms of her father's followers, unless her liberty is restored to her by the surrender of the contract into which she has been enticed.—But she comes, to answer for herself."

Eveline entered at the moment, leaning on Rose's arm. She had laid aside mourning since the ceremony of the fiancailles, and was dressed in a kirtle of white, with an upper robe of pale blue. Her head was covered with a veil of white gauze, so thin, as to float about her like the misty cloud usually painted around the countenance of a seraph. But the face of Eveline, though in beauty not unworthy one of this angelic order, was at present far from resembling that of a seraph in tranquility of expression. Her limbs trembled, her cheeks were pale, the tinge of red around the eyelids expressed recent tears; yet amidst these natural signs of distress and uncertainty, there was an air of profound resignation—a resolution to discharge her duty in every emergency, reigning in the solemn expression of her eye and eyebrow, and showing her prepared to govern the agitation which she could not entirely subdue. And so well were these opposing qualities of timidity and resolution mingled on her cheek, that Eveline, in the utmost pride of her beauty, never looked more fascinating than at that instant; and Hugo de Lacy, hitherto rather an unimpassioned lover, stood in her presence with feelings as if all the exaggerations of romance were realized, and his mistress were a being of a higher sphere, from whose doom he was to receive happiness or misery, life or death.

It was under the influence of such a feeling, that the warrior dropped on one knee before Eveline, took the hand which she rather resigned than gave to him, pressed it to his lips fervently, and, ere he parted with it, moistened it with one of the few tears which he was ever known to shed. But, although surprised, and carried out of his character by a sudden impulse, he regained his composure on observing that the Abbess regarded his humiliation, if it can be so termed, with an air of triumph; and he entered on his defence before Eveline with a manly earnestness, not devoid of fervour, nor free from agitation, yet made in a tone of firmness and pride, which seemed assumed to meet and control that of the offended Abbess.

"Lady," he said, addressing Eveline, "you have heard from the venerable Abbess in what unhappy position I have been placed since yesterday by the rigour of the Archbishop—perhaps I should rather say by his just though severe interpretation of my engagement in the Crusade. I cannot doubt that all this has been stated with accurate truth by the venerable lady; but as I must no longer call her my friend, let me fear whether she has done me justice in her commentary upon the unhappy necessity which must presently compel me to leave my country, and with my country to forego—at best to postpone—the fairest hopes which man ever entertained. The venerable lady hath upbraided me, that being myself the cause that the execution of yesterday's contract is postponed, I would fain keep it suspended over your head for an indefinite term of years. No one resigns willingly such rights as yesterday gave me; and, let me speak a boastful word, sooner than yield them up to man of woman born, I would hold a fair field against all corners, with grinded sword and sharp spear, from sunrise to sunset, for three days' space. But what would retain at the price of a thousand lives, I am willing to renounce if it would cost you a single sigh. If, therefore, you think you cannot remain happy—the betrothed of De Lacy, you may command my assistance to have the contract annulled, and make some more fortunate man happy."

He would have gone on, but felt the danger of being overpowered again by those feelings of tenderness new to his steady nature, that he blushed to give way to them.

Eveline remained silent. The Abbess took the word "Kinswoman," she said, "you hear that the generosity—or the justice of the Constable of Chester, proposes, in consequence of his departure upon a distant and perilous expedition, to cancel a contract entered into upon the specific and precise understanding that he was to remain in England for its fulfilment. You cannot, methinks, hesitate to accept of the freedom which he offers you, with thanks for his bounty. For my part, I will reserve mine own until I shall see that your joint application is sufficient to win to your purpose his Grace of Canterbury, who may again interfere with the actions of his friend the Lord Constable over whom he has already exerted so much influence—for the weal, doubtless, of his spiritual concerns."

"If it is meant by your words, venerable lady," said the Constable, "that I have any purpose of sheltering myself behind the Prelate's authority, to avoid doing that which I proclaim my readiness, though not my willingness, to do, I can only say, that you are the first who has doubted the faith of Hugo de Lacy." And while the proud Baron thus addressed a female and a recluse, he could not prevent his eye from sparkling and his cheek from flushing.

"My gracious and venerable kinswoman," said Eveline, summoning together her resolution, "and you, my good lord, be not offended if I pray you not to increase by groundless suspicions and hasty resentments your difficulties and mine. My lord, the obligations which I lie under to you are such as I can never discharge, since they comprehend fortune, life and honour. Know that, in my anguish of mind when besieged by the Welsh in my castle of the Garc Doloureuse, I vowed to the Virgin, that (my honour safe) I would place myself at the disposal of him whom our Lady should employ as her instrument to relieve me from yonder hour of agony. In giving me a deliverer, she gave me a master; nor could I desire a more noble one than Hugo de Lacy."

"God forbid, lady," said the Constable, speaking eagerly, as if he was afraid his resolution should fail him ere he could get the renunciation uttered, "that should, by such a tie, to which you subjected yourself in the extremity of your distress, bind you to any resolution in my favour which can put force on your own inclinations!"

The Abbess herself could not help expressing her applause of this sentiment, declaring it was spoken like a Norman gentleman; but, at the same time her eyes, turned towards her niece, seemed to exhort her to beware how she declined to profit by the cadour of De Lacy.

But Eveline proceeded, with her eyes fixed on the ground, and a slight colour overspreading her face to state her own sentiments, without listening to the suggestions of any one. "I will own, noble sir," she said, "that when your valour had rescued me from approaching destruction, I could have wished honouring and respecting you, as I had done your late friend—my excellent father—that you could have accepted a daughter's service from me. I do not pretend entirely to have surmounted these sentiments although I have combated them, as being unworthy of me, and ungrateful to you. But, from the moment you were pleased to honour me by a claim on the poor hand, I have studiously examined my sentiments towards you, and taught myself so far to make them coincide with my duty, that I may call myself assured that De Lacy would not find in Eveline Berenger an indifferent, far less an unworthy bride. In this, as you may boldly confide, whether the union you have sought for takes place instantly, or is delayed till longer season. Still further, I must acknowledge that the postponement of these nuptials will be more agreeable to me than their immediate accomplishment. I am at present very young, and totally unperplexed. Two or three years will, I trust, render me yet more worthy the regard of a man of honour."

At this declaration in his favour, however cold and qualified, De Lacy had as much difficulty to restrain his transports as formerly to moderate his agitation.

"Angel of bounty and of kindness!" he said, kneeling once more, and again possessing himself of her hand. "perhaps I ought in honour to resign voluntarily those hopes which you decline to revish from me for ever. But who could be capable of such unrelenting magnanimity?—Let me hope that my devoted attachment—that which you shall hear of me when at a distance—that which you shall know of me when near you—may give to your sentiments a more tender warmth than they now express, and, in the mean while, blame me not that I accept your pledged faith given under the conditions which you attach to it. I am conscious my wooing has been too late in life to expect the animated returns proper to youthful passion—blame me not if I remain satisfied with those calm sentiments which make life happy, though they cannot make passion rapturous. Your hand remains in my grasp, but I acknowledge not my pleasure—Can it be that it refuses to ratify what your lips have said?"

"Never, noble De Lacy!" said Eveina, with more animation than she had yet expressed; and it appeared that the tone was at length sufficiently encouraging, since her lover was emboldened to take the lips themselves for guarantee.

It was with an air of pride mingled with respect, that, after having received this pledge of fidelity, he turned to contribute and to approve the abbess's address. "I trust, venerable mother," he said, "that you will resume your former kind thoughts of me, which I am aware were only interrupted by your tender anxiety for the interest of her who should be dearer to us both. Let me hope that I may leave this fair flower under protection of the honoured lady who is her next in blood, happy and secure as she must ever be, while listening to your counsels, and residing within these sacred walls."

But the Abbess was too deeply displeased to be propitiated by a compliment, which perhaps it had been her policy to have delayed till a calmer season. "My lord," she said, "and you, fair kinswomen, you ought needs to be aware how little my counsels—not frequently given where they are unobdiently listened to—can be of avail to those embarked in worldly affairs. I am a woman dedicated to religion, to solitude, and seclusion—to the service, in brief, of Our Lady and Saint Benedict. I have been already engaged by my superior because I have, for love of you, fair niece, mixed more deeply in secular affairs than becomes the head of a convent of recluses—I will more so far her blame on such an account, nor can you expect it of me. My brother's daughter, unfettered by worldly ties, had been the welcome sharer of my poor solitude. But this house is too mean for the residence of the vowed bride of a mighty baron; nor do I in my lowliness and inexperience, feel fitness to exercise over such a one that authority, which must belong to me over every one whom this roof protects. The grave tones of our devotions, and the serene tranquillity to which the inmates of this house are devoted—convinced the Abbess, with increasing heat and vehemence, "shall not, for the sake of my worldly kinswomen, be disturbed by the intrusion of one whose thoughts must needs be on the worldly toys of love and marriage."

"I do indeed believe, reverend mother," said the Constable, in his turn giving way to displeasure, "that a richly dowered maiden, unwedded, and unlikely to wed, were a better and more welcome inmate to the mansion, than one who cannot be separated from the world, and whose wealth is not likely to increase the House's revenue."

The Constable did the Abbess great injury in this easy innuendo, and it only went to confirm her purpose of rejecting all charge of her own doing as absurd. She was in truth as disinterested as aught, and her only reason for anger against her niece was that her advice had not been adopted without hesitation, although the matter regarded Ekeina's happiness exclusively.

The ill timed reflection of the Constable confirmed her in the resolution which she had already, and hastily adopted. "May heaven forgive you, Sir Knight," she replied, "your injurious thoughts of Eveina! It is indeed true, for your sake I wish you do penance in the Holy Land, having such judgments to repeat of—For you, my niece, you do not want that hospitality, which, without visiting or seeming to verify, unjust suspicions, I cannot be great to you, while you have, in your kinswoman of Shalldingham, a secular relation, whose nearness of blood approaches mine, and who may open her gate to you without incurring the unworthy stigma, and the means to enrich herself at your cost."

The Constable saw the deadly paleness which came over Eveina's cheek at this proposal, and, without knowing the cause of her repugnance, he hastened to relieve her from the apprehensions which she could evidently not entertain. "No, reverend mother," he said, "since you so harshly reject the care of my kinswoman, she shall not be a burden to any of her other relations. While Hugo de Lacy hath no gaiter castle, and many a manor besides, to maintain upon their hearths, his betrothed bride shall lodge on one with her society, who may regard it as other than a great honour; and methinks I am not poorer than Heaven hath made me, could I not find friends and followers sufficient to serve, and protect her."

"No, my lord," said Eveina, recovering her to direction into which she had been thrown by the kindness of her relative; "since some unhappy destiny separates me from the protection of my father's castle, it is mine I could so securely have sought refuge in. I will neither apply for shelter to any man, nor accept of that which you so generously offer; since my doing so might expose her name, and I am sure, unwearied vigilance against her by whom I was driven to choose the advantage of my dwelling-place. I have made my resolution—I have, as true, only one friend left to do so, a powerful one, and able to protect me against all that I shall have which seems to follow me, as well as against the ordinary evils of human life."

"The Queen, I suppose?" said the Abbess, interrupting her instantly.

The Queen of Heaven! venerable kinswoman, answered Eveina, "our Lady of the Garde Doloureuse, ever gracious to our house, and in her own especial guardian and protection. Methinks not the vowed votaries of the Virgin require me to her holy patroness whom I ought to apply to in answer."

The venerable dame, taken somewhat at unawares by this answer, pronounced the interjection "Tut!" in a tone better befitting a Lallard or an anchoress than a Catholic Abbess, and a daughter of the House of Brangely. Truth is, the Lady Abbess's holy devotion to the Lady of the Garde Doloureuse was much disrupted since she had known the merits of another gifted image, the property of her own convent.

Recollecting herself, however, she remained still while the Constable alleged the vicinity of the Welsh as what might possibly again render the shade of his betrothed bride at the Garde Doloureuse as probable as she had on a former occasion found it. To this he replied, by reminding him of the great strength of her nerve fortress—the various magic which it had withstood and the important circumstances that, upon the late occasion, it was only endangered because in compliance with a point of honour, his father Raymond had called on with the prince and knight at Shalldingham a battle under the walls. His father suggested, that it was easy for the Constable to name, from among his own vassals or his a comital of such approved prowess and valour might ensure the safety of the place, and of its y.

De Lacy could reply to her arguments the Abis rose, and, pleading her total inability to give insel in secular affairs, and the rules of her order, rich called her, as she said, with a heightened co-or and raised voice, "to the simple and peaceful charge of her conventual duties," she left the be-thed parties in the locutory, or parlour, without y company, save Rose, who prudently remained at ne distance.

The issue of their private conference seemed agree-le to both; and when Eveline told Rose that they re to return presently to the Garde Doloureuse, una sufficient escort, and were to remain there dug the period of the Crusade, it was in a tone of artfelt satisfaction, which her follower had not ard her make use of for many days. She spoke o highly in praise of the kind acquiescence of the nstable in her wishes, and of his whole conduct, th a warmth of gratitude approaching to a more ider feeling.

"And yet, my dearest lady," said Rose, "if you ll speak unfeignedly, you must, I am convinced, ow that you look upon this interval of years, inter-sed betwixt your contract and your marriage, rather a respite than in any other light."

"I confess it," said Eveline, "nor have I concealed m my future lord that such are my feelings, ungras-us as they may seem. But it is my youth, Rose, extreme youth, which makes me fear the duties De Lacy's wife. Then those evil auguries hang angely about me. Devoted to evil by one kinsman, expelled almost from the roof of another, seem to myself, at present, a creature who must ry distress with her, pass where she will. This evil ar, and, what is more, the apprehensions of it, will e way to time. When I shall have attained the e of twenty, Rose, I shall be a full-grown woman, th all the soul of a Berenger strong within me, to ercome those doubts and tremours which agitate girl of seventeen."

"Ah! my sweet mistress," answered Rose, "may d and our Lady of the Garde Doloureuse guide all the best!—But I would that this contract had not ten place, or, having taken place, that it could have n fulfilled by your immediate union."

CHAPTER XX.

The King called down his merry-men all
By one, and by two, and three;
Earl Marshal was wont to be the foremost man,
But the hindmost man was he.—Old Ballad.

the Lady Eveline retired satisfied and pleased in her private interview with De Lacy, the joy on part of the Constable arose to a higher pitch of ature than he was in the habit of feeling or express-
; and it was augmented by a visit of the leeches o attended his nephew, from whom he received a nute and particular account of his present disorder, th every assurance of a speedy recovery.

The Constable caused alms to be distributed to the vents and to the poor, masses to be said, and ers to be lighted. He visited the Archbishop, and eived from him his full approbation of the course ich he proposed to pursue, with the promise, that of the plenary power which he held from the Pope, Prelate was willing, in consideration of his instant edience, to limit his stay in the Holy Land to the m of three years, to become current from his leav-Britain, and to include the space necessary for his urn to his native country. Indeed, having suc-ded in the main point, the Archbishop judged it e to concede every inferior consideration to a per-of the Constable's rank and character, whose ad-will to the proposed expedition was perhaps as ential to its success as his bodily presence.

n short, the Constable returned to his pavilion hly satisfied with the manner in which he had ricated himself from those difficulties which in the orning seemed almost insuperable; and when his icers assembled to disrobe him (for great feudal ds had their levees and couchees, in imitation of sovereign princes,) he distributed gratuities among them, and jested and laughed in a much gayer humour than they had ever before witnessed.

"For thee," he said, turning to Vidal the minstrel, who, sumptuously dressed, stood to pay his respects among the other attendants, "I will give thee naught at present; but do thou remain by my bedside until I am asleep, and I will next morning reward thy min-strely as I like it."

"My lord," said Vidal, "I am already rewarded, both by the honour, and by the liveries, which better befit a royal minstrel than one of my mean fame; but assign me a subject, and I will do my best, not out of greed of future largesses, but gratitude for past favours."

"Gramercy, good fellow," said the Constable.
"Guarine," he added, addressing his squire, "let the watch be posted, and do thou remain within the tent —stretch thyself on the bear-hide, and sleep, or listen to the minstrelsy, as thou likest best. Thou thinkest thyself a judge, I have heard, of such gear."

It was usual, in those insecure times, for some faithful domestic to sleep at night within the tent of every great baron, that, if danger arose, he might not be unsupported or unprotected. Guarine accordingly drew his sword, and, taking it in his hand, stretched himself on the ground in such a manner, that, on the slightest alarm, he could spring up sword in hand.
His broad black eyes, in which sleep contended with a desire to listen to the music, were fixed on Vidal, who saw them glittering in the reflection of the silver lamp, like those of a dragon or basilisk.

After a few preliminary touches on the chords of his rote, the minstrel requested of the Constable to name the subject on which he desired the exercise of his powers.

"The truth of woman," answered Hugo de Lacy, as he laid his head upon his pillow.

After a short prelude, the minstrel obeyed, by singing nearly as follows:—

"Woman's faith, and woman's trust—
Write the characters in dust;
Stamp them on the running stream,
Print them on the moon's pale beam,
And each evanescent letter
Shall be clearer, firmer, better,
And more permanent, I ween,
Than the thing those letters mean.

II.

"I have strain'd the spider's thread
'Gainst the promise of a maid;
I have weigh'd a grain of sand
'Gainst her plight of heart and hand;
I told my true love of the token,
How her faith proved light, and her word was broken:
Again her word and truth she plight,
And I believed them again ere night."

"How now, sir knave," said the Constable, raising himself on his elbow, "from what drunken rhymer did you learn that half-witted satire?"

"From an old, ragged, crossgrained friend of mine, called Experience," answered Vidal. "I pray Heaven he may never take your lordship, or any other worthy man, under his tuition."

"Go to, fellow," said the Constable, in reply;
"thou art one of those wisecracks, I warrant me, that would fain be thought witty, because thou canst make a jest of those things which wiser men hold worthy of most worship—the honour of men, and the truth of women. Dost thou call thyself a minstrel, and hast no tale of female fidelity?"

"I had right many a one, noble sir, but I laid them aside when I disused my practice of the jesting part of the Joyous Science. Nevertheless, if it pleases your nobleness to listen, I can sing you an established lay upon such a subject."

De Lacy made a sign of acquiescence, and laid himself as if to slumber; while Vidal began one of those interminable and almost innumerable adventures concerning that paragon of true lovers, fair Ysolte; and of the constant and uninterrupted faith and affection which she displayed in numerous situations of difficulty and peril, to her paramour, the gallant Sir Tristrem, at the expense of her less favoured husband, the luckless King Mark of Cornwall; to show, as all the world knows, Sir Tristram was nephew

This was not the lay of love and fidelity which De Lacy would have chosen; but a feeling like shame prevented his interrupting it, perhaps because he was unwilling to yield to or acknowledge the unpleasant sensations excited by the tenor of the tale. He soon fell asleep, or feigned to do so, and the harper, continuing for a time his monotonous chant, began at length himself to feel the influence of slumber; his words, and the notes which he continued to touch upon the harp, were broken and interrupted, and seemed to escape drowsily from his fingers and voice. At length the sounds ceased entirely, and the minstrel seemed to have sunk into profound repose, with his head reclining on his breast, and one arm dropped down by his side, while the other rested on his harp. His slumber, however, was not very long, and when he awoke from it, and cast his eyes around him, recognising, by the light of the night-lamp, whatever was in the tent, he felt a heavy hand, which pressed his shoulder as if gently to solicit his attention. At the same time the voice of the vigilant Philip Guarins whispered in his ear, "These offices for the night is ended—depart to these own quarters with all the silence thou mayest."

The minstrel wrapt himself in his cloak without reply, though perhaps not without feeling some repentment at a dismissal so unceremonious.

CHAPTER XXI.

O! then I saw Queen Mab has been with you.
Dance and Juggle.

THE subject on which the mind has last been engaged at night is apt to occupy our thoughts even during slumber, when Imagination, uncorrected by the organs of sense, weaves her own fantastic web out of whatever ideas rise at random in the sleeper. It is not surprising, therefore, that De Lacy in his dreams had some confused idea of being identified with the unlucky Mark of Cornwall; and that he awakened from such unpleasant visions with a brow more clouded than when he was preparing for his speech on the evening before. He was silent, and seemed lost in thought, while his squire sat at his elbow with the respect now only paid to sovereigns. "Guerrine," at length he said, "know you the stout Fleming, who was said to have borne him so well at the siege of the Garde Doloureuse?—a tall, big, brawny man?"

"Surely, my lord," answered his squire; "I know Wilkin Flammoek—I saw him but yesterday."

"Indeed?" replied the Constable—"Have, meanest thou?—In this city of Gloucester?"

"Assuredly, my good lord. He came hither partly about his merchandises, partly, I think, to see his daughter Rosa, who is in attendance on the gracious young Lady Eveline."

"He is a stout soldier, is he not?"

"Like most of his kind—a rampart to a castle, but rubbish in the field," said the Norman squire.

"Faithful, also, is he not?" continued the Constable.

"Faithful as most Flemings, while you can pay for their faith," replied Guerrine, wondering a little at the unusual interest taken in one whom he esteemed a being of an inferior order, when, after some farther inquiries, the Constable ordered the Fleming's attendance to be presently commanded.

Other business of the morning now occurred, (for his speedy departure required many arrangements to be hastily adopted,) when, as the Constable was giving audience to several officers of his troops, the bulky figure of Wilkin Flammoek was seen at the entrance of the pavilion, in petticoat of white cloth, and having only a knife by his side.

"Leave the tent, my masters," said De Lacy, "but continue in attendance in the neighbourhood; for here comes one I must speak to in private."

The officers withdrew, and the Constable and Fleming were left alone. "You are Wilkin Flammoek, who fought well against the Welsh at the Gode Delouwe?"

"I did my best, my lord, answered Wilkin—"I am bound to it by my bargain; and I hope ever to be like a man of credit."

"Methinks," said the Constable, "that you, a stout of limb, and, as I hear, so bold in spirit, might look a little higher than this weaving trade of thine."

"No one is reluctant to mend his station, my lord," said Wilkin; "yet am I so far from complaining of mine, that I would willingly consent it should only be better, on condition I could be assured a son never worse."

"Nay, but, Flammoek," said the Constable, "I mean higher things for you than your modesty pretends—I mean to leave thee in a charge of great trust."

"Let it concern sales of drapery, my lord, and one will perform it better," said the Fleming.

"Away! thou art too lowly minded," said the Constable. "What think'st thou of being dubbed knight, as thy valour well deserves, and left as Chamberlain of the Garde Doloureuse?"

"For the knighthood, my lord, I should crave no forgiveness, for it would sit on me like a golden helmet on a hog. For any charge, whether of camp or cottage, I trust I might discharge it as well as another."

"I fear me thy rank must be in some way mended," said the Constable, surveying the unsightly dress of the figure before him; "it is at present too mean to suit the protector and guardian of a young lady of high birth and rank."

"I the guardian of a young lady of birth and rank?" said Flammoek, his light, large eyes turning bright, lighter, and rounder as he spoke.

"Even thou," said the Constable. "The Lady Eveline proposes to take up her residence in her castle of the Garde Doloureuse. I have been casting about to whom I may intrust the keeping of her person, as well as of the stronghold. Were I to choose one knight of name, as I have many in my household, he would be sitting about to do deeds of valour against the Welsh, and engaging himself in turmoils, which would render the safety of the castle precarious; or he would be absent on feats of chivalry, tournaments, and hunting parties; or he would, perchance, be shown of that light nature under the walls, or run within the courts of the castle, turning the castle and quiet abode, which becomes the situation of the Lady Eveline, into the theatre of a dissolute train.—Thou I can confide in—thou wilt fight when a quarrel, yet wilt not provoke danger for the sake of danger itself—thy birth, thy habits, will lead thee to avoid those gayeties, which, however fascinating to others, cannot but be distasteful to thee—thy management will be as regular, as I will take care that a shield be honourable, and thy relation to her favour, that will render thy guardianship more agreeable to the Lady Eveline, than, perchance, one of her own suit. And, to speak to thee a language which thy sense readily comprehends, the reward, Fleming, for the regular discharge of this most weighty trust, shall be beyond thy most flattering hope."

The Fleming had listened to the first part of the discourse with an expression of surprise which gradually gave way to one of deep and anxious reflection. He gazed fixedly on the earth for a minute after the Constable had ceased speaking, and then raising his eyes suddenly said, "It is needless to ask for roundabout excuses. This cannot be your usual my lord—but if it is, the scheme is naught."

"How and wherefore?" asked the Constable, with displeased surprise.

"Another man might grasp at your bounty," continued Wilkin, "and leave you to take chance of the value you were to receive for it; but I am a downright dealer, I will not take payment for service I cannot render."

"But I demand once more, whither thou wilt not, or rather wilt not, accept this trust?" said the Constable. "Surely, if I am willing to confer such confidence, it is well thy part to answer it."

"True, my lord," said the Fleming; "but methinks

Lord De Lacy should feel, and the wise Lord should foresee, that a Flemish weaver is no arduan for his plighted bride. Think her shut under solitary castle, under such respectable walls, and reflect how long the place will be solit- is land of love and of adventure! We shall strels singing ballads by the threave under bows, and such twangling of harps as would to frighten our walls from their founda- clerks say happened to those of Jericho—We e as many knights-errant around us as ever remagne, or King Arthur. "But lord, gave me authority to govern and direct as both law and nature give me power and ver my daughter. That which I can govern, answerable for; but how to discharge me so delegated trust, is another question.—Stay at y good lord," continued the honest Fleming, g that his speech made some impression upon ; "let a fool's advice for once be of avail to a wise man's purpose, taken, let me say, in no r. Remain in your own land—rule your own -and protect your own bride. You only can er cheerful love and ready obedience; and n, that, without pretending to guess what she eparated from you, she will, under your own e duty of a faithful and a loving spouse."

those who lost the Holy Sepulchre regain it," replied Flammock. "If those Latins and as they call them, are no better men than I ard, it signifies very little whether they or the have the country that has cost Europe so ood and treasure."

"In good faith," said the Constable, "there is sense in what thou say'st; but I caution thee to repeat it not, lest thou be taken for a heretic or a Jew. For me, my word and oath are pledged beyond retreat, and I have only to consider whom I may best name for that important station, which thy caution has—not without some shadow of reason—induced thee to decline."

"There is no man to whom your lordship can so naturally or honourably transfer such a charge," said Wilkin Flammock, "as to the kinsman near to you, and possessed of your trust; yet much better would it be were there no such trust to be reposed in any one."

"If," said the Constable, "by my near kinsman, you mean Randal de Lacy, I care not if I tell you, that I consider him as totally worthless, and undeserving of honourable confidence."

"Nay, I mean another," said Flammock, "nearer to you by blood, and unless I greatly mistake, much nigher also in affection—I had in mind your lordship's nephew, Damian de Lacy."

The Constable started as if a wasp had stung him; but instantly replied, with forced composure, "Damian was to have gone in my stead to Palestine—it now seems I must go in his; for, since this last illness, the leeches have totally changed their minds, and consider that warmth of the climate as dangerous, which they formerly decided to be salutary. But our learned doctors, like our learned priests, must ever be in the right, change their counsels as they may; and we poor laymen still in the wrong. I can, it is true, rely on Damian with the utmost confidence; but he is young, Flammock—very young—and, in that particular, resembles but too nearly the party who might be otherwise committed to his charge."

"Then once more, my lord," said the plain-spoken Fleming, "remain at home, and be yourself the protector of what is naturally so dear to you."

"Once more, I repeat that I cannot," answered the Constable. "The step which I have adopted as a great duty, may perhaps be a great error—I only know that it is irretrievable."

"Trust your nephew, then, my lord," replied Wilkin—"he is honest and true; and it is better trusting young lions than old wolves. He may err, perhaps, but it will not be from premeditated treachery."

"Thou art right, Flammock," said the Constable; "and perhaps I ought to wish I had sooner asked thy counsel, blunt as it is. But let what has passed be a secret betwixt us; and bethink thee of something that may advantage thee more than the privilege of speaking about my affairs."

"That accout will be easily settled, my lord," replied Flammock; "for my object was to ask your lordship's favour to obtain certain extensions of our privileges, in yonder wild corner where we Flemings have made our retreat."

"Thou shalt have them, so they be not exorbitant," said the Constable. And the honest Fleming, among whose good qualities scrupulous delicacy was not the foremost, hastened to detail, with great minuteness, the particulars of his request or petition, long pursued in vain, but to which this interview was the means of insuring success.

The Constable eager to execute the resolution which he had formed, hastened to the lodging of Damian de Lacy, and to the no small astonishment of his nephew, intimated to him his change of destination; alleging his own hurried departure, Damian's late and present illness, together with the necessary protection to be afforded to the Lady Eveline, as reasons why his nephew must needs remain behind him—to represent him during his absence—to protect the family rights, and assert the family honour of the house of De Lacy—above all, to act as the guardian of the young and beautiful bride, whom his uncle and patron had been in some measure compelled to abandon for a time.

Damian yet occupied his bed while the Constable communicated this change of purpose. Perhaps he might think the circumstance fortunate, that in this position he could conceal from his uncle's observation the various emotions which he could not help feeling; while the Constable, with the eagerness of one who to daunt him of hastily finishing what he has to say on an unpleasant subject, hurried over on account of the arrangements which he had made in order that his nephew might have the means of discharging, with sufficient effect, the important trust committed to him.

The youth listened as to a voice in a dream, which he had not the power of interrupting, though there was something within him which rebelled there would be both violence and integrity in a demonstration against his uncle's interference of peace. Something he accordingly attempted to say when the Constable at length paused, but it was too faintly spoken to shake a resolution fully though hastily adopted, and explicitly announced by one not in the use to speak before his purpose was fixed, or to alter it when it was declared.

The remonstrance of Damien, however, if it could be termed such, was spoken in terms too contradictory to be intelligible. In one moment he professed his regret for the laurels which he had hoped to gather in Palestine, and employed his words not to alter his purpose, but to permit him to attend his banner thither, and in the next sentence, he professed his readiness to defend the safety of Lady Evelyn with the last drop of his blood. De Lacy saw nothing inconsistent in these feelings, though they were for the moment contradictory to each other. It was natural he thought that a young knight should be desirous to win honour—natural also that he should valiantly assume a charge so honourable and important as that with which he proposed to invest him, and therefore he thought it was no wonder that assuming his new office willingly, the young man should not feel regret at losing the prospect of honourable adventure which he must abandon. He therefore only smiled in reply to the broken expostulations of his nephew, and, having confirmed his former arrangement, left the young man to reflect at leisure on his change of destination, while he himself, in a second visit to the Banatine Abbey, communicated the purpose which he had adopted, to the Abbess, and to her brethren.

The disposition of the former lady, was in no manner altered by this communication, in which indeed, she offered to take very little interest. She studied her religious duties, and her want of knowledge of secular affairs, if she should chance to meet the emperors of the world, &c. she had at work, she said, understood, that the guardians of the young and beautiful of her own sex were chosen from the more mature of the other.

"By our own weakness, lady," answered the Constable, "leave me no better choice than I have made. Since the Lady Evelyn's nearest friends deny her the privilege of the sword on account of the claim with which she has honoured me, I on my side, were worse than ungrateful did I not secure for her the protection of my nearest male heir. Damien is young, but he is true and honourable—nor does the chivalry of England stand in a better chair."

Evelyn seemed surprised, and even struck with consternation at the resolution which her bridegroom thus suddenly announced, and perhaps it was fortunate that the remark of the Lady Abbess made the proposal of the Constable necessary, and prevented him from observing that her colour should move, then came from her to drop it.

How, who was not excluded from the confessions, drew close up to her mistress, and, by affecting to adjust her veil which in secret she strongly pressed her hand gave her this good encouragement to compose her mind for a reply. It was brief and decisive and announced with a firmness which showed that the uncertainty of the moment had passed away or been suppressed. "In case of danger," she said, "she would not fail to apply to Damien de Lacy to come to her aid as he had sworn to do before, but she did not apprehend any danger at present, within her own secure castle of the Grande Doleureuse, where it was her purpose to dwell attended only by her own household. She was surprised, she continued, in consideration of her peculiar condition, to observe the strenuous retirement, which she expected would not be violated even by the noble young knight who was to act as her guardian, unless some apprehension for her safety made him very unavoidable.

The Abbess acquiesced, though coldly, in a point, which her sense of discretion recommended, and preparations were hastily made for the Lady Evelyn's return to the castle of her father. The interviews which intervened before her leaving the convent were in their nature painful. The day when Damien was formally presented to her in the circle, as the delegate to whom he had assumed the charge of his own property, and which was not dearest to him, as he affirmed, the protection of her person and honour.

Evelyn never trusted herself with one glance at that single look comprehended and reported to her every which distress, aided by secret grief had run on the nearly form and handsome countenance of the youth before her. She received his salute as a manner so embarrassed as that in which it was uttered, and whose lasting proof of sorrow, answered, as she trusted only to be obliged to him for his goodness during the interval of his uncle's absence.

Her parting with the Constable was the only one which she was to undergo. It was not without emotion, although she preserved her usual composure, and De Lacy his calm gravity of deportment. He was faithful, however, when he came to announce, that he would be bound by the chapter which she had been graciously constrained to accept. Three years he had assigned for its term, in which space the Archbishop Haldin had consented to shorten the period of his absence. "If I survive, which I trust are engaged," he said, "let the Lady Evelyn conclude that the grave holds De Lacy's sword out for her more happy man. She will find one more grateful, though there are many who better deserve her."

As these terms were parted, and the Constable speedily afterwards embarking, glided the name over for the shores of Flanders, where he proposed to join his father, with the consent of that noble warrior country, who had lately taken the town, to proceed by the route which should be found most practicable on their destination for the Holy Land. The broad stream, with the arms of the Lady, steamed forward with a favourable wind, and from the vessel, as if pointing to the quarters of the horizon where its removal was to be suggested, it considered the fame of the leader, and the nature of the adventure who followed him, a more brilliant band, in proportion to their numbers, never seen on the Boreas, the words echoed to the Ladies of Palestine.

Soon after Evelyn after a cold parting with the Abbess, whose offended dignity had not yet forgiven the slight regard which she had paid to her spirit, remained her journey homeward to her paternal castle, where her household was to be arranged as a matter suggested by the Constable, and approved of by herself.

The same preparations were made for an accommodation at every halting place which she had procured upon her journey to Oloum, &c. &c. before, the purpose was unchangeable, although she was at little loss to guess his name. Yet as it was so of the character of these preparations was a degree altered. All the relict of sister's care in accommodation, with the most select nature of society accompanied her every where on the way, but they were no longer mingled with that capricious under gallantry and taste, which marked her attentions were paid to a young and beautiful knight. The clearest fountain head, and the most select grove, were no longer selected for the second night, but the home of some franklin, or a small abbey, afforded the necessary hospitality. All seemed to be ordered with the most severe attention to neatness and decorum, it seemed as if a son of some noble order rather than a young scion of high quality of a rich inheritance, had been journeying through the land, and Evelyn, though pleased with the change which seemed thus to respect her unprotected and peculiar condition, would sometimes think a curiosity that, by so many indirect hints, it should be forced on her resolution.

She thought a strange also, that Damien, to whom care she had been so solemnly committed, did not even pay his respects to her on the road. Something there was which whispered to her, that close and frequent intercourse might be unbecoming—even dangerous, but surely the ordinary duties of a knight and gentleman enjoined him some personal communication with the maiden under his escort, were it only to ask if her accommodations had been made to her satisfaction, or if she had any special wish which was ungratified. The only intercourse, however, which took place between them, was through means of Amelot, Damian de Lacy's youthful page, who came at morn and evening to receive Eveline's commands concerning their route, and the hours of journey and repose.

These formalities rendered the solitude of Eveline's return less endurable, and had it not been for the society of Rose, who would have found herself under an unwelcome but some degree of constraint. She even hearkened to her attendant's some remarks upon the angularity of De Lacy's conduct, who, authorized as he was by his situation, seemed yet as much afraid to approach her as if she had been a basilisk.

Rose let the first observation of this nature pass as if it had been unheard, but when her mistress made a second remark to the same purpose, she answered, with the truth and freedom of her character though perhaps with less of her usual prudence, "Damian de Lacy judges well, noble lady. He to whom the safe keeping of a royal treasure is intrusted, should not indulge himself too often by gazing upon it."

Eveline blushed, wrapt herself closer in her veil, nor did she again during that journey mention the name of Damian de Lacy.

When the gray towers of the Garde Doloureuse greeted her sight on the evening of the second day, and she once more beheld her father's banner floating from its highest watch tower in honour of her approach, her sensations were mingled with pain, but, upon the whole, she looked towards that ancient home as a place of refuge, where she might indulge the new train of thoughts which circumstances had opened to her, amid the same scenes which had sheltered her infancy and childhood.

She pressed forward her palfrey, to reach the ancient portal as soon as possible, bowed hastily to the well known faces which showed themselves on all sides, but spoke to no one, until, dismounting at the chapel door she had penetrated to the crypt, in which was preserved the miraculous painting. There prostrate on the ground, she implored the guidance and protection of the Holy Virgin through those intricacies in which she had involved herself, by fulfilment of the vow which she had made in her anguish before the same shrine. If the prayer was undirected, its purport was virtuous and sincere, nor are we disposed to doubt that it attained that Heaven towards which it was devoutly addressed.

CHAPTER XXII.

The Virgin's image falls—yet none, I deem,
That undergoes the suppliant's knee might bleed
As to a ramble power in which might bleed
All that was man's and resembled in her
Of mother's love with maiden's purity
Of high with low, of sainted with profane.

WALTER SCOTT.

The household of the Lady Eveline, though of an establishment becoming her parent and future rank, was of a solemn and sequestered character, corresponding to her place of residence, and the privacy connected with her situation, retired as she was from the class of maidens who are yet unengaged, and yet not united with that of matrons, who enjoy the protection of a married name. Her immediate female attendants, with whom the reader is already acquainted, constituted almost her whole society. The garrison of the castle, besides household servants, consisted of veterans of tried faith, the followers of Sprague and of De Lacy in many a bloody field, to whom the duties of watching and warding were as familiar as any of their more ordinary occupations, and whose courage, nevertheless, tempered by age and experience, was not likely to engage in any rash adventure or accidental quarrel. These men maintained a constant and watchful guard, commanded by the steward, but under the eye of Father Aldrovand, who, besides discharging his ecclesiastical functions, was at times, pleased to show some exercises of his ancient military education.

Whilst this garrison afforded security against any sudden attempt on the part of the Welsh to surprise the castle, a strong body of forces were disposed within a few miles of the Garde Doloureuse, ready, on the least alarm, to advance to defend the place against any more numerous body of invaders, who, undeterred by the fate of Gwenwyn, might have the hardihood to form a regular siege. To this band, which, under the eye of Damian de Lacy himself, was kept in constant readiness for action, could be added on occasion all the military forces of the Marches, comprising numerous bodies of Flemings, and other foreigners, who held their establishments by military tenure.

While the fortress was thus secure from hostile violence, the life of its inmates was an envied and simple, as might have excused youth and beauty for wishing for variety even at the expense of some danger. The labours of the needle were only relieved by a walk round the battlements, where Eveline, as she passed arm in arm with Rose, received a military salute from each sentinel in turn, or in the court yard, where the caps and bonnets of the domestics paid her the same respect which she received above from the pikes and javelins of the warders. Did they wish to extend their airing beyond the castle gate, it was not sufficient that doors and bridges were to be opened and lowered; there was, besides, an escort to get under arms, who, on foot or horseback as the case might require, attended for the security of the Lady Eveline's person. Without this military attendance they could not so safely move even so far as the mill, where honest Wilkin Flammoek, his workshop aside forgotten, was occupied with his mechanical labours. But if a further deposit was intended, and the Lady of the Garde Doloureuse proposed to hunt or hawk for a few hours, her safety was not confided to a guard so feeble as the garrison of the castle could afford. It was necessary that Raoul should announce her purpose to Damian by a special messenger despatched the evening before, that there might be time before daybreak to arrear, with a body of light cavalry, the region in which she intended to take her pleasure; and sentinels were placed in all suspicious places while she continued in the field. In truth, she tried, upon one or two occasions, to make an excursion, without any formal announcement of her intention; but all her purposes seemed to be known to Damian as soon as they were formed, and she was no sooner abroad than parties of archers and spearmen from his camp were seen scouring the valleys, and guarding the mountain-pass, and Damian's own plume was usually behind conspicuous among the distant soldiers.

The formalities of these preparations so much allayed the pleasure derived from the sport, that Eveline seldom resorted to amusement which was attended with such trouble and painful exertion as many persons.

The day being worn out as it best might in the evening Father Aldrovand was wont to read out of some his legend, or from the boundaries of some departed saint, such passages as he deemed fit for the hearing of his late congregation. Sometimes also he read antiphonary chapters of the Holy Scripture, but in each case, the good man's attention was so strangely turned to the military part of the Jewish history that he was never able to quit the books of Judges and of Kings, together with the triumphs of Judas Maccabæus, although the manner in which he illustrated the victories of the children of Israel, was much more amusing to himself than adding to his female audience.

Sometimes, but rarely, Rose obtained permission for a strolling minstrel to entertain an hour with his ditty of love and chivalry; sometimes a pilgrim from a distant shrine, repaid by long tales of the wonders which he had seen in other lands, the hospitalities which the Castle Delourmont afforded; and sometimes also it happened, that the interest and intercession of the strong-woman obtained admission for travelling merchants, or pedlars, who, at the risk of their lives, found profit by carrying from castle to castle the materials of rich dresses and female ornaments.

The usual visits of mendicants, of jugglers, of the rolling jesters, are not to be forgotten in this list of amusements; and though his nation subjected him to close watch and observation, even the Welsh bard, with his huge harp strung with horse hair, was sometimes admitted to vary the uniformity of their secluded life. But, saving such amusements, and saving also the regular attendance upon the religious duties at the chapel, it was impossible for life to glide away in more wearisome monotony than at the castle of the Castle Delourmont. Since the death of its brave owner, to whom fasting and hospitality seemed as natural as thoughts of honour and deeds of chivalry, the gloom of a convent might be said to have enveloped the ancient mansion of Raymond Berenger, were it not that the presence of so many armed warriors, stalking in solemn state on the battlements, gave it rather the aspect of a state-prison; and the temper of the inhabitants gradually became infected by the character of their dwelling.

The spirits of Eveline in particular felt a depression, which her naturally lively temper was quite inadequate to resist; and as her ruminations became graver, had caught that calm and contemplative manner, which is so often united with an ardent and enthusiastic temperament. She meditated deeply upon the former accidents of her life; nor can it be wondered that her thoughts repeatedly wandered back to the two several periods on which she had witnessed, or supposed that she had witnessed, a supernatural appearance. Then it was that it often seemed to her as if a good and evil power strove for mastery over her destiny.

Solitude is favourable to feelings of self-importance; and it is when alone and occupied only with their own thoughts that fanatics have reverence, and imagined saints know themselves in imaginary ecstasies. With Eveline the influence of enthusiasm went not such a length; yet it seemed to her as if in the vision of the night she saw either the aspect of the Lady of the Castle Delourmont, bending over her glances of pity, comfort, and protection, or the ominous form of the Saxon castle of Baldingham, holding up the bloody hand as witness of the injuries with which she had been treated while in life, and menacing with revenge the descendant of her murderer.

On waking from such dreams, Eveline would reflect that she was the last branch of her house—a house to which the tutelage and protection of the miraculous image, and the enmity and evil influence of the revengeful Yvande, had been peculiarly attached for ages. It seemed to her as if she were the prize, for the disposal of which the benign saint and vindictive fiend were now to play their last and keenest game.

Thus thinking, and experiencing little interruption of her meditations from any external circumstance of interest and amusement, she became pensive, absent, wrapt herself up in contemplations which withdrew her attention from the conversation around her, and walked in the world of reality like one who is still in a dream. When she thought of her engagement with the Constable of Chester it was with resignation, but without a wish, and almost without an expectation, that she would be called upon to fulfil it. She had accomplished her vow by accepting the faith of her deliverer in exchange for her own; and although she held herself willing to redeem the pledge—nay, would scarce confess to herself the reluctance with which she thought of doing so—yet it is certain that she entertained unwavering hopes that Our Lady of the Castle Delourmont would not be a severe creditor; but, satisfied with the readiness she had shown to accomplish her vow, would not insist upon her claim in its full rigour. It would have been the blackest ingratitude to have wished that her gallant deliverer, whom she had so much cause to pray for, should experience any of those fatigues which in the Holy Land so often changed the heart-wrench into oppression; but other accidents chanced, when men had been long about to alter those purposes with which they had left home.

A strolling minstrel, who sought the Castle Delourmont, had recited, for the amusement of the lady and household, the celebrated lay of the Count of Glanthen, who, already married in his own country, laid himself under so many obligations in the East to a Saracen princess, through whose means he achieved his freedom, that he married her also. The Pope and his council were pleased to approve of the double wedlock, in a case so extraordinary; and the great Count of Glanthen shared his nuptial bed with two wives of equal rank, and now sleeps between them under the same monument.

The commentaries of the inmates of the castle had been various and discrepant upon this legend. Father Aldrovand considered it as altogether false, and as unworthy calumny on the head of the church, a affirming his Holiness would countenance such irregularity. Old Margery, with the tender-heartedness of an ancient nurse, wept bitterly for pity during its tale, and never questioning either the power of the Pope or the propriety of his decision, was pleased that a mode of atonement was found for a complication of love disasters which seemed almost untractable. Dame Gillian declared it unreasonable, that more than one woman was only allowed one husband, a man should, under any circumstances, be permitted to have two wives; whilst Raoul, glancing towards her a look of verity, pointed the deplorable misery of the man who could be fool enough to avail himself of such a privilege.

"Peace, all the rest of you," said the Lady Eveline; "and do you, my dear Rose, tell me your judgment upon this Count of Glanthen and his two wives."

Rose blushed, and replied, "She was not much accustomed to think of such matters; but that, as an apprehension, the wife who could be contented with but one husband, and whose affections had once been devoted to engage the slightest share of them."

"You are partly right, Rose," said Eveline, "and methinks the European lady, when she found herself outshone by the young and beautiful foreign princess, would have best consulted her own dignity, by resigning the place and giving the Holy Father no more trouble than in annulling the marriage, as has been done in cases of more frequent occurrence."

Thus she said with an air of indifference and cool gaiety which contrasted to her faithful attentions with how few that she herself could have made such a sacrifice, and served to indicate the state of her affections towards the inevitable. But there was more than the constancy of whom her thoughts turned more frequently (though involuntarily), than perhaps in prudent tales should have done.

The recollections of Damien de Lacy had not long ceased from Eveline's mind. They were indeed renewed by hearing his name so often mentioned, and by knowing that he was almost constantly in the neighbourhood, with his whole army, as fit upon her convenience, interest and safety; while on the other hand so far from waiting on her person, he never even attempted, by a direct communication with herself, to consult her pleasure, even upon what most concerned her.

The messages conveyed by Father Aldrovand to Rose, in Arncliffe, Damien's page, while they gave an air of formality to their intercourse, which Eveline thought unnecessary, and even unkind, yet served to fix her attention upon the connection between them, and to keep it ever present to her memory. The remark by which Rose had vindicated the distance observed by her youthful guardian, sometimes arose to her recollection, and while her soul rebelled with scorn the suspicion, that, in any case, his presence, whether at intervals or constantly, could be prejudicial to his uncle's interest, she composed various arguments for giving him a frequent place in her memory—Was it not her duty to thank a De Lacy often and loudly, as the Constable's most beloved, and most trusted relative?—Was he not her former deliverer and her present guardian?—Might he not be considered as an instrument specially employed by her divine patroness, in making effused the protection with which she had graced her in more than one emergency?

Evadne's mind mutined against the restrictions which were laid on their intercourse, as against something which inferred suspicion and degradation, like the compelled seclusion to which she had heard the Paynim infidels of the East subjected their females. Why should she owe her guardian only in the benefits which he conferred upon her, and the cares he took for her safety, and hear his sentiments only by the mouth of others, as if one of them had been infected with the plague, or some other fatal or infectious disorder, which might render their meeting dangerous to the other?—And if they did meet occasionally, what else could be the consequence, save that the care of a brother towards a sister—of a trusty and kind guardian to the betrothed bride of his near relative and honoured patron, might render the melancholy seclusion of the Garde Doloureuse more easy to be endured by one so young in years, and, though dejected by present circumstances, naturally so gay in temper?

Yet, though this train of reasoning appeared to Evadne, when tracing it in her own mind, as conclusive, that she several times resolved to communicate her view of the case to Roger Flammarik, it so chanced that whenever she looked on the calm steady blue eye of the Flemish maiden, and remembered that her unblemished faith was mixed with a sincerity and plain dealing proof against every consideration, she feared lest she might be subjected in the opinion of her attendant to suspicions from which her own mind freed her—and her proud Norman spirit revolted at the idea of being obliged to justify herself to another when she stood self-acquainted to her own mind. Let things be as they are, she said, "and let us endure all the weariness of a life which might be so easily rendered more cheerful, rather than that this anxious but penitential friend should, in the strictness and nicety of her feelings on my account, conceive me capable of encouraging an intercourse which could lead to a less worthy thought of me in the mind of the most scrupulous of men—or of woman-kind." But even this war of passion and resolution tended to bring the image of the handsome young Danish more frequently before the Lady Evadne's fancy than perhaps his uncle, had he known it, would altogether have approved of. In such reflections, however she never indulged long, ere a sense of the singular destiny which had hitherto attended her led her back into the more melancholy contemplations from which the buoyancy of her youthful fancy had for a short time emancipated her.

CHAPTER XXIII.

—Ours is the skin,
Where at what level we plant our hawk shall see.
RABOUL.

ONE bright September morning, old Raoul was busy in the mow where he kept his hawks, grumbling all the while to himself as he surveyed the condition of each bird, and blaming alternately the carelessness of the under-falconer, and the situation of the building, and the weather, and the wind, and all things around him, for the dilapidation which time and disease had made in the neglected hawking establishment of the Garde Doloureuse. While in these unpleasant meditations, he was surprised by the voice of his beloved Dame Gillian, who seldom was an early riser, and yet more rarely visited him when he was in his sphere of peculiar authority. "Raoul, Raoul! where art thou, man?—Ever to seek for, when thou canst make aught of advantage for thyself or me!"

"And what want'st thou, dame?" said Raoul, "what means thy screaming worse than the sea-gull before wet weather? A murrain on thy voice! it is enough to fray every hawk from the perch."

"Hawk?" answered Dame Gillian; "is it time to be looking for hawks, when there is a coat of the bravest falcons come hither for sale, that ever flew by lake, brook, or meadow?"

"Kites! like her that brings the news," said Raoul, "No, nor kestrels like him that hears it," replied Gillian; "but brave yarfalcons, with large noses, strongly armed, and beaks short and something bluish—"

"Pshaw, with thy jargon!—Where came they from?" said Raoul, interested in the tidings, but unwilling to give his wife the satisfaction of seeing that he was so.

"From the Isle of Man," replied Gillian.

"They must be good, then, though it was a woman brought tidings of them," said Raoul, smiling grimly at his own wit; then, leaving the news, he demanded to know where this famous falcon-merchant was to be met withal.

"Why, between the barriers and the inner gate," replied Gillian, "where other men are admitted that have wares to utter—Where should he be?"

"And who let him in?" demanded the suspicious Raoul.

"Why, Master Steward, thou owl!" said Gillian; "he came but now to my chamber, and sent me hither to call you."

"Oh, the steward—the steward—I might have guessed as much. And he came to thy chamber, doubtless, because he could not have as easily come hither to me himself. Was it not so, sweetheart?"

"I do not know why he chose to come to me rather than to you, Raoul," said Gillian; "and if I did know, perhaps I would not tell you. Go to—save your bargain, or to make your bargain, I care not which—the man will not wait for you—he has good profits from the Seneschal of Malpas, and the Welsh Lord of Dinevawr."

"I come—I come," said Raoul, who felt the necessity of embracing this opportunity of improving his hawking establishment, and hastened to the gate, where he met the merchant, attended by a servant, who kept in separate cages the three falcons which he offered for sale.

The first glance satisfied Raoul that they were of the best breed in Europe, and that, if their education were in correspondence to their race, there could scarce be a more valuable addition even to a royal menagerie. The merchant did not fail to enlarge upon all their points of excellence, the breadth of their shoulders, the strength of their train, their full and flaring dark eyes, the boldness with which they endured the approach of strangers, and the lively spirit and vigour with which they pruned their plumes, and shook, or, as it was technically termed, roused themselves. He expatiated on the difficulty and danger with which they were obtained from the Rock of Ramsey, on which they were bred, and which was as every un-revealed even on the coast of Norway.

Raoul turned apparently a deaf ear to all these commendations. "Friend merchant," said he, "I know a falcon as well as thou dost, and I will not deny that these are fine ones; but if they be not carefully trained and reclaimed, I would rather have a goose-hawk on my perch than the fairest falcon that ever stretched wing to weather."

"I grant ye," said the merchant; "but if we agree on the price, for that is the main matter, thou shalt see the birds fly if thou wilt, and then buy them or not as thou likest. I am no true merchant if thou ever saw'st birds beat them, whether at the mount or the stoop."

"That I call fair," said Raoul, "if the price be equally so."

"It shall be corresponding," said the hawk-merchant; "for I have brought six cases from the island, by the good favour of good King Ragnold of Man, and I have sold every feather of them save these; and so, having emptied my cages and filled my purse, I desire not to be troubled longer with the rest; and if a good fellow, and a judge, as thou seemest to be, should like the hawks when he has seen them fly, he shall have the price of his own making."

"Go to," said Raoul, "we will have no blind bargain; my lady, if the hawks be suitable, so more able to pay for them than thou to give them away.—Will a bargain be a comfortable price for the case?"

"A bezant, Master Falconer!—By my faith, you are no bold bodesman! nevertheless, double your offer, and I will consider it."

"If the hawks are well reclaimed," said Raoul, "I will give you a bezant and a half; but I will see them strike a heron ere I will be so rash as deal with you."

"It is well," said the merchant, "and I had better take your offer than be longer cumbered with them; for were I to carry them into Wales, I might get paid in a worse fashion by some of their long knives.—Will you to horse presently?"

"Assuredly," said Raoul; "and, though March be the fitter month for hawking at the heron, yet I will show you one of these frogpeckers for the trouble of riding the matter of a mile by the water-side."

"Content, Sir Falconer," said the merchant. "But are we to go alone, or is there no lord or lady in the castle who would take pleasure to see a piece of game gallantly struck? I am not afraid to show these hawks to a countess."

"My lady used to love the sport well enough," said Raoul; "but I wot not why, she is moped and mazed ever since her father's death, and lives in her fair castle like a nun in a cloister, without disport or revelry of any kind.—Nevertheless, Gillian, thou canst do something with her—good now, do a kind deed for once, and move her to come out and look on this morning's sport—The poor heart hath seen no pastime this summer."

"That I will do," quoth Gillian; "and, moreover, I will show her such a new riding-tire for the head, that no woman born could ever look at without the wish to toss it a little in the wind."

As Gillian spoke, it appeared to her jealous-pated husband that he surprised a glance of more intelligence exchanged betwixt her and the trader than brief acquaintance seemed to warrant, even when allowance was made for the extreme frankness of Dame Gillian's disposition. He thought also, that, on looking more closely at the merchant, his lineaments were not totally unknown to him; and proceeded to say to him dryly, "We have met before, friend, but I cannot call to remembrance where."

"Like enough," said the merchant; "I have used this country often, and may have taken money of you in the way of trade. If I were in fitting place, I would gladly bestow a pottle of wine to our better acquaintance."

"Not so fast, friend," said the old huntsman; "ere I drink to better acquaintance with any one, I must be well pleased with what I already know of him. We will see thy hawks fly, and if their breeding match thy bragging, we may perhaps crush a cup together.—And here come grooms and equerries, in faith—my lady has consented to come forth."

The opportunity of seeing this rural pastime had offered itself to Eveline, at a time when the delightful brilliancy of the day, the temperance of the air, and the joyous work of harvest, proceeding in every direction around, made the temptation to exercise almost irresistible.

As they proposed to go no farther than the side of the neighbouring river, near the fatal bridge, over which a small guard of infantry was constantly maintained, Eveline dispensed with any farther escort, and, contrary to the custom of the castle, took no one in her train save Rose and Gillian, and one or two servants, who led spaniels, or carried appurtenances of the chase. Raoul, the merchant, and an equerry, attended her of course, each holding a hawk on his wrist, and anxiously adjusting the mode in which they should throw them off, so as best to ascertain the extent of their powers and training.

When these important points had been adjusted, the party rode down the river, carefully looking on every side for the object of their game; but no heron was seen stalking on the usual haunts of the bird, although there was a heronry at no great distance.

Few disappointments of a small nature are more teasing than that of a sportsman, who, having set out with all means and appliances for destruction of game, finds that there is none to be met with; because he conceives himself, with his full shooting trim and his empty game-pouch, to be subjected to the sneer of every passing rustic. The party of the Lady Eveline felt all the degradation of such disappointment.

"A fair country this," said the merchant, "where, on two miles of river, you cannot find one poor heron!"

"It is the clatter those d—d Flemings make with their water-mills and fulling-mills," said Raoul;—"they destroy good sport and good company wherever they come. But were my lady willing to ride a mile or so farther to the Red Pool, I could show you a long-shanked fellow who would make your hawks cackle till their brains were giddy."

"The Red Pool!" said Rose; "thou knowest it is more than three miles beyond the bridge, and lies up towards the hills."

"Ay, ay," said Raoul, "another Flemish freak to spoil pastime! They are not so scarce on the Marches these Flemish wenches, that they should fear being hawked at by Welsh haggards."

"Raoul is right, Rose," answered Eveline; "it is absurd to be cooped up like birds in a cage, when all around us has been so uniformly quiet. I am determined to break out of bounds for once, and see sport in our old fashion, without being surrounded with armed men like prisoners of state. We will mend to the Red Pool, wench, and kill a heron like free maids of the Marches."

"Let me but tell my father, at least, to mount and follow us," said Rose—for they were now near the re-established manufacturing houses of the stout Fleming.

"I care not if thou dost, Rose," said Eveline; "yet credit me, girl, we will be at the Red Pool, and then far on our way home again, ere thy father has donned his best doublet, girded on his two handed sword, and accoutred his strong Flanderkien elephant of a horse, which he judiciously names Sloth—nay, frown not—and lose not, in justifying thy father, the time that may be better spent in calling him out."

Rose rode to the mills accordingly, when Wilkin Flammock, at the command of his liege mistress, readily hastened to get his steel cap and habergeon, and ordered half-a-dozen of his kinsmen and servants to get on horseback. Rose remained with him, to urge him to more despatch than his methodical disposition rendered natural to him; but in spite of all her efforts to stimulate him, the Lady Eveline had passed the bridge more than half an hour ere her escort was prepared to follow her.

Mean while, apprehensive of no evil, and riding gayly on, with the sensation of one escaped from confinement, Eveline moved forward on her lively jennet, as light as a lark; the plumes with which Dame Gillian had decked her riding-bonnet dancing in the wind, and her attendants galloping behind her, with dogs, pouches, lines, and all other appurtenances of the royal sport of hawking. After passing the river, the wild greensward path which they pursued began to wind upward among small eminences, sometimes bare and craggy, sometimes overgrown with hazel, sloe-thorn, and other dwarf shrubs, and at length suddenly descending, brought them to the verge of a mountain rivulet, that, like a lamb at play, leapt merrily from rock to rock, seemingly uncertain which way to run.

"This little stream was always my favourite, Dame Gillian," said Eveline, "and now methinks it leaps the lighter that it sees me again."

"Ah! lady," said Dame Gillian, whose turn for conversation never extended in such cases beyond a few phrases of gross flattery, "many a fair knight would leap shoulder-height for leave to look on you as free as the brook may! more especially now that you have donned that riding-cap, which, in exquisite delicacy of invention, methinks is a bowshot before aught that I ever invented—What thinkest thou, Raoul?"

"I think," answered her well-natured helpmate, "that women's tongues were contrived to drive all the game out of the country.—Here we come near to the spot where we hope to speed, or nowhere; wherefore, pray, my sweet lady, be silent yourself and keep your followers as much as as they nature will permit, while we stand along the bank of the pool, under the wind, with the hawk's heads east looms, all ready for a flight."

As he spoke, they advanced about a hundred yards up the flowing stream, and the little vale through which it flowed making a very sudden turn to one side, showed them the Red Fort, the magnificent water of which formed the rivulet itself.

This mountain-like or torn, as it is called in some countries, was a deep basin of about a mile in circumference, but rather oblong than circular. On the side next to our fairerons arose a ridge of rock of a dark red hue giving name to the pool, which, reflecting the massive and dusky barrier appeared to partake of its colour. On the opposite side was a limby hill whose accidental bloom had not yet faded from purple to russet, its surface was varied by the dark green fern and the fern, and in many places grey cliffs, or loose stones of the same colour, formed a contrast to the ruddy precipice to which they lay opposed. A natural road of beautiful sand was formed by a beach, which, extending all the way around the lake, separated its waters from the precipitous rock on the one hand, and on the other from the steep and broken hill, and being nowhere less than five or six yards in breadth, and in many places greatly more, offered around its whole circuit a tempting opportunity to the rider who desired to exercise and breathe the breeze on which he was mounted. The verge of the pool on the rocky side was here and there strewed with fragments of large stones, detached from the precipitous shores, but not in such quantity as to encumber the pleasant horse-quarry. Many of these rocky masses having passed the margin of the water in their fall, lay unremoved there like small islets; and, placed amongst a little archipelago, the quick eye of Raoul detected the heron which they were in search of.

A moment's consultation was held to consider in what manner they should approach the red and solitary bird, which, unconscious that itself was the object of a formidable ambuscade stood motionless on a stone, by the bank of the lake watching for such small fish or water reptiles as might chance to pass by its lonely station. A brief debate took place between Raoul and the hawk merchant on the best mode of starting the quarry as to allow Lady Eveline and her attendants the most perfect view of his flight. The faculty of killing the heron at the farthest or at the jettes forced—that is, upon the either or further side of the pool was anxiously debated in language of treacherous importance as if some great and perilous enterprise was about to be executed.

At length the arrangements were fixed, and the party began to advance towards the aquatic hermit, who, by this time aware of their approach, drew himself up to his full height, covered his long iron work, spread his broad fan like wings, uttered his usual clanging cry and preparing his length of thin legs far behind him, rose upon the gentle breeze. It was then, with a loud whump of encouragement, that the merchant threw off the noble hawk he bore, giving first unhindered time to give her a view of her quarry.

Slower as a figure in chase of some red gallion started the falcon towards the quarry which she had been taught to pursue, while preparing her defence if he could be unable to escape by flight, the heron carried his powers of speed to escape from an enemy so formidable. Flung by almost unassisted strength of wing, he ascended high and higher in the air by tortuous gyration, that the hawk might gain no vantage ground for pouncing at him; while his quivering tail, at the extremity of an long neck as stretched on, to strike an object at a yard's distance in every position, presented for any less spirited antagonist all the terrors of a Moush weilin.

Another hawk was now thrown off, and encouraged by the balloons of the falconer to join the contest. Both kept mounting or wheeling the air, as were, by a succession of small circles endeavouring to gain that superior height which the heron on a part was bent to preserve, and to the exquisite delight of the spectators, the contest was continued until all three were well nigh mingled with the heavy clouds from which was occasionally heard the harsh and plaintive cry of the quarry, appearing as it were to the heaven which he was approaching, against the wanton cruelty of those by whom he was persecuted.

At length one of the falcons had reached a perch from which she ventured to swoop at the heron; but so judiciously did the quarry make his defence, as to escape as he took the only shot the falcon, shooting down at full descent, and striking against his right wing, so that one of his feathers was severed, through the body by his own weight. He following down the lake, very near the land, on the side farthest from the falconers, and perished there.

"There goes a gallant falcon to the fishes," said Raoul. "Marcher, she takes a dough."

Even as he spoke, however, the remaining bird had avenged the fate of her sister, for the currents which the heron met with on one side, did not prevent his being scissored on the other wing, and the falcon swooping boldly and grasping with, or, as it is called in falconry, breaking his prey, both came tumbling down together, from a great height in the air. It was then no small object on the part of the falconers to come in as soon as possible, lest the falcon should receive hurt from the back or talons of the heron; and the whole party, the men sitting apart, and the females watching their palfreys, went off like the wind, sweeping along the fair and smooth beach betwixt the rock and the water.

Lady Eveline, far better mounted than any of her train, her spirit excited by the sport, and by the speed at which she moved, was much sooner than any of her attendants at the spot where the falcon and heron, still engaged in their mortal struggle, lay fighting upon the moss; the wing of the latter having been broken by the stoop of the former. The duty of a falconer in such a crisis was to rush in and assist the hawk, by thrusting the heron's bill into the earth, and breaking his legs, and thus permitting the falcon to despatch him on easy terms.

Neither would the age nor quality of the Lady Eveline have excused her becoming second to the falcon in this cruel business; but just as she had dismounted for that purpose, she was surprised to find herself seized up by a wild form, who exclaimed in Welsh, that he would not as a way for bowking on the dressmaker of Dewyd with the one eye. At the same time many other Welshmen, to the number of more than a score, showed themselves from behind crags and bushes, all armed as game with the arms called Welsh hooks, long knives, darts, and bows and arrows.

Eveline screamed to her attendants for assistance, and at the same time made use of what Welsh phrases she possessed to move the fears or excite the compassion of the surprised mountaineers, for she doubted not that she had fallen under the power of such a party. When she found her requests were unheeded, and she perceived it was their purpose to detain her prisoner, she disclaimed to use farther entreaties; but demanded at their peril that they should treat her with respect, promising in that case that she would pay them a large ransom, and threatening them with the vengeance of the Lords Marchers, and particularly of Sir Damian de Lacy, if they ventured to use her otherwise.

The men seemed to understand her, and although they proceeded to tie a bandage over her eyes, and to bind her arms with her own veil, yet they observed in these acts of violence a certain delicacy and attention both to her feelings and her safety, which led her to hope that her request had had some effect on them. They secured her to the saddle of her palfrey, and led her away with them through the recesses of the hills; while she had the additional distress to hear behind her the noise of a conflict, occasioned by the fruitless efforts of her sex to procure her ransom.

Astonishment had at first seized the hawking party, when they saw from some distance their sport interrupted by a violent assault on their mistress. Old Raoul valiantly put spurs to his horse, and calling on the rest to follow him to the rocks, rode furiously towards the banditti; but, having no other arms save a hawking-pole and short sword, he and those who followed him in his meritorious but ineffectual attempt were easily foiled, and Aspid and one or two of the foremost severely beaten, the banditti exercising upon them their own poles till they were broken to splinters, but generously abstaining from the use of more dangerous weapons. The rest of the retinue, completely discouraged, dispersed to give the alarm, and the merchant and Dame Gillian remained by the lake, filling the air with shrieks of useless fear and sorrow. The outlaws, mean while, drawing together in a body, shot a few arrows at the fugitives, but more to alarm than to injure them, and then marched off, as if to cover their companions who had gone before with the Lady Eveline in their custody.

CHAPTER XXIV.

Four ruffians seized me yester morn—
 Ah! a maiden most forlorn!
 They checked my arms with wicked might,
 And bound me on a palfrey white.—COLLIER.

Such adventures as are now only recorded in works of mere fiction, were not uncommon in the feudal ages, when might was so universally superior to right; and it followed that those whose condition exposed them to frequent violence, were more prompt in repelling, and more patient in enduring it, than could otherwise have been expected from their sex and age.

The Lady Eveline felt that she was a prisoner, nor was she devoid of fears concerning the purpose of this assault; but she suffered neither her alarm, nor the violence with which she was hurried along, to deprive her of the power of observing and reflecting. From the noise of hoofs which now increased around, she concluded that the greater part of the ruffians by whom she had been seized had betaken themselves to their horses. Thus she knew was consonant to the practice of the Welsh marauders, who, although the small size and slightness of their nags made them totally unfit for service in battle, availed themselves of their activity and sureness of foot to transport them with the necessary celerity to and from the scenes of their rapine, ensuring thus a rapid and unopposed approach, and a secure and speedy retreat. These animals traversed without difficulty, and beneath the load of a heavy soldier, the wild mountain-paths by which the country was intersected, and in one of which Lady Eveline Berenger concluded she was now engaged, from the manner in which her own palfrey, supported by a man on foot at either rein, seemed now to labour up some precipice, and anon to descend with still greater risk on the other side.

At one of those moments, a voice which she had not yet distinguished addressed her in the Anglo-Norman language, and asked, with apparent interest, if she sat safely on her saddle, offering at the same time to have her accompaniments altered at her pleasure and convenience.

"Inault not my condition with the notion of safety," said Eveline; "you may well believe that I hold my safety altogether irreconcilable with those deeds of violence. If I or my vassals have done injury to any of the Cymry, let me know, and it shall be amended—If it is ransom which you desire, name the sum, and I will send an order to treat for it; but detain me not prisoner, for that can but injure me, and will avail you nothing."

"The Lady Eveline," answered the voice, still in a tone of courtesy inconsistent with the violence which she sustained, "will speedily find that our actions are more rough than our purposes."

"If you know who I am," said Eveline, "you cannot doubt that this atrocity will be avenged—you must know by whose banner my lands are at present protected."

"Under De Lacy's," answered the voice, with a tone of indifference. "Be it so—falcons fear not falcons."

* Cymry, or Welsh.

At this moment there was a halt, and a confused murmur arose amongst those around her, who hitherto been silent, unless when muttering to each other in Welsh, and as briefly as possible, devising which way to hold, or encouragement to one man.

Three minutes elapsed, and there was a pause several minutes; at length Eveline again heard a voice which formerly addressed her, giving directions which she could not understand. He then spoke herself. "You will presently see," he said, "what I have spoken truly, when I said I scorned the only which you are fettered. But you are at once free of strife and the reward of victory—your safety can be cared for as time will admit, and, strange as the mode of protection is to which we are to submit you, I trust the victor in the approaching struggle will find you uninjured."

"Do not, for the sake of the Blessed Virgin, be there be strife and bloodshed?" said Eveline, "let me unbend my eyes, and let me speak to those who approach you dread. If friends, as it would seem to me, I will be the means of peace between you."

"I deeper peace," replied the speaker "I have not undertaken a resolute and daring adventure to resign it as a child doth his plaything, as doth the frown of fortune. Please to alight, noble lady; rather be not offended that I thus lift you from the seat, and place you on the greenward."

As he spoke, Eveline felt herself lifted from the palfrey, and placed carefully and safely on the ground in a sitting posture. A moment after, the same presumptuous valet who had aided her to descend, robbed her of her cap, the masterpiece of Dame Gillian and of her upper mantle. "I must yet further vex you," said the bandit leader, "to creep on back of knees into this narrow aperture. Believe me, I see the nature of the singular fortification to which I commit your person for safety."

Eveline crept forwards as directed, counting assistance to be of no avail, and thinking that compliance with the request of one who spoke his point of consequence, might find her protection against the unbridled fury of the Welsh, to whom she was so noxious, as being the cause of Gwynedd's death and the defeat of the Britons under the walls of Gerde Dolowen.

She crept then forwards through a series of damp passages, built on either side with rough stones and so low that she could not have assumed any other posture. When she had proceeded about ten or three yards, the passage opened into a small or apartment, high enough to permit her to sit down, and of irregular, but narrow, dimensions. At the same time she became sensible, from the noise which she heard behind her, that the ruffians were stopping up the passage by which she had been introduced into the bowels of the earth. She distinctly heard the clattering of stones with which they closed the entrance, and she became aware that the current of fresh air, which had rushed to the opening, was gradually fading, and that the atmosphere of the subterranean apartment became more damp, earthy, and oppressive, than it had.

At this moment came a distant sound from without, in which Eveline thought she could distinguish cries, blows, the trampling of horses, the clash and screams of the combatants, but all drowned by the rude walls of her prison, into a confused low murmur, conveying such intelligence to her ears as we may suppose the dead to hear from the walls to have gained.

Influenced by desperation, under circumstances so dreadful, Eveline struggled for liberty with all frantic energy, that she partly effected her purpose by forcing her arms from the bonds which caged them. But this only convinced her of the impossibility to escape; for, rending off the web which was her head, she found herself in total darkness, and flinging her arms hastily around her, she discovered she was caged up in a subterranean cave of very narrow dimensions. Her hands, which were around, encountered only pieces of decayed wood and a substance which, at another moment, would have made her shudder being, in truth, the slender of the dead. At present, not even this circumstance could add to her fears, immured as she was, to perish by a strange and subterranean death, while her friends and deliverers were probably within a few yards of her. She flung her arms wildly in search of some avenue of escape, but every effort made for liberating herself from the ponderous wall of stone, was as ineffectual as if directed against the dome of a cathedral.

The noise by which her ears were at first assailed subsided rapidly, and at one moment it seemed as if the vault under which she lay sounded only with the blows, or the shock of substances which had been thrown, against it. It was impossible for a human brain could have withstood these impressions operating upon it so immediately; but happily this state of things lasted not long. Sounds, more hollow and dying away in distance, argued that one or more of the parties had retreated; and at length all was now left to the undisturbed contemplation of her own disastrous situation. The fight had ended, and as circumstances led her to infer, her assailants were conquerors; for otherwise the victor would have relieved her from her place of confinement, and carried her away captive with him, as his friends were so often menaced. But what could the success of her friends and followers avail Eveline, who, under a place of concealment which, what-its character, must have escaped their observation, was left on the field of battle, to become the prize of the enemy, should their band venture to turn, or die in darkness and privation, a horror as ever tyrant invented, or martyr endured; and which the unfortunate young lady could even bear to think of without a prayer that her life might at least be shortened.

Hour of dread she recollected the poniard she wore, and the dark thought crossed her mind, when life became hopeless, a speedy death was at least within her reach. As her soul shuddered at the dreadful alternative, the question suggested, might not this weapon be put to a new use, and aid her emancipation, instead of increasing her sufferings?

She once adopted, the daughter of Raymond hastened to prove the experiment, and by efforts succeeded, though with difficulty, in her posture, so as to admit of her inspecting the walls of confinement all around, but particularly the opening by which she had entered, and by which she attempted again to return to the light of day. She went to the extremity, and found it, as she expected, strongly blocked up with large stones and cemented together in such a manner as nearly to crush all hope of escape. The work, however, was bravely performed, and life and liberty were stimulated exertion. With her poniard she raved the earth and sods—with her hands, accustomed to such labour, she removed several stones, and advanced in her task so far as to obtain a glimmer of light, and what was scarce less precious, a supply of purer air. But, at the same time, it was her misfortune to ascertain, that, from the massiveness of a huge stone which closed the aperture of the passage, there was no hope that the accumulated strength could effect her extrication. Her condition was improved by the admission of light, as well as by the opportunity afforded her to look out for assistance.

Voices, indeed, were for some time uttered in the field had probably been left to the dead and buried; for low and indistinct groans were the only sounds which she received for several minutes.

As she repeated her exclamation, a voice, that of one just awakened from a swoon, answered these words in answer;—"Edris of the house, dost thou call from thy tomb to the living?—He who just hastens to his own?—Are the boundaries down which connect me with the living?—I already hear, with fleshly ears, the faint whispering accents of the dead?"

"No spirit who speaks," replied Eveline, over-riding she could at least communicate her existence to a living person—"no spirit, but a most unhappy maiden, Eveline Berenger by name, immured beneath this dark vault, and in danger to perish horribly, unless God send me rescue!"

"Eveline Berenger!" exclaimed he whom she addressed, in the accents of wonder. "It is impossible!—I watched her green mantle—I watched her plumed bonnet as I saw her hurried from the field, and felt my own inability to follow to the rescue; nor did I find force or exertion altogether leave me till the waving of the robe and the dancing of the feathers were lost to my eyes, and all hope of rescuing her abandoned my heart."

"Faithful vassal, or right true friend, or courteous stranger, whichever I may name thee," answered Eveline, "know thou hast been abused by the artifices of these Welsh banditti—the mantle and head-gear of Eveline Berenger they have indeed with them, and may have used them to mislead those true friends, who, like thee, are anxious for my fate. Wherefore, brave sir, devise some succour, if thou canst, for thyself and me; since I dread that these ruffians, when they shall have escaped immediate pursuit, will return hither, like the robber to the hoard where he has deposited his stolen booty."

"Now, the Holy Virgin be praised," said the wounded man, "that I can spend the last breath of my life in thy just and honourable service! I would not before blow my bugle, lest I recalled from the pursuit to the aid of my worthless self some of those who might be effectually engaged in thy rescue; may Heaven grant that the recall may now be heard; that my eyes may yet see the Lady Eveline in safety and liberty!"

The words, though spoken in a feeble tone, breathed a spirit of enthusiasm, and were followed by the blast of a horn, faintly winded, to which no answer was made save the echoing of the dell. A sharper and louder blast was then sent forth, but sunk so suddenly, that it seemed the breath of him who sounded the instrument had failed in the effort.—A strange thought crossed Eveline's mind even in that moment of uncertainty and terror. "That," she said, "was the note of a De Lacy—surely you cannot be my gentle kinsman, Sir Damian!"

"I am that unhappy wretch, deserving of death for the evil care which I have taken of the treasure intrusted to me.—What was my business to trust to reports and messengers? I should have worshipped the saint who was committed to my keeping, with such vigilance as avarice bestows on the dross which he calls treasure—I should have rested nowhere, save at your gate; outwatched the brightest stars in the horizon; unseen and unknown myself, I should never have parted from your neighbourhood; then had you not been in the present danger, and—much less important consequence—thou, Damian de Lacy, had not filled the grave of a forsworn and negligent cavalier!"

"Alas! noble Damian," said Eveline, "break not my heart by blaming yourself for an imprudence which is altogether my own. Thy succour was ever near when I intimated the least want of it; and it embitters my own misfortune to know that my rashness has been the cause of your disaster. Answer me, gentle kinsman, and give me to hope that the wounds you have suffered are such as may be cured.—Alas! how much of your blood have I seen spilled, and what a fate is mine, that I should ever bring distress on all for whom I would most willingly sacrifice my own happiness!—But do not let us embitter the moments given us in mercy, by fruitless repinings.—Try what you can to stop thine ebbing blood, which is so dear to England—to Eveline—and to thine uncle!"

Damian groaned as she spoke, and was silent; while, maddened with the idea that he might be perishing for want of aid, Eveline repeated her efforts to extricate herself for her kinsman's assistance, as well as her own. It was all in vain, and she had ceased the attempt in despair; and passing from one hideous subject of terror to another, she sat listening with sharpened ear, for the dying groan of Damian, when—feeling of ecstasy!—the ground was shaken with horses' feet advancing rapidly. Yet this joyful sound, if denotive of life, did not secure her of liberty—it might be the banding of the mountains returning to seek their captive. Even that they would surely allow her leave to look upon and band up the wounds of Damian de Lacy, far to keep him as a captive might ventage them more in many degrees, than could his death. A horseman came up. Eveline invoked his assistance, and the first word she heard was an exclamation in Flemish from the faithful Wilkin Flemmoch, which nothing save some spectacle of the most unusual kind was ever known to compel from this phlegmatic person.

His presence, indeed, was particularly useful on this occasion, for being informed by the Lady Eveline in what condition she was placed, and employed at the same time to look to the situation of Sir Damian de Lacy, he began, with admirable composure and some skill, to stop the wounds of the one, while his attendants collected horses, left by the Welsh as they retreated, and were soon ready to attempt the liberation of Eveline. With much caution, and under the experienced direction of Flemmoch, the stone was at length so much raised, that the Lady Eveline was visible, to the delight of all, and especially of the faithful Ruz, who, regardless of the risk of personal harm, flung around her mistress's place of confinement, like a bird cubbed of her nestlings around the cage in which the trusty archer has imprisoned them. Precaution was necessary to remove the stone, lest falling inwards it might do the lady injury.

At length the rusty fragment was so much displaced that she could arise forth, while her people, as in hatred of the coercion which she had sustained, ceased not to hew, with bar and lever till, totally destroying the balance of the heavy mass, it tumbled over from the little flat on which it had been placed at the mouth of the subterranean entrance, and acquiring force as it revolved down a steep declivity, was at length put into rapid motion, and rolled crashed, and thundered down the hill, amid flashes of fire which it forced from the rocks, and clouds of smoke and dust, until it alighted in the channel of a brook, where it broke into several massive fragments, with a noise that might have been heard some miles off.

With garments rent and soiled through the violence she had sustained; with dishevelled hair and disordered dress, faint from the stifling effect of her confinement, and exhausted by the efforts she had made to relieve herself, Eveline did not, nevertheless, waste a single minute in considering her own condition; but with the eagerness of a sister hastening to the assistance of an only brother, betook herself to examine the several severe wounds of Damian de Lacy, and to use proper means to staunch the blood and recall him from his swoon. We have said elsewhere, that, like other ladies of the time, Eveline was not altogether unacquainted with the surgery, and she now displayed a greater share of knowledge than she had been thought capable of exerting. There was precision, firmness, and tenderness, in every direction which she gave, and the softness of the female sex; with their officious humanity, ever ready to assist in alleviating human misery, seemed in her enhanced, and rendered dignified, by the energy of a strong and powerful understanding. After hearing with wonder for a minute or two the prudent and ready witted directions of her mistress, Ruz assumed at once to recollect that the patient should not be left to the exclusive care of the Lady Eveline, and joining, therefore, in the work, she rendered what assistance she could, while the attendants were employed in forming a litter, on which the wounded knight was to be conveyed to the castle of the Garde Doctourum.

CHAPTER XXV.

A merry play, to end, to days of care,
But something else it gave—the place is rare.

WILKIN FLEMMOCH.

The place on which the skirmish had occurred, and the deliverance of the Lady Eveline had been effected.

was a wild and singular spot, being a small level place, forming a sort of stage, or running-play, between two very rough paths, one of which ended up the rivulet from below, and another continued to ascend above. Being surrounded by hills and such it was a celebrated spot for finding game, and a few days a Welsh prince, renowned for his martial impetuosity, his love of war, and of the chase, had erected a forest lodge, where he used to hunt his friends and followers with a profusion unexampled in Cambria.

The fancy of the lords, always captured by magnificence, and having no objection to display their species of profusion practised by the prince, gave him the surname of Edra of the Castle, and celebrated him in those tales in terms as high as the which cast the heroes of the famous Mistral tale. The subject of their praise, however, felt fully a victim to his propensities, having been caught while hunting in one of those scenes of confusion and dissipation which were frequently the consequence of his nocturnal banquets. Shocked at this catastrophe, the assembled Bretons interrupted the rules of the Hunt on the place where he had died, within the same vault where Eveline had been confined, and being harrowed the entrance of the apartment with heaps of rock, heaped over it an immense mass of stone, on the summit of which they put a sentence to death. Superstition guarded the spot, and for many a year this memorial of Edra remained unvisited, although the lodge had gone to ruin, and its vestiges had totally decayed.

In later years, some prowling band of Welsh robbers had discovered the secret entrance, and used it with the view of ransacking the tomb for useful treasures, which were in ancient times often buried with the dead. These marauders were disappointed and obtained nothing by the violence of the grave. Edra, excepting the knowledge of a secret path which might be used for depositing their loot, even as a place of retreat for one of their number in case of emergency.

When the followers of Damian, however, had explored their part of the history of the spot, Wilkin Flemmoch, it appeared that he had ordered them to have a flock of sheep, and a considerable body to act as their watchmen, and a party of diligent persons, who, if a robber had entered his mind, and finding it a work of small hands, employed themselves in the night, having more than one watchman, and the Marches of the English monarch in the neighbourhood of the Garde Doctourum.

This was an occupation so ordinary for his day, that it excited no particular notice. These measures were vigorously undertaken by the warlike marcher, in the pursuit of intimidating the Welsh, and more especially the bands of outlaws, who independent of any regular government, infested the wild frontier. Yet it escaped not comment, and in undertaking such service at this moment, Damian seemed to abandon that of dispersing the outlaws, which had been considered as the chief object of his day.

It was about noon, when, falling on, as good fortune would have it, with one of the fugitive knights, Damian and his immediate attendants received information of the violence committed on the late Eveline, and, by their perfect knowledge of the country, were able to intercept the ruffians at the Ford Edra, as it was called, by which the Welsh warriors rarely returned to their strongholds in the evening, by probable that the banditti were not aware of the force which Damian headed in person, and at the same time knew that there would be an ambush and hot pursuit in their rear, and these circumstances led their leader to adopt the singular expedient of hiding Eveline in the tomb, while one of the men, dressed in her clothes, might serve as a decoy to deceive their attendants, and lead them to the spot where she was really concealed, so that there was no doubt the purpose of the banditti to kill when they had eluded their pursuers.

Accordingly, the robbers had already drawn up fore the tomb for the purpose of regularly retreating, until they should find some suitable place either for making a stand, or where, if overmatched, they might, by abandoning their horses and dispersing among the rocks, evade the attack of the Norman cavalry. Their plan had been defeated by the precipitation of Damian, who, beholding as he thought the plumes and mantle of the Lady Eveline in the rear of their party, charged them without considering either the odds of numbers, or the lightness of his own armour, which, consisting only of a headpiece and a buff surcoat, offered but imperfect resistance to the Welsh knives and glaives. He was accordingly wounded severely at the onset, and would have been slain, but for the exertions of his few followers, and the fears of the Welsh, that, while thus continuing the battle in front, they might be assaulted in the rear by the followers of Eveline, whom they must now suppose were all in arms and motion. They retreated, therefore, or rather fled, and the attendants of Damian were despatched after them by their fallen master, with directions to let no consideration induce them to leave off the chase, until the captive Lady of the Garde Doloureuse was delivered from her ravishers.

The outlaws, secure in their knowledge of the paths, and the activity of their small Welsh horses, made an orderly retreat, with the exception of two or three of their rearguard, cut down by Damian in his furious onset. They shot arrows, from time to time, at the men-at-arms, and laughed at the ineffectual efforts which these heavy-armed warriors, with their barbed horses, made to overtake them. But the scene was changed by the appearance of Wilkin Flammock, on his puissant war-horse, who was beginning to ascend the pass, leading a party consisting both of foot and horse. The fear of being intercepted caused the outlaws to have recourse to their last stratagem, and, abandoning their Welsh bags, they betook themselves to the cliffs, and, by superior activity and dexterity, baffled, generally speaking, the attempts of their pursuers on either and. All of them, however, were not equally fortunate, for two or three fell into the hands of Flammock's party; amongst others, the person upon whom Eveline's clothes had been placed, and who, now, to the great disappointment of those who had attached themselves to his pursuit, proved to be, not the lady whom they were emulous to deliver, but a fair-haired young Welshman, whose wild looks, and incoherent speech, seemed to argue a disturbed imagination. This would not have saved him from immediate death, the usual doom of captives taken in such skirmishes, had not the faint blast of Damian's horn, sounding from above, recalled his own party, and summoned that of Wilkin Flammock to the spot; while, in the confusion and hurry of their obeying the signal, the pity or the contempt of his guards offered the prisoner to escape. They had, indeed, time to learn from him, even had he been disposed to give intelligence, or capable of communicating it. It were well assured that their lady had fallen into an ambuscade, formed by Dawfyd the One-eyed, a reputed freebooter of the period, who had ventured upon this hardy enterprise in the hope of obtaining a large ransom from the captive Eveline, and all, accused at his extreme insolence and audacity, devoted his head and limbs to the eagles and the ravens.

These were the particulars which the followers of Flammock and of Damian learned by comparing notes with each other, on the incidents of the day. As they returned by the Red Pool they were joined by Dame Gillian, who, after many exclamations of joy at the unexpected liberation of her lady, and as many of sorrow at the unexpected disaster of Damian, proceeded to inform the men-at-arms, that the merchant, whose hawks had been the original cause of these adventures, had been taken prisoner by two or three of the Welsh in their retreat, and that she herself and the wounded Raoul would have shared the same fate, but that they had no horse left to mount her upon, and did not consider old Raoul as worth either ransom, or the trouble of killing. One had, indeed, flung a stone at him as he lay on the hillside, but happily, as his dame said, it fell something short of him—"It was but a little fellow who threw it," she said—"there was a big man amongst them—if he had tried, it's like, by our Lady's grace, he had cast it a thought farther." So saying, the dame gathered herself up, and adjusted her dress for again mounting on horseback.

The wounded Damian was placed on a litter, hastily constructed of boughs, and, with the females, was placed in the centre of the little troop, augmented by the rest of the young knight's followers, who began to rejoin his standard. The united body now marched with military order and precaution, and winded through the passes with the attention of men prepared to meet and to repel injury.

CHAPTER XXVI.

What! fair, and young, and faithful too?
A miracle, if this be true.—WALLER.

Rose, by nature one of the most disinterested and affectionate maidens that ever breathed, was the first who, hastily considering the peculiar condition in which her lady was placed, and the marked degree of restraint which had hitherto characterized her intercourse with her youthful guardian, became anxious to know how the wounded knight was to be disposed of; and when she came to Eveline's side for the purpose of asking this important question, her resolution well nigh failed her.

The appearance of Eveline was indeed such as might have made it almost cruelty to intrude upon her any other subject of anxious consideration than those with which her mind had been so lately assailed, and was still occupied. Her countenance was as pale as death could have made it, unless where it was specked with drops of blood; her veil, torn and disordered, was soiled with dust and with gore; her hair, wildly dishevelled, fell in elf-locks on her brow and shoulders, and a single broken and ragged feather, which was all that remained of her head-gear, had been twisted among her tresses and still flowed there, as if in mockery, rather than ornament. Her eyes were fixed on the litter where Damian was deposited, and she rode close beside it, without apparently wasting a thought on any thing, save the danger of him who was extended there.

Rose plainly saw that her lady was under feelings of excitement, which might render it difficult for her to take a wise and prudent view of her own situation. She endeavoured gradually to awaken her to a sense of it. "Dearest lady," said Rose, "will it please you to take my mantle?"

"Torment me not," answered Eveline, with some sharpness in her accent.

"Indeed, my lady," said Dame Gillian, bustling up as one who feared her functions as a mistress of the robes might be interfered with—"indeed, my lady, Rose Flammock speaks truth; and neither your kirtle nor your gown are sitting as they should do; and, to speak truth, they are but barely decent. And so, if Rose will turn herself, and put her horse out of my way," continued the tire-woman, "I will put your dress in better order in the sticking in of a bodkin, than any Fleming of them all could do in twelve hours."

"I care not for my dress," replied Eveline, in the same manner as before.

"Care then for your honour—for your fame," said Rose, riding close to her mistress, and whispering in her ear; "think, and that hastily, how you are to dispose of this wounded young man."

"To the castle," answered Eveline aloud, as if scorning the affectation of secrecy; "lead to the castle, and that straight as you can."

"Why not rather to his own camp, or to Malpas?" said Rose—"dearest lady, believe, it will be for the best."

"Wherefore not—wherefore not?—wherefore not leave him on the wayside at once to the knife of the Welshman, and the teeth of the wolf?—Once—twice—three times has he been my preserver. Where I go, he shall go; nor will I be in safety myself a moment sooner than I know that he is so.

Rose saw that she could make no impression on her mistress, and her own reflection told her that the wounded man's life might be endangered by a longer transportation than was absolutely necessary. An expedient occurred to her, in which she imagined this objection might be obviated, but it was necessary she should consult her father. She struck her palfrey with her riding rod, and in a moment her diminutive, though beautiful figure, and her quitted little pennet, were by the side of the gigantic Fleming and his tall black horse, and riding as it were in their vast shadow. "My dearest father," said Rose, "the lady intends that Sir Damian be transported to the castle, where it is like he may be a long summer; what think you?—is that wholesome counsel?"

"Wholesome for the youth, surely, Roehen," answered the Fleming, "because he will better escape the risk of a fever."

"True; but is it wise for my lady?" continued Rose.

"Wise enough, if she deal wisely. But wherefore shouldst thou doubt her, Roehen?"

"I know not," said Rose, unwilling to breathe even to her father the fears and doubts which she herself entertained; "but where there are evil tongues, there may be evil rehearsing. Sir Damian and my lady are both very young—Methinks it were better, dearest father, would you offer the shelter of your roof to the wounded knight, in the stead of his being carried to the castle."

"That I shall not, wench," answered the Fleming, hastily—"that I shall not, if I may help. Norman shall not cross my quiet threshold, nor Englishman either, to mock my quiet thrift, and consume my substance. Thou dost not know them, because thou art ever with thy lady, and hast her good favour; but I know them well; and the best I can get from them is Lady Flanderin, and Greedy Flanderin, and Plimish nip—I thank the saints they cannot say Coward Flanderin, since Owenwyn's Welsh up-surge."

"I had ever thought, my father," answered Rose, "that your spirit was too calm to regard these base columnars. Bechink you we are under this lady's baner, and that she has been my loving mistress, and her father was your good lord; to the Constable, too, are you beholden, for enlarged privileges. Money may pay debt, but kindness only can requite kindness, and I forebode that you will never have such an opportunity to do kindness to the houses of Berenger and De Lacy, as by opening the doors of your house to this wounded knight."

"The doors of my house?" answered the Fleming—"do I know how long I may call that, or any house upon earth, my own? Alas, my daughter, we came hither to fly from the rage of the elements, but who knows how soon we may perish by the wrath of men?"

"You speak strangely, my father," said Rose; "it holds not with your solid wisdom to anger such general evil from the rash enterprise of a Welsh outlaw."

"I think not of the One-eyed robber," said Wilkin; "although the increase and audacity of such robbers as Dawyd is no good sign of a quiet country. But thou, who livest within yonder walls, hearest but little of what passes without, and your estate is less anxious;—you had known nothing of the news from me, unless in case I had found it necessary to remove to another country."

"To remove, my dearest father, from the land where your thrift and industry have gained you an honourable competency?"

"Ay, and where the hunger of wicked men, who envy me the produce of my thrift, may likely bring me to a dishonourable death. There have been tumults among the English rabble in more than one county, and their wrath is directed against those of our nation, as if we were Jews or heathens, and not better Christians and better men than themselves. They have, at York, Bristol, and elsewhere, sacked the houses of the Flemings, spoiled their goods, misused their families, and murdered themselves.—And what say that we have brought among them the skill of industry which they possessed not, and some wealth, which they would never have had in Britain, was the reward of our art and our labour. But, this evil spirit is spreading wide; and we are more safe than elsewhere, because we are a colony of some numbers and strength. But, not in our neighbours; and hadst not thou been in security, I would long ere this have given up of left Britain."

"Given up all, and left Britain?"—The man sounded prodigious in the ears of his daughter, who knew better than any one how succumb to the had been in his industry, and how to art and his firm and undaunted temper was to stand firm and present advantage for the great and contingent peril. At length she replied, "I am a your peril, my father, methinks I am hard set; but cannot have a better protection than the prowess of this noble knight. Where lives the man who daunt of violence against the house which sheltered Damian de Lacy?"

"I know not that," said the Fleming, a stout composure and steady, but somewhat later. "He has you forgive it me, if it be so; but I am a fool in these Crusades, which the preachers have preached up so successfully. Here has he been absent for nearly three years, and no tidings of his life or death, except a tale. He marched from hence, as if he meant not to die, or sheathe sword until the Holy Sepulchre was won from the Saracens, yet we can hear of no certainty whether even a hairlet has been seen by the Saracens. In the mean while the power we are at home grow discontented, their best and better part of their followers are in Flanders, or alive we scarcely know. The people grow oppressed and flayed by stewards and deputies, and yoke is neither so light nor so light as it was of the actual lord. The commons, who would hate the knights and gentry, think it is time to make some head against them, as our nobles of noble blood who would not care to be so, are, that they may have their share in the foreign expeditions and perfidious taking of many poor; and he that is poor will not work for money. I hate poor people, and I would to God had every man who cannot keep himself by the will of his own hand!"

The Fleming concluded, with this characteristic preparation, a speech which gave Rose a new light view of the state of England, than that which was within the Garde Doloureuse, who had heard of an opportunity of learning. "Surely these violences of which you speak are to be dreaded by those who live under the hand of De Lacy and of Berenger."

"Berenger subsists but in name," answered the Fleming, "and Damian though a very rich hath not his uncle's authority. His men are harassed with the duty of watching by night and day, in itself impracticable, and no more reasoned, and that they lose a great part of their time in this inactive and unprofitable duty. They say that Damian the Heretic was a man that Damian with the monk-like is no more than a woman; and that age, which has darkened his eyes, hath at the same time blighted his reason. And they say more, which were but women's talk."

"Nay, but, let me know what they say; I know it, for Heaven's sake!" answered Rose.

"Even so, Roehen," answered Wilkin. "There are many among the Norman men-at-arms who over their wine cups, how that Damian de Lacy love with his uncle's betrothed bride, or, and they correspond together by art magic."

"By art magic, indeed, it must be," said Rose, smiling scornfully, "for by no earthly means can they correspond, as I, for one, can bear witness."

CHAPTER XXVII.

And longed to see your roses blossom,
I've let my laurels wither.—Old Play

ARRAYED in garments of a mourning colour, and of a fashion more matronly than perhaps altogether befitted her youth—plain to an extremity, and devoid of all ornament, save her rosary—Eveline now performed the duty of waiting upon her wounded deliverer; a duty which the etiquette of the time not only permitted but peremptorily enjoined. She was attended by Rose and Dame Gillian. Margery, whose element was a sick-chamber, had been already despatched to that of the young knight, to attend to whatever his condition might require.

Eveline entered the room with a light step, as if unwilling to disturb the patient. She paused at the door, and cast her eyes around her. It had been her father's chamber; nor had she entered it since his violent death. Around the walls hung a part of his armour and weapons, with hawking-gloves, hunting-poles, and other instruments of silvan sport. These relics brought as it were in living form before her, the stately presence of old Sir Raymond. "Frown not, my father,"—her lips formed the words, though her voice did not utter them—"frown not—Eveline will never be unworthy of thee."

Father Aldrovand, and Amelot, the page of Damian, were seated by the bedside. They rose as Lady Eveline entered; and the first, who meddled a little with the healing art, said to Eveline, "that the knight had slumbered for some time, and was now about to awake."

Amelot at the same time came forward, and in a hasty and low voice, begged that the chamber might be kept quiet, and the spectators requested to retire. "My lord," he said, "ever since his illness at Gloucester, is apt to speak something wildly as he awakes from sleep, and will be displeased with me should I permit any one to be near him."

Eveline accordingly caused her women and the monk to retire into the anteroom, while she herself remained standing by the door-communication which connected the apartments, and heard Damian mention her name as he turned himself painfully on his couch. "Is she safe and unharmed?" was his first question, and it was asked with an eagerness which intimated how far it preceded all other considerations.
—When Amelot replied in the affirmative, he sighed, as one whose bosom is relieved from some weighty load, and, in a less animated voice, asked of the page where they were. "This apartment," he said, "with its furniture, are all strange to me."

"My dear master," said Amelot, "you are at present too weak to ask questions and receive explanations."

"Be I where I will," said Damian, as if recovering his recollection, "I am not in the place where my duty calls me. Tell my trumpets to sound to horse—to horse, and let Ralph Genvil carry my banner. To horse—to horse!—we have not a moment to lose."

The wounded knight made some effort to rise.

which, in his state of weakness, Amiot was easily able to frustrate. "Thou art right," he said, as he sunk back into his reclining posture—"thou art right—I am weak—but why should strength remain when honour is lost?"

The unhappy young man covered his face with his hands, and groined in agony, which seemed more that of the mind than of the body. Lady Eveline approached his bedside with uncovered steps, fearing she knew not what, yet earnest to testify the interest which she felt in the distress of the sufferer. Damian looked up and beheld her, and again hid his face with his hands.

"What means this strange posture, Sir Knight?" said Eveline, with a voice which, at first weak and trembling, gradually obtained steadiness and composure. "Dight it to grieve you so much, sworn as you are to the duties of chivalry, that Heaven hath twice made you its instrument to save the unfortunate Eveline Berenger?"

"O no, no," he exclaimed with repugnance; "once you are saved, all is well—but time presses—it is necessary I should presently depart nowhere ought I now to tarry, least of all, within this castle—Once more, Amiot, let them get to horse!"

"Nay my good lord," said the damsel, "this must not be. As your ward, I cannot let my guardian part thus suddenly—as a physician, I cannot allow my patient to destroy himself—it is impossible that you can brook the saddle."

"A letter—a letter—a cart, to drag forth the dishonoured knight and traitor—all were too good for me—a coffin were best of all!—But see, Amiot, that it be framed like that of the meekest churl—no spurs displayed on the pail—no shield with the ancient coat of the De Lacye—no helmet with their knightly crest must deck the harness of him whose name is dishonoured!"

"Is his brain unsettled?" said Eveline, looking with terror from the wounded man to his attendant. "or is there some dreadful mystery in these broken words?—If so, speak it forth; and if it may be amended by life or goods, my deliverer will sustain no wrong."

Amiot regarded her with a dejected and melancholy eye, shook his head, and looked down on his master with a countenance which seemed to express that the questions which she asked could not be prudently answered in Sir Damian's presence. The Lady Eveline, observing this gesture, stepped back into the outer apartment, and made Amiot a sign to follow her. He obeyed, after a glance at his master, who remained in the same disconsolate posture as formerly, with his hands crossed over his eyes, like one who wished to exclude the light, and all which the light made visible.

When Amiot was in the wardrobe, Eveline, seeking signs to her attendants to keep at such distance as the room permitted, questioned him closely on the cause of his master's desperate expression of sorrow and remorse. "Thou knowest," she said, "that I am bound to succour thy lord, if I may, both from gratitude, as one whom he hath served to the peril of his life—and also from kinship. Tell me, therefore, in what case he stands, that I may help him if I can—that is," she added, her pale cheeks deeply colouring, "if the cause of his distress be fitting for me to hear."

The page bowed low, yet showed such embarrassment when he began to speak, as produced a corresponding degree of confusion in the Lady Eveline, who, nevertheless, urged him as before "to speak without scruple or delay—so that the terror of his disclosure was fitting for her ears."

"Believe me, noble lady," said Amiot, "your commands had been instantly obeyed, but that I fear my master's displeasure if I talk of his affairs without his warrant, nevertheless, on your command, whom I know he honours above all earthly beings, I will speak thus far, that, if his life be safe from the wounds he has received, his honour and worship may be in great danger if it please not Heaven to send a remedy."

"Speak on," said Eveline; "and be assured you will do Sir Damian de Lacy no prejudice by the confidence you may rest in me."

"I well believe it, lady," said the page. "I am sure, if it be not already known to you, that the knights and rabble, who have taken our camp, nobles in the west, pretend to be favoured by our extraction, not only by Randal Lacy, but by our lord, Sir Damian."

"They in that dare charge him with an injury to his own blood, as well as to his name," replied Eveline.

"Well do I believe they do," said Amiot. "Is thislanders not their falsehoods from being told by those who know him less cowardly?—Is he not one runaway from our troop have joined the enemy, and that gives some credit to the words?—then they say—they say—that in short, the master longs to possess the lands in his power, and he occupies as his uncle's administrator, until the old Constable—I crave your pardon, should return from Palestine, he should be able to obtain possession of his own again."

"The wretched wretches judge of others by their own minds, and conceive those suspicions dangerous for men of worth, which they on themselves conscious they would be unable to sustain. Is it the insurgents then so innocent and so peaceful?—I have heard of their violence, but only as if it had been some popular tumult."

"We had notice last night that they had met together in great force, and hanged a knight, Wild Wenlock, with his men at arms, about ten miles hence. He hath sent to my master as his kinsman and companion-at-arms, to seek his assistance. We were on horseback the next to march to the rescue—when?"

He paused, and seemed unwilling to proceed. He had caught at the word. "When ye heard of danger?" she said. "I would ye had rather told my death?"

"Surely, noble lady," said the page, with his eyes fixed on the ground, "nothing but an accident could have made my master fight his man, and yet the better part of them to the Welsh mountains, his countryman's distress, and the command of the King's Lieutenant, so peremptorily demand his presence elsewhere."

"I knew it," she said—"I knew I was near his destruction! yet methinks this is a vision dreamed of, when the worst was in my thoughts. I feared to accustom his death, not his loss of his. For God's sake, young Amiot, do what thou wilt, and that without loss of time! Get thee away to horse, and join to thy own master, as thou canst gather of mine—Go—oh, or thy youth—show thy master's banner, and let him see that his forces and his heart are with thee, that his person be absent. Haste, haste, for the last process!"

"But the safety of this castle—But the safety?" said the page. "God knows how much I would do ought to save his name! But I have my master's word, and were you to suffer by so long the Garde Doloureuse, even although I were to lose him lands, life, and honour, by my doing, I should be more like to taste of his danger than of insult or bounty."

"Oh, nevertheless, dear Amiot," said the page, "what force thou canst make, and begone."

"You owe a willing horse, madam," said the page, springing to his feet, "and in the room of my master, I see nothing better than that he should be displayed against their chiefs."

"To arms, then," said Eveline, hardly "and win thy spurs. Bring me news of my master's honour is safe, and I will myself back on thy heels. Here—take this blessed cross—put it on thy crest, and be the thought of the Virgin of Garde Doloureuse, that never failed a warrior with thee in the hour of conflict."

She had scarcely ended, ere Amiot flew to his armour, and summoning together such men as he could assemble, both of his master's, and of those belonging to the castle, there were soon fifty armed mounted in the court-yard.

But although the page was thus for ready

When the soldiers heard they were to go forth on a dangerous expedition, with no more experienced leader than a youth of fifteen, they showed a decided reluctance to move from the castle. The old soldiers

Lacy said, Damian himself was almost too young to command them, and had no right to delegate authority to a mere boy; while the followers Berenger said, their mistress might be satisfied with her deliverance of the morning, without trying to draw dangerous conclusions by diminishing the strength of her castle—"The times," they said, "were hard, and it was wisest to keep a stone roof over our heads."

When more the soldiers communicated their ideas and apprehensions to each other, the stronger their determination to the undertaking became; and when the page, who, page-like, had gone to see that his own horse was accoutred and brought forth, returned to the stable-yard, he found them standing confusedly together, some mounted, some on foot, all men speaking loud, and all in a state of disorder. Ralph Genvil, a man whose face was seamed with many a wound and who had long followed the trade of a soldier, stood apart from the rest, holding his sword in one hand, and in the other the banner, around which the banner of De Lacy was wound.

"What means this, Genvil?" said the page, angrily. "do you not mount your horse and display the banner? and what occasions all this confusion?"

"Truly, Sir Page," said Genvil, composedly, "I am on my saddle, because I have some regard for this old rag, which I have borne to honour in my hand and I will not willingly carry it where men are unwilling to follow and defend it."

"No march—no sally—no lifting of banner to-day!" said the soldiers, by way of burden to the banner-discourse.

"Now now, cowards? do you mutiny?" said Amelot, waving his hand on his sword.

"Nay, not me, Sir Boy," said Genvil; "nor will I use your sword my way. I tell thee, Amelot, were I to cross with yours, never flail sent me more chaff than I would make splinters of the polished and gilded toasting-iron. Look you, these gray-bearded men here that care not to be put out on any boy's humour. For me, I stand upon that; and I care not whether one boy or another commands me. But I am the Lacy's man this time; and I am not sure that, in marching to the relief of this Wild Wenlock, we shall do an errand on which my lady will thank us for. Why led he us not thither this morning, when we were commanded off into the mountains?"

"You well know the cause," said the page. "We do know the cause; or, if we do not, I guess it," answered the banner-man, with a laugh, which was echoed by several of his comrades.

"I will cram the calumny down thy false throat," said the page; and, drawing his sword, he rushed himself headlong on the banner-man, without regarding their great difference of strength.

Genvil was contended to foil his attack by one, and, by a slight movement of his gigantic arm, he forced the page aside, parrying, at the same time, his blow with the standard-spear.

There was another loud laugh, and Amelot, feeling his efforts baffled, threw his sword from him, and, rising in pride and indignation, hastened back to Lady Eveline of his bad success. "All," he said, "is lost—the cowardly villains have mutinied, and will not move; and the blame of their sloth and disobedience will be laid on my dear master!"

"That shall never be," said Eveline, "should I die for it.—Follow me, Amelot."

She hastily threw a scarlet scarf over her dark garment and hastened down to the court-yard, followed by the men, assuming, as she went, various attitudes and expressions, expressing astonishment and pity, and by carefully suppressing all appearance of the feelings which she really entertained.

She then entered the castle-court, with the kindling and glowing brow which her ancestors were wont to bear in danger and extremity, when their soul was arming to meet the storm, and displayed in their mien and looks high command and contempt of danger. She seemed at the moment taller than her usual size; and it was with a voice distinct and clearly heard, though not exceeding the delicacy of feminine tone, that the mutineers heard her address them. "How is this, my masters?" she said; and as she spoke, the bulky forms of the armed soldiers seemed to draw closer together, as if to escape her individual censure. It was like a group of heavy water-fowl, when they close to avoid the stoop of the slight and beautiful merlin, dreading the superiority of its nature and breeding over their own inert physical strength—"How now?" again she demanded of them; "is it a time, think ye, to mutiny, when your lord is absent, and his nephew and lieutenant lies stretched on a bed of sickness?—Is it thus you keep your oaths?—Thus ye merit your leader's bounty?—Shame on ye, craven hounds, that quail and give back the instant you lose sight of the huntsman!"

There was a pause—the soldiers looked on each other, and then again on Eveline, as if ashamed alike to hold out in their mutiny, or to return to their usual discipline.

"I see how it is, my brave friends—ye lack a leader here; but stay not for that—I will guide you myself, and, woman as I am, there need not a man of you fear disgrace where a Berenger commands.—Trap my palfrey with a steel saddle, she said, "and that instantly." She snatched from the ground the page's light headpiece, and threw it over her hair, caught up his drawn sword, and went on. "Here I promise you my countenance and guidance—this gentleman," she pointed to Genvil, "shall supply my lack of military skill. He looks like a man that hath seen many a day of battle, and can well teach a young leader her devoir."

"Certes," said the old soldier, smiling in spite of himself, and shaking his head at the same time, "many a battle have I seen, but never under such a commander."

"Nevertheless," said Eveline, seeing how the eyes of the rest turned on Genvil, "you do not—cannot—will not—refuse to follow me? You do not as a soldier, for my weak voice supplies your captain's orders—you cannot as a gentleman, for a lady, a forlorn and distressed female, asks you a boon—you will not as an Englishman, for your country, your sword, and your comrades are in danger. Unfurl your banner, then, and march."

"I would do so, upon my soul, fair lady," answered Genvil, as if preparing to unfold the banner—"And Amelot might lead us well enough, with advantage of some lessons from me. But I wot not whether you are sending us on the right road."

"Surely, surely," said Eveline, earnestly, "it must be the right road which conducts you to the relief of Wenlock and his followers, besieged by the insurgent boars."

"I know not," said Genvil, still hesitating. "Our leader here, said Damian de Lacy, protects the commons—men say he befriends them—and I know he quarrelled with Wild Wenlock once for some petty wrong he did to the miller's wife at Twyford. We should be finely off, when our fiery young leader is on foot again, if he should find we had been fighting against the side he favoured."

"Assure yourself," said the maiden, anxiously, "the more he would protect the commons against oppression, the more he would put them down when oppressing others. Mount and ride—save Wenlock and his men—there is life and death in every moment. I will warrant, with my life and lands, that whatsoever you do will be held good service to De Lacy. Come, then, follow me."

"None surely can know sir Damian's purpose better than you, fair damsel," answered Genvil; "nay, for that matter, you can make him change as ye list—And so I will march with the men, and we will aid Wenlock, if it is yet time, as I trust it may; for he is a rugged wolf, and when he turns to bay, will cost the boars blood enough ere they sound a mort. But do you remain within the castle, fair lady, and trust to Amiot and me.—Come, Sir Page, assume the command, more so it must be, though, by my faith, it is my to take the head-piece from that pretty head, and the sword from that pretty hand—By Saint George! to see them there is a credit to the soldier's profession."

The lady accordingly surrendered the weapons to Amiot, exhorting him in few words to forget the offence he had received, and do his duty manfully. Mean while Gervil slowly untold the page—then shook a sword and without putting his feet in the stirrup, added himself a battle with rearing on the spear, and threw himself into the saddle, heavily armed as he was. "We are ready now as it like your juvenility," said he to Amiot, and then while the page was putting the head into order he whispered to his nearest comrade, "Methinks, instead of this old swallow's tail, we should muster roundly under a brodered petticoat; a furbelowed petticoat has no fellow in my mind. Look you, Stephen Pontoye, I can forgive Damian now for forgetting his uncle and his own credit, about this war; but by my faith, she is one I could have doated to death upon for amours. Ah! evil luck be the woman's portion!—they govern us at every turn, Stephen, and at every age. When they are young, they bring us with fair looks and sugared words, sweet kisses and love tokens, and when they are of middle age, they work us to their will by presents and courtship, red wine and red gold; and when they are old, we are fain to run their errands to get out of sight of their old leathern vantages. Well, old De Lacy should have staid at home and watched his falcon. But it is all one to us, Stephen, and we may make some vengeance to-day, for these hares have plundered more than one eagle."

"Ay, ay," answered Pontoye, "the heart to the beauty, and the banner-man to the boor, a right pithy proverb. But prithus, canst thou say why his page-ship leads us not forward yet?"

"Pshaw!" answered Gervil, "the shake I gave him has added his brains; or perchance he has now swallowed all his years yet, so that it is not, for 'tis a forward cockeril for his years, wherever honour is to be won. Now, they now begin to move. Well, it is a singular thing this gentle blood, Stephen, for here is a child whom I but now baffled like a schoolboy must lead us gray-headed where we may get our heads broken, and that at the command of a light lady."

"I warrant Sir Damian is secretary to my pretty lady," answered Stephen Pontoye, "as the springing Amiot is to Sir Damian, and so we poor men must obey and keep our mouths shut."

"But our eyes open, Stephen Pontoye—forget not that."

They were by this time out of the gates of the castle, and upon the road leading to the village, in which, as they understood by the intelligence of the morning, Wenlock was besieged or blockaded by a greatly superior number of the insurgent commons. Amiot rode at the head of the troop, still embarrassed by the affront which he had received in presence of the soldiers, and lost in meditating how he was to make out that deficiency of experience, which on former occasions had been supplied by the counsels of the banner men, with whom he was ashamed to seek a recommendation. But Gervil was not of a nature absolutely silent, though a habitual grumbler. He rode up to the page, and having made his observance, respectfully asked him whether it were not well that some one or two of their number picked forward upon good horses to learn how it stood with Wenlock, and whether they should be able to come up in time to his assistance.

"Methinks, banner-man," answered Amiot, "you should take the ruling of the troop, since you have so fittingly what should be done. You may be the fitter to command, through—But I will not upbraid you."

"The process of a bright war, is shape a long streamer and break the country's tail; the banner of a banner-man is green, and eye turned out the other by cutting the ends from the streamer. It was thus the company was performed on the banner of John Chichester, by the Black Prince, before the battle of Poitiers."

"Because I know no ill how to shape," said Gervil, "that is what you would say; and by my faith, I cannot deny but there may be some such a. But is it not possible to them to let a fair expedient be unwisely conducted, because of a foolish way or madman action? Come, let it be passed with us."

"With all my heart," answered Amiot; "and I will send out an advanced party upon the advance, as thou hast advised me."

"Let it be old Stephen Pontoye and two of the Chamber square, he is as wily as an old fox, and neither hope nor fear will draw him a hair's breadth further than judgment warrants."

Amiot eagerly embraced the hint, and in command, Pontoye and two lances dashed forward to reconnoitre the road before them, and inquire the readiness of those whom they were advancing to encounter. And now that we are on the old road, Sir Page, and the banner-man, "all we, if we cannot, doth not wonder fair lady love our banner-bright per amours?"

"It is a false calumny," said Amiot, indignantly, "bestowed as she is to his uncle, I am convinced she would rather do than have such a thought, and would our master I have noted this barren tale as she before now Gervil, and I have prayed thee to check it. You know the thing cannot be, for we know they have sworn ever true."

"How should I know that?" said Gervil, "or the other? Watch them ever so close—much water does pass the mill that Hob Miller never sees of. They do correspond; that, at least, thou canst not deny?"

"I do deny it," said Amiot, "as I deny all he can touch their honour."

"Then how in Heaven's name, comes he by such perfect knowledge of her motions, as he has displayed so long since than the morning?"

"How should I tell?" answered the page, "but be such things, surely as saints and good angels, and if there be one on earth deserves their protection, it is Dame Evelyn Berenger."

"Well, our Master Courant-le-quar," replied Gervil, laughing, "but they will hardly pass us as old women. Saints and angels, quotha! time and tide waits, I warrant you."

The page was about to continue his angry relation, when Stephen Pontoye and his fellows returned upon the spur. "Wenlock holds us bravely," he exclaimed, "though he is left good with them bores. The larger creatures are doing good service, and I little doubt his making us the good all we come up, if it please you to retort sharply. They have assailed the haven of our camp up to them even now, but were driven back with small success."

The party were now put in as rapid motion as might consist with order, and soon reached the top of a small eminence, beneath which lay the village where Wenlock was making his defence. The air rang with the cries and shouts of the insurgents who, numerous as here, and possessed of that desperate spirit of courage so peculiar to the English, sought the ante to the battlements, and endeavored to beat down the palisades, or to climb over them, in spite of the showers of stones and arrows from within, which they suffered great loss, as well as by the swords and battle-axes of the men-at-arms, who ever they came to hand-blows.

"We are in time, we are in time," said Amiot, dropping the reins of his bridle, and joyfully clapping his hands, "shake thy banner abroad, Gervil! Give Wenlock and his fellows a fair view of a-Comrades, halt—breathe your horses for a moment—Mark! (Gervil) If we demand by your hand path way into the meadow where the cattle are!"

"Drive, my young falcon!" replied Gervil, "the love of battle, like that of the war-horse of his, banded at the sight of the square, and at the cry of the trumpet; we shall have them as any for a charge on yonder heaven."

"What a thick black cloud the village is!" said Amiot; "but we will let daylight through it with our lances—Now, Gervil, the defender has signal to show they have seen us."

"A signal to us!" exclaimed Genvil. "By Heaven, it is a white flag—a signal of surrender!"

"Surrender! they cannot dream of it, when we are advancing to their succour," replied Amelot; when two or three melancholy notes from the trumpets of the besieged, with a thundering and tumultuous proclamation from the besiegers, rendered the fact indisputable.

"Down goes Wenlock's pennon," said Genvil, "and the chiefs enter the barricades on all points.—There has been cowardice or treachery—What is to be done?"

"Advance on them," said Amelot, "retake the place and deliver the prisoners."

"Advance, indeed!" answered the banner-man—"Not a horse's length by my counsel—we should have every nail in our corselets counted with arrow-shot, before we got down the hill in the face of such a multitude; and the place to storm afterwards—it were mere insanity."

"Yet come a little forward along with me," said the page; "perhaps we may find some path in which we could descend unperceived."

Accordingly they rode forward a little way to reconnoitre the face of the hill, the page still urging the possibility of descending it unperceived and the conclusion, when Genvil answered impatiently, "Unperceived!—you are already perceived—here comes a fellow, picking towards us as fast as his beast may trot."

As he spoke, the rider came up to them. He was a short, thick-set peasant, in an ordinary frock jacket and hose, with a blue cap on his head, which he had been scarcely able to pull over a shaggy head of red hair, that aimed in arms to repel the covering. The man's hands were bloody, and he carried at his saddlebow a linen bag, which was also stained with blood. "Ye be of Damian de Lacy's company, be ye not?" said this rude messenger; and, when they answered in the affirmative, he proceeded with the same blunt courtesy, "Hub Miller of Twyford commends him to Damian de Lacy, and, knowing his purpose to amend disorders in the commonwealth, Hub Miller sends him toll of the grist which he hath grinded; and with that he took from the bag a human head, and tendered it to Amelot."

"It is Wenlock's head," said Genvil—"how his eyes stare!"

"They will stare after no more wenchies now," said the boy—"I have cured him of catwauling."

"Thou!" said Amelot, stepping back in disgust and indignation.

"Yes, I myself," replied the peasant; "I am Grand Justiciary of the Commons, for lack of a better."

"Grand hangman, thou wouldst say," replied Genvil.

"Call it what thou list," replied the peasant. "Truly, it behoves men in state to give good example. I'll bid no man do that I am not ready to do myself. It is no easy to hang a man, as to say hang him; we will have no splitting of offices in this new world, which is happily set up in old England."

"Wretch!" said Amelot, "take back thy bloody token to them that sent thee! Hadst thou not come upon assurance, I had pinned thee to the earth with my lance—But, be assured, your cruelty shall be fearfully avenged—Come, Genvil, let us to our men, there is no farther use in abiding here."

The fellow, who had expected a very different reception, stood staring after them for a few moments, then replaced his bloody trophy in the wallet, and rode back to them who sent him.

"This comes of meddling with men's amours," said Genvil; "Sir Damian would needs brawl with Wenlock about his daughter with this miller's daughter, and you see they account him a favourer of their enterprises; it will be well if others do not take up the same opinion—I wish we were rid of the trouble which such suspicions may bring upon us—ay, were it at the price of my best horse—I am like to lose him at any rate with the day's hard service, and I would it were the worst it is to cost us."

The party returned, wearied and discomfited, to the castle of the Garde Doloureuse, and not without losing several of their number by the way, some straggling owing to the weariness of their horses, and others taking the opportunity of desertion, in order to join with the bands of insurgents and plunderers, who had now gathered together in different quarters, and were augmented by recruits from the absolute soldiery.

Amelot, on his return to the castle, found that the state of his master was still very precarious, and that the Lady Eveline, though much exhausted, had not yet retired to rest, but was awaiting his return with impatience. He was introduced to her accordingly, and, with a heavy heart, mentioned the unsuccessful event of his expedition.

"Now the saints have pay upon us!" said the Lady Eveline; "for it seems as if a plague or pest attached to me, and extended itself to all who interest themselves in my welfare. From the moment they do so, their very virtues become maras to them; and what would, in every other case, recommend them to honour, is turned to destruction to the friends of Eveline Berenger."

"Fear not, fair lady," said Amelot; "there are still men enough in my master's camp to put down these disturbers of the public peace. I will but abide to receive his instructions, and will hence to-morrow, and draw out a force to restore quiet in this part of the country."

"Alas! you know not yet the worst of it," replied Eveline. "Since you went hence, we have received certain notice, that when the soldiers at Sir Damian's camp heard of the accident which he this morning met with, already discontented with the inactive life which they had of late led, and dispirited by the hurts and reported death of their leader, they have altogether broken up and dispersed their force.—Yet be of good courage, Amelot," she said; "this house is strong enough to bear out a worse tempest than any that is likely to be poured on it; and if all men desert your master in wounds and affliction, it becomes yet more the part of Eveline Berenger to abate and protect her deliverer."

CHAPTER XXVIII.

Let our proud trumpet shake their castle wall,
Hounding death and ruin—OWAY

THE evil news with which the last chapter concluded were necessarily told to Damian de Lacy, as the person whom they chiefly concerned; and Lady Eveline herself undertook the task of communicating them, mingling what she said with tears, and again interrupting those tears to suggest topics of hope and comfort, which carried no consolation to her own bosom.

The wounded knight continued with his face turned towards her, listening to the disastrous tidings, as one who was no otherwise affected by them, than as they regarded her who told the story. When she had done speaking, he continued as in a reverie, with his eyes so intently fixed upon her, that she rose up, with the purpose of withdrawing from looks by which she felt herself embarrassed. He hastened to speak, that he might prevent her departure. "All that you have said, fair lady," he replied, "had been enough, if told by another, to have broken my heart; for it tells me that the power and honour of my house, so solemnly committed to my charge, have been blasted in my misfortune. But when I look upon you, and hear your voice, I forget every thing, saving that you have been rescued, and are here in honour and safety. Let me therefore pray of your goodness that I may be removed from the castle which holds you, and sent elsewhere. I am in no shape worthy of your further care, since I have no longer the swords of others at my disposal, and am totally unable for the present to draw my own."

"And if you are generous enough to think of me in your own misfortune, noble knight," answered Eveline, "can you suppose that I forget wherefore, and in whose rescue, these wounds were incurred? No, Damian, speak not of removal!—while there is a turret of the Garde Delcourtoise standing, within that turret shall you find shelter and protection. Such, I am well assured, would be the pleasure of your uncle, were he here in person."

It seemed as if a sudden pang of his wound had smitten upon Damien; for, repeating the words "My uncle!" he writhed himself round, and averted his face from Eveline, then again composing himself, replied, "Alas! knew my uncle how ill I have obeyed his precepts, instead of sheltering me within this house, he would command me to be flung from the battlements!"

"Fear not his displeasure," said Eveline, again preparing to withdraw; "but endeavour, by the compass of your spirit, to aid the healing of your wounds, when, I doubt not, you will be able again to establish good order in the Constable's jurisdiction, long before his return."

She coloured as she pronounced the last words, and hastily left the apartment. When she was in her own chamber, she dismissed her other attendants, and retained Rose. "What dost thou think of those things, my wise maiden and mistress?" said she.

"I would," replied Rose, "either that this young knight had never entered this castle—or, that being here, he could presently leave it—or, that he could honourably remain here for ever."

"What dost thou mean by remaining here for ever?" said Eveline, sharply and hastily.

"Let me answer that question with another—How long has the Constable of Chester been absent from England?"

"Three years come Saint Clement's day," said Eveline; "and what of that?"

"Nay, nothing; but"—

"But what?—I command you to speak out."

"A few weeks will place your hand at your own disposal."

"And think you, Rose," said Eveline, rising with dignity, "that there are no bonds given those which are drawn by the sword's pen?—We know little of the Constable's adventures, but we know enough to show that his warring hopes have fallen, and his sword and courage proved too weak to change the fortunes of the Sultan Saladin. Suppose him returning some brief time hence, as we have seen so many crusaders regain their homes, poor and broken in health—suppose that he finds his lands laid waste, and his followers dispersed, by the consequences of these late misfortunes, how would it sound should he also find that his betrothed bride had wedded and endowed with her substance the nephew whom he most treasured?—Dost thou think such an engagement as like a Lombard's mortgage, which must be redeemed on the very day, else forfeiture is sure to be awarded?"

"I cannot tell, madam," replied Rose; "but they that keep their covenant to the letter, are, in my country, held bound to no more."

"That is a Flemish fashion, Rose," said her mistress; "but the honour of a Norman is not satisfied with an observance so limited. What! wouldst thou have my honour, my affections, my duty, all that is most valuable to a woman, depend on the same progress of the calendar which a usurer watches for the purpose of seizing on a forfeited pledge?—Am I such a mere commodity that I must belong to one man if he claims me before Michaelmas, to another if he comes afterwards?—No, Rose, I did not thus interpret my engagement, sanctioned as it was by the special providence of Our Lady of the Garde Delcourtoise."

"It is a feeling worthy of you, my dearest lady," answered the attendant; "yet you are so young—so bright with perils—so much exposed to calumny—that, at least, looking forward to the time when you may have a legal companion and protector, see it as an mitigation from much doubt and danger."

"Do not think of it, Rose," answered Eveline; "do not liken your mistress to those provident dames, who, while one husband yet lives, though in old age or weak health, are prudently engaged in plotting for another."

"Enough, my dearest lady," said Rose;—"yet not so. Permit me one word more. Since you are determined not to avail yourself of your freedom, even when the later period of your engagement is expired, why suffer this young man to share our solitude?—He is surely well enough to be removed to some other place of security. Let us resume our former untroubled mode of life, until Providence send us some better or more certain prospect."

Eveline sighed—looked down—then looking upwards, once more had opened her life to calm her willingness to enforce no reasonable arrangement, but for Damien's recent wounds, and the distracted state of the country, when she was interrupted by the shrill sound of trumpets blown before the gate of the castle; and Raseel, with anxiety on his brow, came hurrying to inform the lady that a knight, attended by a pursuivant-at-arms, in the royal livery, with a strong guard on in front of the castle, and demanded admittance in the name of the King.

Eveline paused a moment ere she replied, "In even to the King's order shall the castle of my ancestors be opened, until we are well assured of the person by whom, and the purpose for which it is demanded. We will ourselves to the gate, and learn the meaning of this summons.—My val, Rose; and call my women.—Again that trumpet sounds!—Ah! it must be a signal to death and ruin."

The prophetic apprehensions of Eveline were all false, for scarce had she reached the door of the apartment when she was met by the page Amal, in a state of such disordered apprehension as an air of chivalry was scarce on any occasion permitted to display. "Lady, noble lady," he said, hastily bowing his knee to Eveline, "save my dearest master!—You, and you alone, can save him at this extremity."

"If" and Eveline, in astonishment—"I save him? and from what danger?—God knows how a knight!"

There she stopped short, as if afraid to trust herself with expressing what rose to her lips.

"Guy Monthermer, lady, is at the gate with a pursuivant and the royal banner. The heraldry emblem of the House of Lacy, thus accompanied, comes hither for no good—the extent of the evil I know not but for evil he comes. My master drew his sword at the field of Malpas, and therefore"—He was there interrupted by another flourish of trumpets, which rung, as if in shrill impatience, through the vaults of the ancient fortress.

The Lady Eveline hastened to the gate, and found the wardens and others who attended there, very looking on each other with doubtful and clouded countenances, which they turned upon her at her arrival, as if to ask from their mistress the cause and the courage which they could not communicate each other. Without the gate mounted, and in complete armour was an elderly and stately knight, whose raised visor and heavier depressed shield's beard already grizzled. Beside him appeared in pursuivant on horseback, the royal arms embossed on his heraldic dress of office, and all the import of offended consequence on his countenance, and was shaded by his barret-cap and triple plume. They were attended by a body of about fifty soldiers arranged under the guidon of England.

When the Lady Eveline appeared at the barrier the knight, after a slight reverence, which seemed more formal courtesy than in kindness, demanded if she saw the daughter of Raymond Beverage. "And so," he continued, when he had received an answer in the affirmative, "before the castle of that approved favourite servant of the House of Anjou, that the Henry's trumpets have thrice sounded, who obtaining an entrance for those who are licensed with their Sovereign's command?"

"My condition," answered Eveline, "must meet my caution. I am a lone maiden, residing in a frontier fortress. I may admit no one without inquiring his purpose and being assured that his entrance comports with the safety of the place and mine own honour."

"Since you are so punctilious, lady," said Monthermer, "know, that in the present distressed state of the country, it is his Grace the King's pleasure to place within your walls a body of men-at-arms, sufficient to guard this important castle, both from the insurgent peasants who burn and slay, and from the Welsh, who, it must be expected, will, according to their wont in time of disturbance, make incursions on the frontiers. Undo your gates, then Lady of Berenger, and suffer his Grace's forces to enter the castle."

"Sir Knight," answered the lady "this castle, like every other fortress in England, is the King's by law; but by law also I am the keeper and defender of it; and it is the tenure by which my ancestors held these lands. I have men enough to maintain the Garde Doloureuse in my time, as my father, and my grandfather before him, defended it in theirs. The King is gracious to send me succours, but I need not the aid of hirelings; neither do I think it safe to admit such into my castle, who may, in this lawless time, make themselves masters of it for other than its lawful mistress."

"Lady," replied the old warrior, "his grace is not ignorant of the motives which produce a contumacy like this. It is not any apprehension for the royal forces which influences you, a royal vassal, in this refractory conduct. I might proceed upon your refusal to proclaim you a traitor to the Crown, but the King remembers the services of your father. Know, then, we are not ignorant that Damian de Lacy, accused of instigating and heading this insurrection, of deserting his duty in the field, and abandoning a noble comrade to the sword of the brutal peasants, has found shelter under this roof with little credit to your loyalty as a vassal, or your conduct as a high-born maiden. Deliver him up to us, and I will draw off these men-at-arms, and dispense, though I may scarce answer doing so, with the occupation of the castle."

"Guy de Monthermer," answered Eveline, "he has thrown a stain on my name, speaks falsely and unworthily; as for Damian de Lacy, he knows how to defend his own fame. This only let me say, that while he takes his abode in the castle of the betrothed of his kinsman, she delivers him to no one, least of all to his well-known feudal enemy—Drop the portcullis, wardens and let it not be raised without my special order."

The portcullis, as she spoke, fell rattling and clanging to the ground, and Monthermer, in baffled spite, remained excluded from the castle. "Unworthy lady"—he began in passion, then checking himself, and calmly to the pursuivant, "Ye are witness that he hath admitted that the traitor is within that castle—ye are witness that, lawfully summoned, this Eveline Berenger refuses to deliver him up. Do your duty, Sir Pursuivant, as is usual in such cases."

The pursuivant then advanced and proclaimed, in a formal and fatal phrase befitting the occasion, that Eveline Berenger, lawfully summoned, refusing to admit the King's forces into her castle, and to deliver up the body of a false traitor, called Damian de Lacy, had herself incurred the penalty of high treason, and had involved within the same doom all who aided, abetted, or maintained her in holding out the said castle against their allegiance to Henry of Anjou. The trumpets, so soon as the voice of the herald had ceased, confirmed the doom he had pronounced, by a long and ominous peal, startling from their nests the owl and the raven, who replied to it by their ill-boding screams.

The defenders of the castle looked on each other with blank and dejected countenances, while Monthermer, raising aloft his lance, exclaimed, as he turned his horse from the castle gate, "When I next approach the Garde Doloureuse, it will be not merely to intimate, but to execute, the mandate of my Sovereign."

As Eveline stood pensively to behold the retreat of Monthermer and his associates, and to consider what was to be done in this emergency, she heard one of the Flemings, in a low tone, ask an Englishman, who stood beside him, what was the meaning of a traitor.

"One who betrayeth a trust reposed—a betrayer," said the interpreter.

The phrase which he used recalled to Eveline's memory her boding vision or dream. "Alas!" she said, "the vengeance of the fiend is about to be accomplished. Widow'd wife and wedded maid—these epithets have long been mine. Betrothed!—wo's me! it is the key-stone of my destiny. Betrayer I am now denounced, though, thank God, I am clear from the guilt! It only follows that I should be betrayed, and the evil prophecy will be fulfilled to the very letter."

CHAPTER XXIX.

Out on ye, owls;—Nothing but songs of death!

Richard III.

MORE than three months had elapsed since the event narrated in the last chapter, and it had been the precursor of others of still greater importance, which will evolve themselves in the course of our narrative. But, as we profess to present to the reader not a precise detail of circumstances, according to their order and date, but a series of pictures, endeavouring to exhibit the most striking incidents before the eye or imagination of those whom it may concern, we therefore open a new scene, and bring other actors upon the stage.

Along a wasted tract of country, more than twelve miles distant from the Garde Doloureuse, in the heat of a summer noon, which shed a burning lustre on the silent valley and the blackened ruins of the cottages with which it had been once graced, two travellers walked slowly, whose palmer cloaks, pilgrims' staves, large slouched hats, with a scallop shell bound on the front of each, above all, the cross, cut in red cloth upon their shoulders, marked them as pilgrims who had accomplished their vow, and had returned from that fatal bourne, from which in those days, returned so few of the thousands who visited it, whether in the love of enterprise, or in the ardour of devotion.

The pilgrims had passed, that morning, through a scene of devastation similar to, and scarce surpassed in misery by, those which they had often trod during the wars of the Cross. They had seen hamlets which appeared to have suffered all the fury of military execution, the houses being burned to the ground; and in many cases the carcasses of the miserable inhabitants, or rather relics of such objects, were suspended on temporary gibbets, or on the trees, which had been allowed to remain standing, only, it would seem, to serve the convenience of the executioners. Living creatures they saw none, excepting those wild denizens of nature who seemed silently resuming the now wasted district, from which they might have been formerly expelled by the course of civilization. Their ears were no less disagreeably occupied than their eyes. The pensive travellers might indeed hear the screams of the raven, as if lamenting the decay of the carnage on which he had been gorged; and now and then the plaintive howl of some dog, deprived of his home and master; but no sounds which argued either labour or domestication of any kind.

The sable figures, who with wearied steps, as it appeared, travelled through these scenes of desolation and ravage, seemed assimilated to them in appearance. They spoke not with each other—they looked not to each other—but one, the shorter of the pair, keeping about half a pace in front of his companion, they moved slowly, as priests returning from a sinner's death-bed, or rather as spectres flitting along the precincts of a churchyard.

At length they reached a grassy mound, on the top of which was placed one of those receptacles for the dead of the ancient British chiefs of distinction, called Kist-Vaen, which are composed of upright fragments of granite, so placed as to form a stone coffin, or something bearing that resemblance. The sepulchre had been long violated by the victorious Saxons, either in scorn or in idle curiosity, or because treasures were supposed to be sometimes concealed in such spots. The huge flat stone which had once been the cover of the coffin, if so it might be termed, lay broken in two pieces at some distance from the sepulchre; and, overgrown as the fragments were with grass and lichens, showed plainly that the lid had been removed to its present situation many years before.

A stunted and doctored oak still spread its branches over the open and rude mausoleum, as if the Druid's badge and emblem, shattered and storm-broken, was still bending to offer its protection to the last remnants of their worship.

"Thus, then, is the Kist-vaen," said the shorter pilgrim; "and here we must abide tidings of our scout. But what, Philip Guarina, have we to expect as an explanation of the devastation which we have traversed?"

"Some incursion of the Welsh wolves, my lord," replied Guarina; "and, by Our Lady, here lies a poor flaxon sheep whom they have snatched up."

The Constable (for he was the pilgrim who had walked foremost) turned as he heard his squire speak, and saw the corpse of a man amongst the long grass; by which, indeed, it was so hidden, that he himself had passed without notice, what the squire, in less abstracted mood, had not failed to observe. The latter doubted of the slain bespoke him an English peasant: the body lay on its face, and the arrow which had caused his death still stuck in his back.

Philip Guarina, with the cool indifference of one accustomed to such scenes, drew the shaft from the man's back, as composedly as he would have removed it from the body of a deer. With similar indifference the Constable agreed to his squire to give him the arrow—looked at it with rapturous curiosity, and then said, "Thou hast forgotten thy old craft, Guarina, when thou callest that a Welsh shaft. Trust me, it flew from a Norman bow; but why it should be found in the body of that English churl, I can ill guess."

"Some runaway serf, I would warrant—some mongrel cur, who had joined the Welsh pack of hounds," answered the squire.

"It may be so," said the Constable; "but I rather suspect some evil war among the Lords Marches themselves. The Welsh, indeed, sweep the villages and leave nothing behind them but blood and ashes; but here even castles seem to have been stormed and taken. May God send us good news of the Garde Dubourne!"

"Amen!" replied his squire; "but if Renaud Vidal brings it, 'twill be the first time he has proved a bar of good omen."

"Philip," said the Constable, "I have already told thee thou art a jealous-paced fool. How many times has Vidal shown his faith in doubt—his address in difficulty—his courage in battle—his patience under suffering?"

"It may be all very true, my lord," replied Guarina; "yet—but what avails to speak?—I own he has done you sometimes good service; but loath were I that your life or honour were at the mercy of Renaud Vidal."

"In the name of all the saints, thou parest and suspicious fool, what is it thou canst find upon it his prejudice?"

"Nothing, my lord," replied Guarina; "but instinctive suspicion and aversion. The child that, for the first time, sees a snake, knows nothing of its evil properties, yet he will not chase it and take it up as he would a butterfly. Such is my dislike of Vidal—I cannot help it. I could pardon the man his maudlin and gloomy adoring looks, when he thinks no one observes him; but his sneering laugh I cannot forgive—it is like the beast we heard of in Judea, who laughs they say, before he tears and destroys."

"Philip," said De Lucy, "I am sorry for thee—sorry from my soul, to see such a predominating and cautious jealousy occupy the brain of a gallant old soldier. Here, in this last misfortune, to recall no more ancient proofs of his fidelity, could he meet otherwise than well with us, when, thrown by shipwreck upon the coast of Wales, we would have been doomed to instant death, had the Cymri recognized us as the Constable of Chester, and in thee his trusty squire, the executioner of his commands against the Welsh in so many instances?"

"I acknowledge," said Philip Guarina, "death had surely been our fortune, had not that man's ingenuity represented us as pilgrims, and, under that character, acted as our interpreter—and in the character he surely precluded us from getting information from any one respecting the state of things here, which believed your lordship much to know, and which must needs my looks gloomy and suspicious enough."

"Still art thou a fool, Guarina," said the Constable; "for look you, had Vidal meant ill by us, why should he not have betrayed us to the Welsh, or at least us, by showing such knowledge as that we may have of their gabbard, to betray ourselves?"

"Well, my lord," said Guarina, "I may be almost but not satisfied. All the fine words he can speak—all the fine tunes he can play—Renaud Vidal will be to my eyes ever a dark and suspicious man, who turns always ready to mould themselves into the best form to attract confidence; with a tongue true to utter the most flattering and agreeable words one time, and at another to play shrewd pleasure-biting honesty; and an eye which, when he thinks himself unobserved, contradicts every countenance of features, every protestation of loyalty, and every word of courtesy or cordiality to which his tongue has given utterance. But I speak not now on the subject; only I am an old man, of the true breed. I love my master, but cannot endure men of those whom he favours; and yonder, as I judge, Renaud Vidal, to give us such an account of our situation, as it shall please him."

A horseman was indeed seen advancing in the path towards the Kist-vaen, with a heavy pace, and in dress, in which something of the Eastern fashion was manifest, with the fantastic attire usually worn by men of his profession, made the Constable even to the minstrel, of whom they were speaking, was so gaily approaching them.

Although Hugo de Lucy rendered the student more than what in justice he supposed his arms demanded, when he vindicated him from the suspicions thrown out by Guarina, yet at the bottom of his heart he had sometimes shared those suspicions, as was often angry at himself, as a just and true man for consenting, on the slight testimony of looks, and sometimes casual expressions, a fidelity which could be proved by many acts of zeal and energy.

When Vidal approached and dismounted to take his attendance, his master hastened to speak to him in words of favour, as if conscious he had been just sharing Guarina's unjust judgment upon him, by his listening to it. "Welcome my trusty Vidal," he said; "thou hast been the raven that fed us on the mountains of Wales, be now the dove that brings us good tidings from the Marches.—Thou art silent. What mean these downcast looks—that embarrassed or rage—that eye plucked down o'er those eyes?—O God's name, man, speak! Fear not for me—I can bear worse than tongues of men may tell. Thou hast seen me in the wars of Palestine, when my horse's lowers fell, man by man, around me, and when I was left well nigh alone—and did I blench then?—Thou hast seen me when the ship's keel lay grating on the rock, and the billows flew in foam over her deck—did I blench then?—No—nor will I now."

"Dost not," said the minstrel, looking steadily on the Constable, as the former assumed the part of countenance of one who sets Fortune and her wheel malice at defiance—"dost not, hast thy hand made strong?"

There was a pause of a minute, during which a group formed at this instant a singular picture.

Afraid to ask, yet ashamed to seem to fear the tidings which depended, the Constable continued to converse with person erect, arms folded, and he expanded with resolution; while the minstrel, and beyond his usual and guarded sympathy by the state of the moment, bent on his master a keen scrutiny, as if to observe whether his courage was not assumed.

Philip Guarina, on the other hand, to whom there was assigned but a rough exterior, had closed his eyes, nor observation, kept his eye in turn fixed on Vidal, as if endeavouring to determine what was the character of that deep interest which glowed in the minstrel's looks apparently, and was unable to ascertain whether it was that of a faithful and sympathetically agitated by the bad news with which to was about to assault his master, or that of an executioner standing with his blade suspended over his victim, deferring his blow until he should discover where it would be most sensibly felt. In Guzman's mind, prejudiced, perhaps, by the previous opinion he had entertained, the latter movement so decidedly predominated, that he longed to raise his staff, and strike down to the earth the servant, who assumed thus to enjoy the protracted sufferings of their common master.

At length a convulsive movement crossed the brow of the Constable, and Guzman, when he beheld a marble smile begin to curl Vidal's lip, could keep silence no longer. "Vidal," he said, "thou art a—"

"A bearer of bad tidings," said Vidal, interrupting him, "therefore subject to the misconstruction of every but who cannot distinguish between the author of signs, and him who unwillingly reports it."

"To what purpose this delay?" said the Constable. "Come, Sir Minister, I will spare you a pang—Eveline has forsaken and forgotten me?"

The minister assented by a low inclination.

Hugo de Lacy passed a short time before the same monument, endeavouring to conquer the deep emotion which he felt. "I forgive her," he said. "Forgive, but I say? Alas! I have nothing to forgive. She had but the right I left in her hand—yes—our date of engagement was out—she had heard of my losses—my defeat—the destruction of my hopes—the expenditure of my wealth—and has taken the first opportunity which strict law afforded, to break off her engagement with one bankrupt in fortune and fame. Many a maiden would have done—perhaps in preference should have done this; but that woman's name should not have been Eveline Beverager."

He leaned on his esquire's arm, and for an instant put his head on his shoulder with a depth of emotion which Guzman had never before seen him betray, and which, in awkward kindness, he could only attempt to console by bidding his master "be of good courage—he had lost but a woman."

"This is no selfish emotion, Philip," said the Constable, remaining still command. "I grieve him that she has left me thus—that she has overruled me—that she has treated me as the pawnbroker does his wretched creditor, who arrests the pledge as the very moment elapses within which it might have been redeemed. Did she then think that I in my turn would have been a creditor so rigid? that I, who, since I knew her, scarce deemed myself worthy of her when I had wealth and fame, should meet her here sharing my diminished and degraded fortunes? How little she ever knew me, or how selfish must she have supposed my misfortune to have made me! But be it so—she is gone, and may she be happy. The thought that she disturbed me shall pass from my mind; and I will think she has done that which I myself, as her best friend, must in honour have advised."

So saying, his countenance, to the surprise of his attendants, resumed its usual firm composure.

"I gave you joy," said the esquire, in a whisper to the minister, "just ere news have wounded him deeply then, doubtless, you believed was possible."

"Alas!" replied the minister, "I have others and worse behind."

This answer was made in an equivocal tone of voice, corresponding to the peculiarity of his manner, and like that smiling emotion of a deep but very doubtful character.

"Eveline Beverager is then married," said the Constable; "and, let me make a wild guess—she has not abandoned the family though she has forsaken the individual—she is still a Lacy? he? Dost thou get, wilt thou not understand me? She is married to Damien de Lacy—to my nephew?"

The effort with which the Constable gave breath to this supposition formed a strange contrast to the constrained smile to which he compelled his features while he uttered it. With such a smile a man about to drink poison might name a health, as he put the fatal beverage to his lips.

"No, my lord—not married," answered the minister, with an emphasis on the word, which the Constable knew how to interpret.

"No, no," he replied quickly, "not married, perhaps, but engaged—truth-plighted. Wherefore not? The date of her old affiances was out, why not enter into a new engagement?"

"The Lady Kesho and Sir Damien de Lacy are not affianced that I know of," answered his attendant.

This reply drove De Lacy's patience to extremity.

"Dost thou trust with me?" he exclaimed; "Vile wire-puncher, thou torturest me! Speak the worst at once, or I will personally make thee minister to the household of Satan."

Calm and collected did the minister reply,—"The Lady Kesho and Sir Damien are neither married nor affianced, my lord. They have loved and lived together—par amour."

"Dost thou call me a dog?" said De Lacy, "thou art?" And, seizing the minister by the breast, the exasperated baron shook him with his whole strength. But great as that strength was, it was unable to stagger Vidal, a practiced wrestler, in the firm posture which he had assumed, any more than his master's wrath could disturb the composure of the minister's bearing.

"Consider thou hast led," said the Constable, releasing him, after having effected by his valiance no greater degree of agitation than the exertion of human force produces upon the Rocking Stones of the Druids, which may be shaken, indeed, but not injured.

"Woe a lie to buy my own life, yes, the lives of all my tribe," said the minister, "I would not sell off. But truth itself is ever termed falsehood when it counteracts the train of our passions."

"Hear him, Philip Guzman, hear him!" exclaimed the Constable, turning hastily to his esquire: "He tells me of my disgrace—of the dishonour of my house—of the depravity of those whom I have loved the best in the world—he tells me of it with a calm look, an eye composed, an unflinching tongue.—Is this—can it be natural? Is De Lacy sunk so low that his dishonour shall be told by a common strolling minstrel, so calmly as if it were a theme for a vain ballad? Perhaps thou wilt make it one, ha!" as he concluded, darting a furious glance at the minstrel.

"Perhaps I might, my lord," replied the minstrel, "were it not that I must record therein the downfall of Renault Vidal, who served a lord without either patience to bear insults and wrongs, or spirit to revenge them on the authors of his shame."

"Thou art right, thou art right, good fellow," said the Constable, hastily; "it is vengeance now alone which is left us. And yet upon whom?"

As he spoke, he walked shortly and hastily to and fro; and, becoming suddenly silent, stood still and wrung his hands with deep emotion.

"I told thee," said the minstrel to Guzman, "that my muse would find a tender part at last. Dost thou remember the bull fight we saw in Spain?—A thousand little darts perfracted and annoyed the noble animal, ere he received the last deadly thrust from the lance of the Moorish cavalier."

"Man, or beast, he which thou wilt," replied Guzman, "that can thou drink in with pleasure, and contemplate at your ease, the misery of another, I bid thee beware of me! Utter thy cold-blooded taunts in some other ear, for if my tongue be silent, I wear a sword that is sharp enough."

"Thou hast men ere among swords," answered the minstrel, "and knowest how little terror they have for such as I am. Yet as he spoke, do draw off from the esquire. He had, in fact, only addressed him in that sort of fulness of heart, which would have vented itself in subduity of silence, and now poured itself out on the normal auditor, without the speaker being entirely conscious of the ornaments which his speech carried.

Few minutes had elapsed before the Constable of Chester had regained the calm external semblance with which, until this last dreadful wound, he had borne all the influences of fortune. He turned towards his followers, and addressed the minstrel with his usual calmness, "Thou art right, good fellow," he said, "in what thou saidst to me but now, and I forgive thee the taunt which accompanied thy good counsel. Speak out, in God's name, and speak to one prepared to endure the evil which God hath sent him. Certes, a good knight is best known in battle, and a Christian in the time of trouble and adversity."

The tone in which the Constable spoke seemed to produce a corresponding effect upon the deportment of his followers. The minstrel dropped at once the cynical and audacious tone in which he had hitherto seemed to tamper with the passions of his master; and in language simple and respectful, and which even approached to sympathy, informed him of the evil news which he had collected during his absence. It was indeed disastrous.

The refusal of the Lady Eveline Berenger to admit Monthermer and his forces into her castle, had of course given circulation and credence to all the calumnies which had been circulated to her prejudice, and that of Damian de Lacy; and there were many who, for various causes, were interested in spreading and supporting these slanders. A large force had been sent into the country to subdue the insurgent peasants; and the knights and nobles despatched for that purpose, failed not to avenge to the uttermost, upon the wretched plebeians, the noble blood which they had spilled during their temporary triumph.

The followers of the unfortunate Wenlock were infected with the same persuasion. Blamed by many for a hasty and cowardly surrender of a post which might have been defended, they endeavoured to vindicate themselves by alleging the hostile demonstrations of De Lacy's cavalry as the sole cause of their premature submission.

These rumours, supported by such interested testimony, spread wide and far through the land; and, joined to the undeniable fact that Damian had sought refuge in the strong castle of Garde Doloureuse, which was now defending itself against the royal arms, animated the numerous enemies of the house of De Lacy, and drove its vassals and friends almost to despair, as men reduced either to disown their feudal allegiance, or renounce that still more sacred fealty which they owed to their sovereign.

At this crisis they received intelligence that the wise and active monarch by whom the sceptre of England was then swayed, was moving towards that part of England, at the head of a large body of soldiers, for the purpose, at once of pressing the siege of the Garde Doloureuse, and, completing the suppression of the insurrection of the peasantry, which Guy Monthermer had nearly accomplished.

In this emergency, and when the friends and dependants of the House of Lacy scarcely knew which hand to turn to, Randal, the Constable's kinsman, and, after Damian, his heir, suddenly appeared amongst them, with a royal commission to raise and command such followers of the family as might not desire to be involved in the supposed treason of the Constable's delegate. In troublesome times, men's vices are forgotten, provided they display activity, courage, and prudence, the virtues then most required; and the appearance of Randal, who was by no means deficient in any of these attributes, was received as a good omen by the followers of his cousin. They quickly gathered around him, surrendered to the royal mandate such strong holds as they possessed, and, to vindicate themselves from any participation in the alleged crimes of Damian, they distinguished themselves, under Randal's command, against such scattered bodies of peasantry as still kept the field, or lurked in the mountains and passes; and conducted themselves with such severity after success, as made the troops even of Monthermer appear gentle and clement in comparison of those of De Lacy. Finally, with the banner of his ancient house displayed, and five hundred good men assembled under it, Randal appeared before the Garde Doloureuse, and joined Henry's camp there.

The castle was already hardly pressed, and the few defenders, disabled by wounds, watching, and privation, had now the additional discouragement to see displayed against their walls the only banner in England, under which they had hoped forces might be mustered for their aid.

The high-spirited entreaties of Eveline, unbent by adversity and want, gradually lost effect on the defenders of the castle; and proposals for surrender were urged and discussed by a tumultuary council, in which not only the inferior officers, but many of the common men, had thrust themselves, as in a period of such general distress as unlooses all the bonds of discipline, and leaves each man at liberty to speak and act for himself. To their surprise, in the midst of their discussions, Damian de Lacy, arisen from the sick-bed to which he had been so long confined, appeared among them, pale and feeble, his cheek tinged with the ghastly look which is left by long illness—he leaned on his page Amelot. "Gentlemen," he said, "and soldiers—yet why should I call you either?—Gentlemen are ever ready to die in behalf of a lady—soldiers hold life in scorn compared to their honour."

"Out upon him! out upon him!" exclaimed one of the soldiers, interrupting him; "he would have us, who are innocent, die the death of traitors, and be hanged in our armour over the walls, rather than part with his leman."

"Peace, irreverent slave!" said Damian, in a voice like thunder, "or my last blow shall be a mean one, aimed against such a caitiff as thou art.—And you," he continued, addressing the rest,—"you, who are shrinking from the toils of your profession, because if you persist in a course of honour, death may close them a few years sooner than it needs must—you who are scared like children at the sight of a death's head, do not suppose that Damian de Lacy would desire to shelter himself at the expense of those lives which you hold so dear. Make your bargain with King Henry. Deliver me up to his justice, or his severity; or, if you like it better, strike my head from my body, and hurl it, as a peace-offering, from the walls of the castle. To God, in his good time, will I trust, for the clearance of mine honour. In a word, surrender me, dead or alive, or open the gates and permit me to surrender myself. Only, as ye are men, since I may not say better of ye, care at least for the safety of your mistress, and make such terms as may secure HER safety, and save yourselves from the dishonour of being held cowardly and perjured caitiffs in your graves."

"Methinks the youth speaks well and reasonably," said Wilkin Flammock. "Let us e'en make a game of surrendering his body up to the King, and accept thereby such terms as we can for ourselves and the lady, ere the last morsel of our provision is consumed."

"I would hardly have proposed this measure," said or rather mumbled, Father Aldrovand, who had recently lost four of his front teeth by a stone from a sling—"yet, being so generously offered by the party principally concerned, I hold with the learned scholar, Volenti non fit injuria."

"Priest and Fleming," said the old banner-man Ralph Genvil, "I see how the wind stirreth you; but you deceive yourselves if you think to make our young master, Sir Damian, a scape-goat for your light lady Nay, never frown nor fume, Sir Damian; if you know not your safest course, we know it for you.—Followers of De Lacy, throw yourselves on your honours, and two men on one, if it be necessary—we will take the stubborn boy in the midst of us, and the dainty Amelot shall be prisoner too, if he trouble us with his peevish opposition. Then let us make a fair offer upon the siegers. Those who can cut their way through will shift well enough; those who fall, will be provided for."

A shout from the troopers of Lacy's band, approved this proposal. Whilst the followers of Berenger postulated in loud and angry tone, Eveline, roused by the tumult, in vain endeavoured to speak; and the anger and entreaties of Damian were equally lost on his followers. To each and either no answer was the same.

"Have you no care of it—Because you love your amours, is it reasonable you should throw away your life and ours?" So exclaimed Genvil to De Lacy; and in softer language, but with equal obstinacy, the followers of Raymond Berenger refused on the point occasion to listen to the commands or prayers of his daughter.

Wilkin Flammock had retreated from the tumult, when he saw the turn which matters had taken. He left the castle by a sally-port, of which he had been intrusted with the key, and proceeded without observation or opposition to the royal camp, where he requested access to the Sovereign. This was easily obtained, and Wilkin speedily found himself in the presence of King Henry. The monarch was in his royal pavilion, attended by two of his sons, Richard and John, who afterwards swayed the sceptre of England with very different auspices.

"How now?—What art thou?" was the royal question.

"An honest man, from the castle of the Garde Doloureuse."

"Thou mayest be honest," replied the Sovereign, "but thou comest from a nest of traitors."

"Such as they are, my lord, it is my purpose to put them at your royal disposal; for they have no longer the wisdom to guide themselves, and lack alike prudence to hold out, and grace to submit. But I would first know of your grace to what terms you will admit the defenders of yonder garrison?"

"To such as kings give to traitors," said Henry, sternly—"sharp knives and tough cords."

"Nay, my gracious lord, you must be kinder than that amounts to, if the castle is to be rendered by my means; else will your cords and knives have only my poor body to work upon, and you will be as far as ever from the inside of the Garde Doloureuse."

The King looked at him fixedly. "Thou knowest," he said, "the law of arms. Here, provost-marshal, stands a traitor, and yonder stands a tree."

"And here is a throat," said the stout-hearted Fleming, unbuttoning the collar of his doublet.

"By mine honour," said Prince Richard, "a sturdy and faithful yeoman! It were better send such fellows their dinner, and then buffet it out with them for the castle, than to starve them as the beggarly Frenchmen famish their hounds."

"Peace, Richard," said his father; "thy wit is over green, and thy blood over hot, to make thee my counsellor here.—And you, knave, speak you some reasonable terms, and we will not be over strict with thee."

"First, then," said the Fleming, "I stipulate full and free pardon for life, limb, body and goods, to me, Wilkin Flammock, and my daughter Rose."

"A true Fleming," said Prince John; "he takes care of himself in the first instance."

"His request," said the King, "is reasonable.—What next?"

"Safety, in life, honour, and land, for the demoiselle Eveline Berenger."

"How, Sir Knave!" said the King, angrily, "is it for such as thou to dictate to our judgment or clemency in the case of a noble Norman lady? Confine thy mediation to such as thyself; or rather render us this castle without farther delay; and be assured thy doing so will be of more service to the traitors within, than weeks more of resistance, which must and shall be bootless."

The Fleming stood silent, unwilling to surrender without some specific terms, yet half convinced, from the situation in which he had left the garrison of the Garde Doloureuse, that his admitting the King's forces would be perhaps, the best he could do for Lady Eveline.

"I like thy fidelity, fellow," said the King, whose acute eye perceived the struggle in the Fleming's bosom; "but carry not thy stubbornness too far. Have we not said we will be gracious to yonder offenders, as far as our royal duty will permit?"

"And, royal father," said Prince John, interposing, "I pray you let me have the grace to take first possession of the Garde Doloureuse, and the wardship or forfeiture of the offending lady."

"I pray you also, my royal father, to grant John's boon," said his brother Richard, in a tone of mockery.

"Consider, royal father, it is the first desire he hath shown to approach the barriers of the castle, though we have attacked them forty times at least. Marry, crossbow and mangonel were busy on the former occasions, and it is like they will be silent now."

"Peace, Richard," said the King; "your words, aimed at thy brother's honour, pierce my heart!—John, thou hast thy boon as concerns the castle; for this unhappy young lady, we will take her in our own charge.—Fleming, how many men wilt thou undertake to admit?"

Ere Flammock could answer, a squire approached Prince Richard, and whispered in his ear, yet so as to be heard by all present, "We have discovered that some internal disturbance, or other cause unknown, has withdrawn many of the warders from the castle walls, and that a sudden attack might"—

"Dost thou hear that, John?" exclaimed Richard. "Ladders, man—get ladders, and to the wall. How I should delight to see thee on the highest round—thy knees shaking—thy hands grasping convulsively, like those of one in an ague fit—all air around thee, save a baton or two of wood—the moat below—half-a-dozen pikes at thy throat!"

"Peace, Richard, for shame, if not for charity!" said his father, in a tone of anger, mingled with grief. "And thou, John, get ready for the assault."

"As soon as I have put on my armour, father," answered the Prince; and withdrew slowly with a visage so blank as to promise no speed in his preparations.

His brother laughed as he retired, and said to his squire, "It were no bad jest, Alberick, to carry the place ere John can change his silk doublet for a steel one."

So saying, he hastily withdrew, and his father exclaimed in paternal distress, "Out, alas! as much too hot as his brother is too cold; but it is the manner fault.—Gloucester," said he to that celebrated earl, "take sufficient strength, and follow Prince Richard to guard and sustain him. If any one can rule him, it must be a knight of thy established fame. Alas! alas! for what sin have I deserved the affliction of these cruel family feuds?"

"Be comforted, my lord," said the chancellor, who was also in attendance.

"Speak not of comfort to a father, whose sons are at discord with each other, and agree only in their disobedience to him!"

Thus spoke Henry the Second, than whom no wiser, or, generally speaking, more fortunate monarch, ever sat upon the throne of England; yet whose life is a striking illustration, how family dissensions can tarnish the most brilliant lot to which Heaven permits humanity to aspire; and how little gratified ambition, extended power, and the highest reputation in war and in peace, can do towards curing the wounds of domestic affliction.

The sudden and fiery attack of Richard, who hastened to the escalade at the head of a score of followers, collected at random, had the complete effect of surprise; and having surmounted the walls with their ladders, before the contending parties within were almost aware of the assault, the assailants burst open the gates, and admitted Gloucester, who had hastily followed with a strong body of men-at-arms. The garrison, in their state of surprise, confusion, and disunion, offered but little resistance, and would have been put to the sword, and the place plundered, had not Henry himself entered it, and by his personal exertions and authority, restrained the excesses of the dissolute soldiery.

The King conducted himself, considering the times and the provocation, with laudable moderation. He contented himself with disarming and dismissing the common soldiers, giving them some trifle to carry them out of the country, lest want should lead them to form themselves into bands of robbers. The officers were more severely treated, being for the greater part thrown into dungeons, to abide the course of the law. In particular, imprisonment was the lot of Damian de Lacy, against whom, believing the various charges with which he was loaded, Henry was so highly incensed, that he purposed to make him an example to all false knights and disloyal subjects. To the Lady Eveline Berenger he assigned her own apartment as a prison, in which she was honourably attended by Rose and Alice but guarded with the utmost strictness. It was generally reported that her demerits would be declared a forfeiture to the crown, and bestowed, at least in part, upon Randal de Lacy, who had done good service during the siege. Her person, it was thought, was destined to the seclusion of some distant French nunnery, where she might at least repeat her of her follies and her rashness.

Father Aldrovand was delivered up to the discipline of his convent, long experience having very effectually taught Henry the imprudence of infringing on the privileges of the church; although, when the King first beheld him with a rusty corslet clasped over his frock, he with difficulty repressed the desire to cause him to be hanged over the battlements, to preach to the ravens.

With Wilken Flammock, Henry held much conference, particularly on the subject of manufactures and commerce; on which the sound-headed, though blunt spoken Fleming, was well qualified to instruct an intelligent monarch. "Thy intentions," he said, "shall not be forgotten, good fellow, though they have been anticipated by the headlong valour of my son Richard, which has cost some poor catulls their lives. Richard loves not to sheathe a bloodless weapon. But thou and thy countrymen shall return to thy mill in yonder, with a full pardon for past offences, so that you meddle no more with such treasonable matters."

"And our privileges and duties, my lord?" said Flammock. "Your Majesty knows well we are vassals to the lord of this castle, and must follow him in battle."

"It shall no longer be so," said Henry; "I will form a community of Flemings here, and thou, Flammock, shalt be Mayor, that thou mayest not plead feudal obedience for a relapse into treason."

"Treason, my lord?" said Flammock, hanging yet scarce venturing, to interpose a word in behalf of Lady Evelina, for whom, despite the constitutional coolness of his temperament, he really felt much interest—"I would that your Grace but justly knew how many threads went to that woof."

"Peace, surrah! muddle with your loom," said Henry; "and if we deign to speak to thee concerning the mechanical arts which thou dost profess, take it for no warrant to intrude farther on our privacy."

The Fleming retired, rebuked, and in silence, and the fate of the unhappy prisoners remained in the King's bosom. He himself took up his lodging in the castle of the Garde Doloureuse, as a convenient station for sending abroad parties to suppress and extinguish all the embers of rebellion, and so active was Randal de Lacy on these occasions, that he appeared daily to rise in the King's grace, and was gratified with considerable grants out of the domains of Berenger and Lacy, which the King seemed already to treat as forfeited property. Most men considered this growing favour of Randal as a perilous omen, both for the life of young De Lacy, and for the fate of the unfortunate Evelina.

CHAPTER XXX

A vow, a vow—I have a vow in Heaven.
Shall I bring perjury upon my soul?
No, not for Venice.—Shakespeare of France.

THE conclusion of the last chapter contains the tidings with which the minstrel greeted his unhappy master, Hugo de Lacy; not indeed with the same detail of circumstances with which we have been able to invest the narrative, but so as to infer the general and appalling facts, that his betrayed bride, and beloved and trusted kinsman, had leagued together for his dishonour—had raised the banner of rebellion against their lawful sovereign and failing in their audacious attempt, had brought the life of one of them, at least, into the most imminent danger, and the fortunes of the House of Lacy, unless some instant remedy could be found, to the very verge of ruin.

Vidal marked the countenance of his master as he spoke, with the same keen observation which the chirurgeon gives to the progress of his dissecting knife. There was grief on the Constable's face—deep grief—but without the expression of despair or prostration, which usually accompanies anger and shame were there—but they were tempered by a noble character, seemingly excited by his lab and nephew's transgressing the laws of allegiance, honour, and virtue, rather than by the degree of damage which he himself sustained thro' their sin.

The minstrel was so much astonished at the change of deportment, from the sensitive acuteness of agony which attended the beginning of his career, that he stepped back two paces, and gazing on the Constable with wonder mixed with admiration, exclaimed, "We have heard of martyrs in Palestine, but this exceeds them!"

"Wonder not so much, good friend," said the Constable, patiently; "it is the first blow of the lance's mass which pierces or stuns—those which follow are little felt."

"Think, my lord," said Vidal, "all is lost—thy dominion, high office, and bright fame—no less than among nobles—now a poor palmer!"

"Wouldst thou make sport with my misery?" said Hugo, sternly; "but even that comes of sinners to bind my back, and why should it not be ended when said to my face?—Know, then, minstrel, and put it in song if you list, that Hugo De Lacy, being lost all he carried to Palestine, and all which he left at home, is still lord of his own mind; and always can no more shake him, than the waves which strike the oak of its leaves can tear up the trunk by the roots."

"Now, by the tomb of my father," said the minstrel, rapturously, "this man's nobleness is too much for my resolve!" and stopping hastily to the Constable, he knelt on one knee, and caught his hand more freely than the state maintained by men of De Lacy's rank usually permitted.

"Here," said Vidal, "on this hand—the other hand—I renounce!"

But ere he could utter another word, Hugo de Lacy, who, perhaps, felt the freedom of the action as a intrusion on his fallen condition, pulled back his hand, and bid the minstrel, with a stern frown, and remember that misfortune made not De Lacy's fit personage for a mummy.

Renault Vidal rose rebuked. "I had form," he said, "the distance between an Armoinean viceroy and a high Norman baron. I thought that the same depth of sorrow, the same burst of joy, levelled, for a moment at least, those artificial barriers by which we are divided. But it is well as it is. Live within the limits of your rank, as heretofore within your tower and your fesses, my lord, undisturbed by the sympathy of any mean man like me. I, too, have my duties to discharge."

"And now to the Garde Doloureuse," said the Baron, turning to Philip Guarine—"God knoweth how well it doertheth the name!—there to learn, with our own eyes and ears, the truth of those woful tidings—Dismount, minstrel, and give me thy palfrey—I will Guarine, that I had one for thee—as for Vidal, his attendance is less necessary. I will face my fate as my misfortune, like a man—that he assured of, and look not so sullen, knave—I will not forget old adherents."

"One of them, at least, will not forget you, my lord," replied the minstrel, with his usual debased word look and emphasis.

But just as the Constable was about to push forward, two persons appeared on the path, mounted on one horse, who, bidden by some dwarf-woman, led "Such an expression is said to have been used by Balthus the celebrated engravist, while in the act of being broken on the wheel. The dreadful punishment consisted in the offender with a bar of iron, breaking the shoulder bone into three bones, and legs of the criminal, taking his chance. The punishment is concluded by a blow over the breast, called the coup de grace because it removes the sufferer from his agony. When Maudslayi recovered the sword from the left shoulder bone, he laughed. The painter observed the reason of Maudslayi's so unbecomingly laughing. 'I only laugh at my own folly, my father,' said the painter. 'who could suppose that sufferability of pain should exist after the nervous system had been completely destroyed by the first blow?'" very near them without being perceived. They male and female; and the man, who rode foremost, was such a picture of famine, as the eyes of the men had scarce witnessed in all the wasted lands which they had travelled. His features, naturally sharp and thin, had disappeared almost entirely; the uncombed grey beard and hairs with which they were overshadowed; and it was but the rim of a long nose, that seemed as sharp as the tip of a knife, and the twinkling sparkle of his grey which gave any intimation of his boonsome age, in the wide old boot which enclosed it, looked so handle of a mop left by chance in a pile—his were about the thickness of riding-rods—and parts of his person as were not concealed by the rim of a huntsman's cap, seemed rather the idiom of a mummy than a live man.

A female who sat behind this spectre exhibited some symptoms of exhaustion; but being a jolly dame naturally, famine had not been able to make her a spectacle so rueful as the anatomy between which she rode. Dame Gillian's cheek (for it the reader's old acquaintance) had indeed lost any hue of good cheer, and the smoothness of complexion which art and easy living had formerly stated for the more delicate bloom of youth; her were swollen, and had lost much of their bold vigorous lustre, but she was still in some measure herself, and the remnants of former finery, together with the tight-drawn scarlet hose, though surely, showed still a remnant of coquettish pretension.

soon as she came within sight of the pilgrims, began to punch Raoul with the end of her riding-

"Try thy new trade, man, since thou art unwilling to other—to the good men—to them—crave their help."

"eg from beggars?"—quothed Raoul; "that hawking at sparrows, dame."

"will bring our hand in use, though," said Gillian, and commenced, in a whining tone, "God love truly men, who have had the grace to go to the Land, and, what is more, have had the grace to back again; I pray, bestow some of your alms on my poor old husband, who is a miserable object, a woe, and upon one who has the bad luck to be so—Heaven help me!"

"once, woman, and hear what I have to say," the Constable, laying his hand upon the bridle of his horse—"I have present occasion for that horse, the hunting-horn of St. Hubert, but thou art him not without blows?" answered the old man. "A fine world it is, when pilgrims turn -stealers."

"cuck, fellow!" said the Constable, sternly.—"I have occasion presently for the service of thy . Here be two gold bezants for a day's use of thy; it is well worth the fee-simple of him, he never returned."

"ist the palfrey is an old acquaintance, master," Raoul, "and if perchance"

"set upon your self and perchance both," said the , giving her husband so determined a thrust as nigh pushed him out of the saddle. "Off the ! I and thank God and this worthy man for the he has sent us in extremity. What signifies the y, when we have not enough to get food either for brats or ourselves? not though we would ease and corn with him, like King Somebody, in the good father used to read us to sleep."

"true with your prating, dame," said Raoul, ng his assistance to help her from the croupe; he preferred that of Guine, who, though advanced in years, retained the advantage of his stoutly figure.

"humbly thank your goodness," said she, an ng first kissed her,) the squire sat her on the d. "And, pray, sir, are ye come from the Holy ?—Heard ye any tidings there of him that was table of Chester?"

Lacy, who was engaged in removing the pilgrim behind the saddle, stopped short in his task, and said, "Ha, dame! what would you with him?"

"A great deal, good palmer, as I could light on him, for his lands and offices are all to be given, it's like, to that false thief, his kinsman."

"What?" to Damian, his nephew?" exclaimed the Constable in a harsh and hasty tone.

"Lord, how you startle me, sir!" said Gillian; then continued, turning to Philip Guine, "Your friend is a hasty man, belike."

"It is the fault of the sun he has lived under so long," said the squire; "but look you answer his questions truly and he will make it the better for you."

Gillian instantly took the hint. "Was it Damian de Lacy you asked after?—Alas! poor young gentleman! no office or lands for him—more likely to have a gallow's-end, poor lad—and all for naught, as I am a true dame. Damian!—no, no, it is not Damian nor Damian neither—but Randal Lacy, that must rule the roost, and have all the old man's lands, and livings, and lordships."

"What?" said the Constable—"before they know whether the old man is dead or no?—Methinks that were against law and reason both."

"Ay, but Randal Lacy has brought about less likely matters. I ask you, he hath sworn to the King that they have true tidings of the Constable's death—ay, and let him aye to make them soothfast enough, if the Constable were once within his danger."

"Indeed!" said the Constable. "But you are forging tales on a noble gentleman. Come, come, dame, you say this because you like not Randal Lacy."

"I like him not? And what reason have I to like him, I trow?" answered Gillian. "Is it because he seduced my simplicity to let him into the castle of the Gard? Doubtless—ay, oftener than once or twice e ther, when he was disguised as a pedlar, and told him all the secrets of the family, and how the boy Damian, and the girl Eveline, were dying of love with each other, but had not courage to say a word of it, for fear of the Constable, though he were a thousand miles off?—You seem concerned, worthy sir, may I offer your reverend worship a trifling cup from my bottle, which is sovereign for tremor cordis and fits of the spleen?"

"No, no," ejaculated De Lacy—"I was but grieved with the shooting of an old wound. But dame, I warrant me this Damian and Eveline, as you call them, became better closer friends, in time?"

"They? not they indeed, poor simpletons!" answered the dame; "they wanted some wise counselling to go between and advise them. For, look you, sir, if old Hugh be dead, as is most like, it were more natural that his be and his nephew should inherit his lands, than that some Randal, who is but a distant kinsman and sworn castill to boot.—Would you think it, reverend pilgrim, after the mountains of gold he promised me?—When the castle was taken, and he saw I could serve him no more, he called me old beldame, and spoke of the bundle and the cucking-stool."

"Yes, my friend, old beldame and cucking-stool were his best words, when he knew I had no one to take my part, save old Raoul, who cannot take his own. But if our old Hugh bring back his weather-beaten carcase from Palestine, and have but half the devil in him which he had when he was fool enough to go away Saint Mary, but I will do his kinsman's office to him!"

There was a pause when she had done speaking.

"Then say it at length exclaimed the Constable, that Damian de Lacy and Eveline love each other, yet are unconscious of guilt, or falsehood, or ingratitude to me—I would say, to their relative in Palestine?"

"Love, my? in troth and so it is—they do love each other," said Gillian; "but it is like angels—or like lambs—or like fools, if you will; for they would never so much as have spoken together, but for a prank of that same Randal Lacy's."

"How?" demanded the Constable—"a prank of Randal's? What motive had he that these two should meet?"

"Nay, their meeting was none of his making; but he had formed a plan to carry off the Lady Eveline himself, for he was a wild rover, this same Randal; and so he came disguised as a merchant of falcons, and trained out my old stupid Raoul, and the Lady Eveline, and all of us, as if to have an hour's mirth in hawking at the heron. But he had a band of Welsh kites in readiness to pounce upon us; and but for the sudden making in of Damian to our rescue, it is undecidable to think what might have come of us; and Damian being hurt in the onslaught, was carried to the Garde Doloureuse in mere necessity; and but to save his life, it is my belief my lady would never have asked him to cross the drawbridge, even if he had offered."

"Woman," said the Constable, "think what thou say'st! If thou hast done evil in these matters heretofore, as I suspect from thine own story, think not to put it right by a train of new falsehoods, merely from spite at missing thy reward."

"Palmer," said old Raoul, with his broken-toned voice, cracked by many a halloo, "I am wont to leave the business of tale-bearing to my wife Gillian, who will tongue-pad it with any shrew in Christendom. But thou speak'st like one having some interest in these matters, and therefore I will tell thee plainly, that although this woman has published her own shame in avowing her correspondence with that same Randal Lacy, yet what she has said is true as the gospel; and, were it my last word, I would say that Damian and the lady Eveline are innocent of all treason and all dishonesty, as is the babe unborn.—But what avails what the like of us say, who are even driven to the very begging for mere support, after having lived at a good house, and in a good lord's service—blessing be with him!"

"But hark you," continued the Constable, "are there left no ancient servants of the house, that could speak out as well as you?"

"Humph!" answered the huntsman—"men are not willing to babble when Randal Lacy is cracking his thong above their heads. Many are slain, or starved to death—some disposed of—some spirited away. But there are the weaver Flammock and his daughter Rose, who know as much of the matter as we do."

"What!—Wilkin Flammock, the stout Netherlander?" said the Constable; "he and his blunt but true daughter Rose?—I will venture my life on their faith. Where dwell they?—What has been their lot amidst these changes?"

"And in God's name who are you that ask these questions?" said Dame Gillian. "Husband, husband—we have been too free; there is something in that look and that tone which I should remember."

"Yes, look at me more fixedly," said the Constable, throwing back the hood which had hitherto in a great degree obscured his features.

"On your knees—on your knees, Raoul!" exclaimed Gillian, dropping on her own at the same time; "it is the Constable himself, and he has heard me call him old Hugh!"

"It is all that is left of him who was the Constable, at least," replied De Lacy; "and old Hugh willingly forgives your freedom, in consideration of your good news. Where are Flammock and his daughter?"

"Rose is with the Lady Eveline, said Dame Gillian; "her ladyship, belike, chose her for bower-woman in place of me, although Rose was never fit to attire so much as a Dutch doll."

"The faithful girl!" said the Constable. "And where is Flammock?"

"Oh, for him, he has pardon and favour from the King," said Raoul; "and is at his own house, with his rabble of weavers, close beside the Battle-bridge, as they now call the place where your lordship quelled the Welsh."

"Thither will I then," said the Constable; "and will then see what welcome King Henry of Anjou has for an old servant. You two must accompany me."

"My lord," said Gillian, with hesitation, "you know poor folk are little thanked for interference with great men's affairs. I trust your lordship will be able to protect us if we speak the truth; and that you will not look back with displeasure on what I did, acting for the best."

"Peace, dame, with a wanon to ye!" said Raoul. "Will you think of your own old sinful carter, when you should be saving your sweet young mistress from shame and oppression?—And for thy ill toady and worse practices, his lordship knows they are bred in the bone of thee."

"Peace, good fellow!" said the Constable; "we will not look back on thy wife's errors, and your fidelity shall be rewarded.—For you, my faithful followers," he said, turning towards Guarine and Vidal, "when De Lacy shall receive his rights, of which he doubts nothing, his first wish shall be to reward your fidelity."

"Mine, such as it is, has been and shall be, its own reward," said Vidal. "I will not accept favours for him in prosperity, who, in adversity, refused me his hand—our account stands yet open."

"Go to, thou art a fool; but thy profession hath privilege to be humorous," said the Constable, whose weatherbeaten and homely features looked even handsome, when animated by gratitude to Heaven and benevolence towards mankind. "We will meet," he said, "at Battle-bridge, an hour before vespers—I shall have much achieved before that time."

"The space is short," said his esquire.

"I have won a battle in yet shorter," replied the Constable.

"In which," said the minstrel, "many a man has died that thought himself well assured of life and victory."

"Even so shall my dangerous cousin Randal find his schemes of ambition blighted," answered the Constable; and rode forwards, accompanied by Raoul and his wife, who had remounted their palfrey, while the minstrel and esquire followed a-foot, and, of course, much more slowly.

CHAPTER XXXI.

"Oh, fear not, fear not, good Lord John,
That I would you betray.
Or sue requital for a debt,
Which nature cannot pay."

"Bear witness, all ye sacred powers—
Ye lights that 'gin to shine—
This night shall prove the sacred tie
That binds your faith and mine."

Ancient Scottish Ballad.

LEFT behind by their master, the two dependants Hugh de Lacy marched on in sullen silence, but who dislike and distrust each other, though bound to one common service, and partners, therefore, in the same hopes and fears. The dislike, indeed, was chiefly upon Guarine's side; for nothing could be more indifferent to Renault Vidal than was his companion, farther than as he was conscious that Vidal loved him not, and was not unlikely, so far as lay in his power, to thwart some plans which he had next at heart. He took little notice of his companion, but hummed over to himself, as for the exercise of his memory, romances and songs, many of which were composed in languages which Guarine, who had an ear for his native Norman, did not understand.

They had proceeded together in this sullen manner for nearly two hours, when they were met by a groom on horseback, leading a saddled palfrey. "Pilgrims," said the man, after looking at them with some attention, "which of you is called Philip Guarine?"

"I, for fault of a better," said the esquire, "reply to that name."

"Thy lord, in that case, commends him to you," said the groom; "and sends you this token, by which you shall know that I am his true messenger."

He showed the esquire a rosary, which Philip instantly recognised as that used by the Constable.

"I acknowledge the token," he said, "speciously in master's pleasure."

"He bids me say," replied the rider, "that he thrives as well as is possible, and that this very evening by time that the sun sets, he will be possessed of his own. He desires, therefore, you will mount this palfrey frey, and come with me to the Garde Doloureuse, as your presence will be wanted there."

"It is well, and I obey him," said the esquire, much pleased with the import of the message, and not dissatisfied at being separated from his travelling companion.

"And what charge for me?" said the minstrel, addressing the messenger.

"If you, as I guess, are the minstrel, Renault Vidal, you are to abide your master at the Battle-bridge, according to the charge formerly given."

"I will meet him, as in duty bound," was Vidal's answer; and scarce was it uttered, ere the two horsemen, turning their backs on him, rode briskly forward, and were speedily out of sight.

It was now four hours past noon, and the sun was declining, yet there was more than three hours' space to the time of rendezvous, and the distance from the place did not now exceed four miles. Vidal, therefore, either for the sake of rest or reflection, withdrew from the path into a thicket on the left hand, from which gushed the waters of a streamlet, fed by a small fountain that bubbled up amongst the trees. Here the traveller sat himself down, and with an air which seemed unconscious of what he was doing, bent his eye on the little sparkling font for more than half an hour, without change of posture; so that he might, in Pagan times, have represented the statue of a water-god bending over his urn, and attentive only to the supplies which it was pouring forth. At length, however, he seemed to recall himself from this state of deep abstraction, drew himself up, and took some coarse food from his pilgrim's srip, as if suddenly reminded that life is not supported without means. But he had probably something at his heart which affected his throat or appetite. After a vain attempt to swallow a morsel, he threw it from him in disgust, and applied him to a small flask, in which he had some wine or other liquor. But seemingly this also turned distasteful, for he threw from him both srip and bottle, and, bending down to the spring, drank deeply of the pure element, bathed in it his hands and face, and arising from the fountain apparently refreshed, moved slowly on his way, singing as he went, but in a low and saddened tone, wild fragments of ancient poetry, in a tongue equally ancient.

Journeying on in this melancholy manner, he at length came in sight of the Battle-bridge; near to which arose, in proud and gloomy strength, the celebrated castle of the Garde Doloureuse. "Here, then," he said—"here, then, I am to await the proud De Lacy. Be it so, in God's name!—he shall know me better ere we part."

So saying, he strode, with long and resolved steps, across the bridge, and ascending a mound which arose on the opposite side at some distance, he gazed for a time upon the scene beneath—the beautiful river, rich with the reflected tints of the western sky—the trees, which were already brightened to the eye, and saddened to the fancy, with the hue of autumn—and the larksome walls and towers of the feudal castle, from which, at times, flashed a glimpse of splendour, as some sentinel's arms caught and gave back a transient ray of the setting sun.

The countenance of the minstrel which had hitherto been dark and troubled, seemed softened by the quiet of the scene. He threw loose his pilgrim's dress, yet offering part of its dark folds to hang around him mantle-wise; under which appeared his minstrel's abard. He took from his side a rote, and striking, from time to time, a Welsh descant, sung at others a ay, of which we can offer only a few fragments, literally translated from the ancient language in which they were chanted, premising that they are in that excursive symbolical style of poetry, which Taliessin, Jewarch Hen, and other bards, had derived perhaps from the time of the Druids.

"I asked of my harp, 'Who hath injured thy chords?' and she replied, 'The crooked finger, which I mocked in my tune.'

A blade of silver may be bended—a blade of steel abideth—Kindness fadeth away, but vengeance endureth.

The sweet taste of mead passeth from the lips, but they are long corroded by the juice of wormwood

'Wherefore glowest thou longer than the firebrand?'—

'I was born in the dark mine, and the brand in the pleasant greenwood.'

Kindness fadeth away, but vengeance endureth.

More of the same wild images were thrown out, each bearing some analogy, however fanciful and remote, to the theme, which occurred like a chorus at the close of each stanza; so that the poetry resembled a piece of music, which, after repeated excursions through fanciful variations, returns ever and anon to the simple melody which is the subject of ornament.

As the minstrel sung, his eyes were fixed on the bridge and its vicinity; but when, near the close of his chant, he raised up his eyes towards the distant towers of the Garde Doloureuse, he saw that the gates were opened, and that there was a mustering of guards and attendants without the barriers, as if some expedition were about to set forth, or some person of importance to appear on the scene. At the same time, glancing his eyes around, he discovered that the landscape, so solitary when he first took his seat on the gray stone from which he overlooked it, was now becoming filled with figures.

During his reverie, several persons, solitary and in groups, men, women, and children, had begun to assemble themselves on both sides of the river, and were loitering there, as if expecting some spectacle. There was also much bustling at the Fleming's mills, which, though at some distance, were also completely under his eye. A procession seemed to be arranging itself there, which soon began to move forward, with pipe and tabor, and various other instruments of music, and soon approached, in regular order, the place where Vidal was seated.

It appeared the business in hand was of a pacific character; for the gray-bearded old men of the little settlement, in their decent russet gowns, came first after the rustic band of music, walking in ranks of three and three, supported by their staves, and regulating the motion of the whole procession by their sober and staid pace. After these fathers of the settlement came Wilkin Flammock, mounted on his mighty war-horse, and in complete armour, save his head, like a vassal prepared to do military service for his lord. After him followed, and in battle rank, the flower of the little colony, consisting of thirty men, well armed and appointed, whose steady march, as well as their clean and glittering armour, showed steadiness and discipline, although they lacked alike the fiery glance of the French soldiery, or the look of dogged defiance which characterized the English, or the wild ecstatic impetuosity of eye which then distinguished the Welsh. The mothers and the maidens of the colony came next; then followed the children, with faces as chubby, and features as serious, and steps as grave, as their parents; and last, as a rearguard, came the youths from fourteen to twenty, armed with light lances, bows, and similar weapons becoming their age.

This procession wheeled around the base of the mound or embankment on which the minstrel was seated; crossed the bridge with the same slow and regular pace, and formed themselves into a double line, facing inwards, as if to receive some person of consequence, or witness some ceremonial. Flammock remained at the extremity of the avenue thus formed by his countrymen, and quietly, yet earnestly engaged in making arrangements and preparations.

In the mean while, stragglers of different countries began to draw together, apparently brought there by mere curiosity, and formed a motley assemblage at the farther end of the bridge, which was that nearest to the castle. Two English peasants passed very near the stone on which Vidal sat.—“Wilt thou sing us a song, minstrel,” said one of them, “and here is a tester for thee?” throwing into his hat a small silver coin.

“I am under a vow,” answered the minstrel, “and may not practise the gay science at present.”

“Or you are too proud to play to English churls,” said the elder peasant, “for thy tongue smacks of the Norman.”

“Keep the coin, nevertheless,” said the younger man. “Let the palmer have what the minstrel refuses to earn.”

“I pray you reserve your bounty, kind friend,” said Vidal, “I need it not;—and tell me of your kindness, instead, what matters are going forward here.”

“Why, know you not that we have got our Constable De Lacy again, and that he is to grant solemn investiture to the Flemish weavers of all these fine things Harry of Anjou has given?—Had Edward the Confessor been alive, to give the Netherland knaves their guerdon, it would have been a cast of the gallows-tree. But come, neighbour, we shall lose the show.”

So saying, they pressed down the hill.

Vidal fixed his eyes on the gates of the distant castle; and the remote waving of banners, and mustering of men on horseback, though imperfectly seen at such a distance, apprised him that one of note was about to set forth at the head of a considerable train of military attendants. Distant flourishes of trumpets, which came faintly yet distinctly on his ear, seemed to attest the same. Presently he perceived, by the dust which began to arise in columns betwixt the castle and the bridge, as well as by the nearer sound of the clarions, that the troop was advancing towards him in procession.

Vidal, on his own part, seemed as if irresolute whether to retain his present position, where he commanded a full but remote view of the whole scene, or to obtain a nearer but more partial one, by involving himself in the crowd which now closed around on either hand of the bridge, unless where the avenue was kept open by the armed and arrayed Flemings.

A monk next hurried past Vidal, and on his inquiring as formerly the cause of the assembly, answered in a muttering tone, from beneath his hood, that it was the Constable De Lacy, who, as the first act of his authority, was then and there to deliver to the Flemings a royal charter of their immunities.

“He is in haste to exercise his authority, methinks,” said the minstrel.

“He that has just gotten a sword is impatient to draw it,” replied the monk, who added more which the minstrel understood imperfectly; for Father Aldrovand had not recovered the injury which he had received during the siege.

Vidal, however, understood him to say, that he was to meet the Constable there, to beg his favourable intercession.

“I also will meet him,” said Renault Vidal, rising suddenly from the stone which he occupied.

“Follow me then,” mumbled the priest; “the Flemings know me, and will let me forward.”

But Father Aldrovand being in disgrace, his influence was not so potent as he had flattered himself; and both he and the minstrel were jostled to and fro in the crowd, and separated from each other.

Vidal, however, was recognised by the English peasants who had before spoke to him. “Canst thou do any jugglers’ feats, minstrel?” said one. “Thou mayst earn a fair largess, for our Norman masters love jonglerie.”

“I know but one,” said Vidal, “and I will show it, if you will yield me some room.”

They crowded a little off from him, and gave him time to throw aside his bonnet, bare his legs and knees, by stripping off the leathern buskins which swathed them, and retaining only his sandals. He then tied a parti-coloured handkerchief around his swarthy and sunburnt hair, and casting off his upper doublet, showed his brawny and nervous arms, naked to the shoulder.

But while he amused those immediately about him, with these preparations, a commotion and rush among the crowd, together with the close sound of trumpets answered by all the Flemish instruments of music, as well as the shouts in Norman and English, of “Long live the gallant Constable!—Our Lady for the Duke De Lacy!” announced that the Constable was close at hand.

Vidal made incredible exertions to approach the leader of the procession, whose morion, distinguished by its lofty plumes, and right hand holding his truncheon or leading-staff, was all he could see, on account of the crowd of officers and armed men around him. At length his exertions prevailed, and he came within three yards of the Constable, who was then in a small circle which had been with difficulty kept clear for the purpose of the ceremonial of the day. His back was towards the minstrel, and he was in the act of bending from his horse to deliver the royal charter to Wilkin Flammock, who had knelt on one knee to receive it the more reverentially. His discharge of this duty occasioned the Constable to stoop so low that his plume seemed in the act of mixing with the flowing mane of his noble charger.

At this moment, Vidal threw himself with singular agility, over the heads of the Flemings who guarded the circle; and, ere an eye could twinkle, his right knee was on the croupe of the Constable’s horse—the grasp of his left hand on the collar of De Lacy’s buff coat; then, clinging to his prey like a tiger after his leap, he drew, in the same instant of time, a short sharp dagger—and buried it in the back of the neck just where the spine, which was severed by the stroke, serves to convey to the trunk of the human body the mysterious influences of the brain. The blow was struck with the utmost accuracy of aim and strength of arm. The unhappy horseman dropped from his saddle, without groan or struggle, like a bull in the amphitheatre, under the steel of the gladiator; and in the same saddle sat his murderer brandishing the bloody poniard, and urging the horse to speed.

There was indeed a possibility of his having achieved his escape, so much were those around paralyzed for the moment by the suddenness and audacity of the enterprise; but Flammock’s presence of mind did not forsake him—he seized the horse by the bridle, and, aided by those who wanted but an example, made the rider prisoner, bound his arms, and called aloud that he must be carried before King Henry. This proposal, uttered in Flammock’s strong and decided tone of voice, silenced a thousand cries of murder and treason which had arisen while the different and hostile natives, of which the crowd was composed, threw upon each other reciprocal the charge of treachery.

All the streams, however, now assembled in one channel, and poured with unanimous assent towards the Garde Doloureuse, excepting a few of the murdered nobleman’s train, who remained to transport their master’s body, in decent solemnity of mourning from the spot which he had sought with so much pomp and triumph.

When Flammock reached the Garde Doloureuse he was readily admitted with his prisoner, and with such witnesses as he had selected to prove the execution of the crime. To his request of an audience he was answered, that the King had commanded that none should be admitted to him for some time; yet singular were the tidings of the Constable’s slaughter: that the captain of the guard ventured to intrude on Henry’s privacy, in order to communicate that crime; and returned with orders that Flammock and his prisoner should be instantly admitted to the royal apartment. Here they found Henry attended by several persons, who stood respectfully behind the royal seat, in a darkened part of the room. When Flammock entered, his large bulk and massive limbs were strangely contrasted with cheeks pale with horror at what he had just witnessed, and with awe at finding himself in the royal presence-chamber. Beside him stood his prisoner, undaunted by the situation in which he was placed. The blood of his victim, which had sprung from the wound, was visible on his bare limbs and his scanty garments, but particularly upon his brow, and the handkerchief with which it was bound.

Henry gazed on him with a stern look, which the other not only endured without dismay, but seemed to return with a frown of defiance.

"Does no one know this castle?" said Henry, looking around him.

There was no immediate answer until Philip Guanine, stepping from the group which stood behind the royal chair, said, though with hesitation, "So please you, my lords, but for the strange guise in which he is now arrayed, I should say there was a household minstrel of my master, by name Renssel Vidal."

"Thou art deceived, Norman," replied the minstrel; "my usual place and bear-heraldage were but assumed—I am Cadwallon the Briton—Cadwallon of the Nine Lays—Cadwallon the chief bard of Gwentwyn of Powys-lead—and his avenger!"

As he uttered the last word, his looks encountered those of a palmer, who had gradually advanced from the recess in which the attendants were stationed, and now confronted him.

The Welshman's eyes looked so eagerly ghastly as if flying from their sockets, while he exclaimed, in a tone of surprise, mingled with horror, "Do the dead come before monarchs? Or, if thou art alive, whom have I slain?—I dreamed not, surely, of that bound, and of that home blow!—yet my victim stands before me! Have I not slain the Constable of Chester?"

"Thou hast indeed slain the Constable," answered the King; "but know, Welshman, it was Randal de Lacy, on whom that charge was this morning conferred, by our belief of our loyal and faithful Hugh de Lacy's having been lost upon his return from the Holy Land, as the vessel in which he had taken passage was reported to have suffered shipwreck. Thou hast cut short Randal's brief elevation but by a few hours, for to-morrow's sun would have again seen him without land or lordship."

The prisoner dropped his head on his bosom in evident despair. "I thought," he murmured, "that he had changed his slough, and come forth as glorious all too soon. May the eyes drop out that were cheated with those baubles, a plumed cap and a lacquered baton!"

"I will take care, Welshman, thine eyes cheat thee not again," said the King, sternly, "before the night is an hour older, they shall be closed on all that is earthly."

"May I request of your nobleness," said the Constable, "that you will permit me to ask the unhappiest man a few questions?"

"When I have demanded of him myself," said the King, "why he has dypt his hand in the blood of a noble Norman."

"Because he at whom I aimed my blow," said the Briton, his eye glancing fiercely from the King to De Lacy, and back, "had spilled the blood of the descendant of a thousand kings; to which his own gore, or thine, proud Count of Agra, is but as the puddle of the highway to the silver fountain."

Henry's eye menaced the audacious speaker; but the King reined in his wrath when he beheld the imploring look of his servant—"What wouldst thou ask of him?" he said; "be brief, for his time is short."

"So please you my lords, I would but demand whencefore he has for years forborne to take the life he owed at when it was in his power—nay, when it must have been lost but for his seemingly faithful service?"

"Norman," said Cadwallon, "I will answer thee. When I first took upon me thy scruple, it was well my purpose to have slain thee that night. There stands the man," pointing to Philip Guanine, "to whose vigilance thou owedst thy safety."

"Indeed," said De Lacy, "I do remember some indications of such a purpose; but why didst thou forego it, when following opportunities put it in thy power?"

"When the slayer of my Northmen became God's soldier," answered Cadwallon, "and served his cause in Palestine, he was safe from my earthly vengeance."

"A wonderful forbearance on the part of a Welsh assassin!" said the King, scornfully.

"Ay," answered Cadwallon, "and which certain Christian princes have scarce attained to, who have never neglected the chance of pillage or conquest afforded by the absence of a rival in the Holy Crusade."

"Now, by the Holy Rood!" said Henry, on the point of bursting out, for the insult affected him peculiarly, but, suddenly stopping, he said, with an air of contempt, "To the gallows with the knave!"

"But one other question," said De Lacy, "Renssel, or by whatever name thou art called! Ever since my return, I have rendered me very inconsistent with this stern resolution upon my life—thou didst aid me in my shipwreck—and didst guide me safely through Wales, where my name would have insured my death—and all this after the crusade was accomplished."

"I would explain thy doubt," said the bard, "but that I might be thought I was pleading for my life."

"Hesitate not for that," said the King; "for were our Holy Father to intercede for thee, his prayer would be vain."

"Well then," said the bard, "know the truth—I was too proud to permit either woe or Welshman to share in my revenge. Know also, what is perhaps Cadwallon's weakness—use and habit had divided my feelings towards De Lacy, between aversion and admiration. I still contemplated my revenge, but as something which I might never complete, and which seemed rather an image in the clouds, than an object in which I must one day draw near. And when I beheld thee," he said, turning to De Lacy, "this very day so determined, so sternly resolved, to bear thy unending fate like a man—that you seemed to me to resemble the last tower of a ruined palace, still holding its head to heaven, when its walls of splendour, and its bowers of delight, lay in desolation around—may I perchance, I said to myself in secret, ere I perfect its ruin! Yes, De Lacy, then, even then, but some hours since—hadst thou accepted my proffered hand, I had served thee as never follower served master. You rejected it with scorn—and yet notwithstanding that insult, it required that I should have seen you, as I thought, trampling over the field in which you slew my master, in the full pride of Norman insolence, to annul my resolution to strike the blow, which meant for you, less than at least one of your unarming race. I will answer no more questions—lead on to age or gallows—it is indifferent to Cadwallon—my soul will exist be with my fire and noble ancestry, and with my beloved and royal patron!"

"My lords and prince," said De Lacy, bending his knee to Henry, "can you hear this, and refuse your ancient servant one request?—Spare this man!—Killing him not merb a light, because it is devious and wild!"

"Nay, nay, De Lacy, and shame thee of thy petition!" said the King. "Thy kinsman's blood—the blood of a noble Norman, is on the Welshman's hands and brow. As I am a crowned King, he shall die ere it is wiped off—Here! have him to punishment!"

Cadwallon was instantly withdrawn under a guard. The Constable moved, by action rather than words, to continue his intercession.

"Thou art mad, De Lacy—thou art mad, mine old and true friend, to urge me thus," said the King, compelling De Lacy to rise. "Hearst thou not that my care in this matter is for thee? This Randal, by largeness and promise, hath made many friends, who will not, perhaps, easily again be brought to your allegiance, returning, as thou dost diminished in power and wealth. Had he lived, we might have had hard work to deprive him entirely of the power which he had acquired. We thank the Welsh assassin who hath rid us of him; but his adherents would only feel they were the murderer spared. When blood is paid for blood, all will be forgotten, and their loyalty will once more flow in its proper channel to thee, their lawful lord."

Hugo de Lacy arose from his knees, and endeavoured respectfully to combat the politic reasons of his only sovereign, which he plainly saw were resorted to him for his sake than with the prudent purpose of effecting the change of feudal authority, with the least possible trouble to the country or Sovereign.

Henry listened to De Lacy's arguments patiently, and combated them with temper, until the death-drum began to beat, and the castle bell to toll. He then led De Lacy to the window; on which, for it was now dark, a strong ruddy light began to gleam from without. A body of men-at-arms, each holding in his hand a blazing torch, were returning along the terrace from the execution of the wild but high-spirited Briton, with cries of "Long live King Henry; and so perish all enemies of the gentle Norman men!"

CONCLUSION.

A day hath set, a day hath risen,
O Jerusalem! once more of thine
Have been the lovely lady's prison.

CONTINUÉ.

Portia's fame had arrived in accordance to Eveline's thoughts, after the capture of her castle, any confinement more severe than that of her aunt the Lady Abbess of the Cistercians' convent afforded. Yet that was severe enough, for maiden aunts, whether abbesses or no, are not tolerant of the species of errors of which Eveline was accused, and the innocent damsel was brought in many ways to eat her bread in shame of countenance and bitterness of heart. Every day of her confinement was rendered less and less endurable by taunts in the various forms of sympathy, consolation, and exhortation, but which, stripped of their assumed forms, were undisguised anger and insult. The company of Rose was all which Eveline had to sustain her under these afflictions, and that was at length withdrawn on the very morning when so many important events took place at the Garde Doloureuse.

The unfortunate young lady inquired in vain of a grim-faced nun, who appeared in Rose's place to assist her to dress, why her compassion and friend was deferred attendance. The nun observed on that score an obstinate silence, but threw out many hints on the importance attached to the vain ornaments of a frail child of clay, and on the hardship that even a sparrow of Heaven was compelled to divert her thoughts from her higher duties, and condescend to loose clasps and adjust veils.

The Lady Abbess, however, told her niece after matins, that her attendant had not been withdrawn from her for a space only, but was likely to be shut up in a house of the severest profession, for having afforded her maternal assistance in receiving Damian de Lacy into her sleeping apartment at the castle of Hildringham.

A soldier of St. Lacy's band, who had hitherto kept what he had observed a secret, being off his post that night, had now in Damian's disgrace found he might benefit himself by telling the story. Thus new blow, so unexpected, so effective—this new charge, which it was so difficult to explain, and so impossible utterly to deny, seemed to Eveline to seal Damian's fate and her own, while the thought that she had involved in ruin her single-hearted and high-spirited attendant was all that had been wanting to produce a state which approached in the apathy of despair. "Think of me what you will," she said to herself; "I will no longer defend myself—say what you will, I will no longer reply—sorrow me when you will, I will no longer resist. God will, in his good time, set at my fame—may he forgive my persecutors."

After this and during several hours of that unhappy day, the Lady Eveline, pale, cold, silent, glided from chapel to refectory, from refectory to chapel again, at the slightest beck of the Abbess or her official sisters, and seemed to regard the various prison-house, penance, admonitions, and reprobations, of which she, in the course of that day, was subjected to an extraordinary share, no more than a marble statue nudes the touch-money of the external air, or the rain-drops which lay upon it, though they must in time waste and consume it.

The Abbess, who loved her niece, although in affection showed itself often in a vacillating manner, became at length alarmed—countermanded her own for removing Eveline to an inferior cell—ordered herself to see her laid in bed, in which, as a very thing else, the young lady seemed entirely passive, and, with something like reviving indifference, laid and bided her on leaving the apartment. Still the mark of kindness was, it was unexpected, and like the rod of Moses, opened the hidden fountain of waters. Eveline wept, a resource which had that day denied to her—she prayed—and, finally, she had herself to sleep, like an infant, with a mind somewhat tranquilized by having given way to the tide of natural emotion.

She awoke more than once in the night to real mingled and gloomy dreams of cells and of crosses, of funerals and of bridals, of coronets and of racks, gibbets, but towards morning she fell into deep unconsciousness, and she had hitherto enjoyed, and her more particular of its soothing character. The Lady of the Garde Doloureuse seemed to smile on her and to dream, and to promise her vigorous protection. The shade of her father was there also, and with the loss of a dreamer, she saw the paternal remembrance with awe, but without fear; his lips moved, and she heard words—their import she did not fully comprehend, save that they spoke of hope, consolation, and approaching happiness. There also glided in, a bright blue-eyed figure, dressed in a white and saffron coloured silk, with a mantle of crimson of antique fashion, the form of a female, representing that delicate species of beauty which attends the fairest complexion. It was, she thought, the British Vanda; but her countenance was no longer radiant—her long yellow hair flew not loose on her shoulders but was mysteriously braided with oak and rose above all, her right hand was gracefully directed under her mantle, and it was an unarticulated, knotted, and beautifully formed hand which came to brow of Eveline. Yet, under those assurances of favour, a thrill of fear passed over her as the voice seemed to repeat, or chant,

"Woe is mine, and woe is mine,
Sorrowed, betrayed, and betrayed,
All is done that has been said!
Vanda's wrong has been yonder—
Take her pardon by this token."

She bent down, as if to kiss Eveline, who started at that instant, and then awoke. Her hand was gently pressed, by one as pure and white as her own. The blue eyes and fair hair of a lovely female lay with half veiled bosom and dishevelled locks, through her vision, and indeed its lips approached to those of the lovely sleeper at the moment of her awakening; but it was Rose in whose arms her senses found herself pressed, and who presented her face with tears, as in a passion of affection she gazed at her niece.

"What means this, Rose?" said Eveline, "and God, you are restored to me!—But what are the bursts of weeping?"

"Let me weep—let me weep," said Rose; "it is long since I have wept for joy, and long I must be ere I again weep for sorrow. News are come on the spur from the Garde Doloureuse—Anselm brought them—he is at liberty—so is his master, so in high favour with Henry. Hear yet more, but me not tell it too hastily—You grow pale."

"No, no," said Eveline, "go on—go on—I shall understand you—I think I do."

"The villain Randal de Lacy, the master-mind of our sorrow, will plague you no more; he was sent by a knight of Melchus, and groined as I that we have changed the poor man for his good name. Above all, the old Constable is himself returned from Palestine, as worthy, and somewhat wiser, he was, for it is thought he will renounce his career with your ladyship."

"Silly girl," said Eveline, embracing her tight

she had been before pale, "jest not amidst such a tale.—But can this be reality?—Is Randal indeed slain?—and the Constable returned?"

These were hasty and hurried questions, answered as hastily and confusedly, and broken with ejaculations of surprise and thanks to Heaven, and to Our Lady, until the ecstasy of delight sobered down into a sort of tranquil wonder.

Mean while Damian Lacy also had his explanations to receive, and the mode in which they were conveyed had something remarkable. Damian had for some time been an inhabitant of what our age would have termed a dungeon, but which, in the ancient days, they called a prison. We are perhaps censurable in making the dwelling and the food of acknowledged and convicted guilt more comfortable and palatable than what the parties could have gained by any exertions when at large, and supporting themselves by honest labour; but this is a venial error compared to that of our ancestors, who, considering a charge and a conviction as synonymous, treated the accused before sentence in a manner which would have been of itself a severe punishment after he was found guilty. Damian, therefore, notwithstanding his high birth and distinguished rank, was confined after the manner of the most atrocious criminal, was heavily fettered, fed on the coarsest food, and experienced only this alleviation, that he was permitted to indulge his misery in a solitary and separate cell, the wretched furniture of which was a mean bedstead, and a broken table and chair. A coffin—and his own arms and initials were painted upon it—stood in one corner, to remind him of his approaching fate; and a crucifix was placed in another, to intimate to him that there was a world beyond that which must soon close upon him. No noise could penetrate into the iron silence of his prison—no rumour, either touching his own fate or that of his friends. Charged with being taken in open arms against the King, he was subject to military law, and to be put to death even without the formality of a hearing; and he foresaw no milder conclusion to his imprisonment.

This melancholy dwelling had been the abode of Damian for nearly a month, when strange as it may seem, his health, which had suffered much from his wounds, began gradually to improve, either benefited by the abstemious diet to which he was reduced, or that certainty, however melancholy, is an evil better endured by many constitutions than the feverish contrast betwixt passion and duty. But the term of his imprisonment seemed drawing speedily to a close; his jailer, a sullen Saxon of the lowest order, in more words than he had yet used to him, warned him to look to a speedy change of dwelling; and the tone in which he spoke convinced the prisoner there was no time to be lost. He demanded a confessor, and the jailer, though he withdrew without reply, seemed to intimate by his manner that the boon would be granted.

Next morning at an unusually early hour, the chains and bolts of the cell were heard to clash and groan, and Damian was startled from a broken sleep, which he had not enjoyed for above two hours. His eyes were bent on the slowly opening door, as if he had expected the headsman and his assistants; but the jailer ushered in a stout man in a pilgrim's habit.

"Is it a priest whom you bring me, warden?" said the unhappy prisoner.

"He can best answer the question himself," said the surly official, and presently withdrew.

The pilgrim remained standing on the floor, with his back to the small window, or rather loophole, by which the cell was imperfectly lighted, and gazed intently upon Damian, who was seated on the side of his bed; his pale cheek and dishevelled hair bearing a melancholy correspondence to his heavy irons. He returned the pilgrim's gaze, but the imperfect light only showed him that his visitor was a stout old man, who wore the scallop-shell on his bonnet, as a token that he had passed the sea, and carried a palm branch in his hand, to show he had visited the Holy Land.

"Benedicite, reverend father," said the unhappy young man; "are you a priest come to unburden my conscience?"

"I am not a priest," replied the Palmer, "but one who brings you news of discomfort."

"You bring them to one to whom comfort has been long a stranger, and to a place which perchance never knew it," replied Damian.

"I may be the bolder in my communication," said the Palmer; "those in sorrow will better hear ill news than those whom they surprise in the possession of content and happiness."

"Yet even the situation of the wretched," said Damian, "can be rendered more wretched by suspense. I pray you, reverend sir, to speak the worst at once—If you come to announce the doom of this poor frame, may God be gracious to the spirit which must be violently dismissed from it!"

"I have no such charge," said the Palmer.—"I come from the Holy Land, and have the more grief in finding you thus, because my message to you was one addressed to a free man, and a wealthy one."

"For my freedom," said Damian, "let these fetters speak, and this apartment for my wealth.—But speak out thy news—should my uncle, for I fear thy tale regards him, want either my arm or my fortune, this dungeon and my degradation have further pangs than I had yet supposed, as they render me unable to aid him."

"Your uncle, young man," said the Palmer, "is prisoner, I should rather say slave, to the great Soldan, taken in a battle in which he did his duty, though unable to avert the defeat of the Christians, with which it was concluded. He was made prisoner while covering the retreat, but not until he had slain with his own hand, for his misfortune as it has proved, Hassan Ali, a favourite of the Soldan. The cruel pagan has caused the worthy knight to be loaded with irons heavier than those you wear, and the dungeon to which he is confined would make this seem a palace. The infidel's first resolution was to put the valiant Constable to the most dreadful death which his tormentors could devise. But fame told him that Hugo de Lacy was a man of great power and wealth; and he has demanded a ransom of ten thousand bezants of gold. Your uncle replied that the payment would totally impoverish him, and oblige him to dispose of his whole estates; even then he pleaded, time must be allowed him to convert them into money. The Soldan replied, that it imported little to him whether a hound like the Constable were fat or lean, and that he therefore insisted upon the full amount of the ransom. But he so far relaxed as to make it payable in three portions, on condition that, along with the first portion of the price, the nearest of kin and heir of De Lacy must be placed in his hands as a hostage for what remained due. On these conditions he consented your uncle should be put at liberty so soon as you arrive in Palestine with the gold."

"Now may I indeed call myself unhappy," said Damian "that I cannot show my love and duty to my noble uncle, who hath ever been a father to me in my orphan state."

"It will be a heavy disappointment, doubtless, to the Constable," said the Palmer, "because he was eager to return to this happy country, to fulfil a contract of marriage which he had formed with a lady of great beauty and fortune."

Damian shrunk together in such sort that his fetters clashed, but he made no answer.

"Were he not your uncle," continued the Pilgrim, "and well known as a wise man, I should think he is not quite prudent in this matter. Whatever he was before he left England, two summers spent in the wars of Palestine, and another amid the tortures and restraints of a heathen prison, have made him a sorry bridegroom."

"Peace, pilgrim," said De Lacy, with a commanding tone. "It is not thy part to censure such a noble knight as my uncle, nor is it meet that I should listen to your strictures."

"I crave your pardon, young man," said the Palmer. "I spoke not without some view to your interest, which, methinks, does not so well consort with thine uncle having an heir of his body."

"Peace, base man!" said Damian. "By Heaven, I think worse of my cell than I did before, since its doors opened to such a counsellor, and of my chains, since they restrain me from chastising him.—Depart, I pray thee."

"Not till I have your answer for your uncle," answered the Palmer. "My age scorns the anger of thy youth, as the rock despises the foam of the rivulet dashed against it."

"Then, say to my uncle," answered Damian, "I am a prisoner, or I would have come to him—I am a confiscated beggar, or I would have sent him my all."

"Such virtuous purposes are easily and boldly announced," said the Palmer, "when he who speaks them knows that he cannot be called upon to make good the boast of his tongue. But could I tell thee of thy restoration to freedom and wealth, I trow thou wouldst consider twice ere thy act confirmed the sacrifice thou hast in thy present state promised so glibly."

"Leave me, I prithee, old man," said Damian; "thy thought cannot comprehend the tenor of mine—go, and add not to my distress insults which I have not the means to avenge."

"But what if I had it in my power to place thee in the situation of a free and wealthy man, would it please thee then to be reminded of thy present boast? for if not, thou mayst rely on my discretion never to mention the difference of sentiment between Damian bound and Damian at liberty."

"How meanest thou?—or hast thou any meaning, save to torment me?" said the youth.

"Not so," replied the old Palmer, plucking from his bosom a parchment scroll to which a heavy seal was attached.—"Know that thy cousin Randal hath been strangely slain, and his treacheries towards the Constable and thee as strangely discovered. The King, in requital of thy sufferings, hath sent thee this full pardon, and endowed thee with a third part of those ample estates, which, by his death, revert to the crown."

"And hath the King also restored my freedom and my right of blood?" exclaimed Damian.

"From this moment, forthwith," said the Palmer—"look upon the parchment—behold the royal hand and seal."

"I must have better proof.—Here," he exclaimed, loudly clashing his irons at the same time, "Here, thou Dogget—warder, son of a Saxon wolf-hound!"

The Palmer, striking on the door, seconded the previous exertions for summoning the jailer, who entered accordingly.

"Warder," said Damian de Lacy, in a stern tone, "am I yet thy prisoner, or no?"

The sullen jailer consulted the Palmer by a look, and then answered to Damian that he was a free man.

"Then, death of thy heart, slave," said Damian, impatiently, "why hang these fetters on the free limbs of a Norman noble? each moment they confine him are worth a lifetime of bondage to such a scurf as thou!"

"They are soon rid of, Sir Damian," said the man; "and I pray you to take some patience, when you remember that ten minutes since you had little right to think these bracelets would have been removed for any other purpose than your progress to the scaffold."

"Peace, ban-dog," said Damian, "and be speedy!—And thou, who hast brought me these good tidings, I forgive thy former bearing—thou thoughtest, doubtless, that it was prudent to extort from me professions during my bondage which might in honour decide my conduct when at large. The suspicion inferred in it somewhat offensive, but thy motive was to ensure my uncle's liberty."

"And is it really your purpose," said the Palmer, "to employ your newly-gained freedom in a voyage to Syria, and to exchange your English prison for the dungeon of the Soldan?"

"If thou thyself wilt act as my guide," answered the undaunted youth, "you shall not say I dally by the way."

"And the ransom," said the Palmer, "how is that to be provided?"

"How, but from the estates, which, nominally restored to me, remain in truth and justice my uncle's, and must be applied to his use in the first instance? If I mistake not greatly, there is not a Jew or Lombard who would not advance the necessary sums on such security.—Therefore, dog," he continued, addressing the jailer, "hasten thy unclenching and undoing of rivets, and be not dainty of giving me a little pain, so thou break no limb, for I cannot afford to be stayed on my journey."

The Palmer looked on a little while, as if surprised at Damian's determination, then exclaimed, "I can keep the old man's secret no longer—such high-souled generosity must not be sacrificed.—Hark thee, brave Sir Damian, I have a mighty secret still to impart, and as this Saxon churl understands no French, this is no unfit opportunity to communicate it. Know that thine uncle is a changed man in mind, as he is debilitated and broken down in body. Peevishness and jealousy have possessed themselves of a heart which was once strong and generous; his life is now on the dregs, and, I grieve to speak it, these dregs are foul and bitter."

"Is this thy mighty secret?" said Damian. "That men grow old, I know; and if with infirmity of body comes infirmity of temper and mind, their case the more strongly claims the dutiful observance of those who are bound to them in blood or affection."

"Ay," replied the Pilgrim, "but the Constable's mind has been poisoned against thee by rumours which have reached his ear from England, that there have been thoughts of affection betwixt thee and his betrothed bride, Eveline Berenger.—Ha! have I touched you now?"

"Not a whit," said Damian, putting on the strongest resolution with which his virtue could supply him—"it was but this fellow who struck my shin-bone somewhat sharply with his hammer. Proceed. My uncle heard such a report, and believed it?"

"He did," said the Palmer—"I can well aver, since he concealed no thought from me. But he prayed me carefully to hide his suspicions from you, otherwise," said he, "the young wolf-cub will never thrust himself into the trap for the deliverance of the old he-wolf. Were he once in my prison-house, your uncle continued to speak of you, 'he should not and die ere I sent one penny of ransom to set at liberty the lover of my betrothed bride.'"

"Could this be my uncle's sincere purpose?" said Damian, all aghast. "Could he plan so much treachery towards me as to leave me in the captivity into which I threw myself for his redemption?—That I cannot be."

"Flatter not yourself with such a vain opinion," said the Palmer—"if you go to Syria, you go to eternal captivity, while your uncle returns to possession of wealth little diminished—and of Eveline Berenger."

"Ha!" ejaculated Damian; and, looking down for an instant, demanded of the Palmer, in a subdued voice, what he would have him to do in such an extremity.

"The case is plain, according to my poor judgment," replied the Palmer. "No one is bound to faith with those who mean to observe none with him. Anticipate this treachery of your uncle, and let his now short and infirm existence moulder out in the pestiferous cell to which he would condemn your youthful strength. The royal grant has assigned you land enough for your honourable support; and whereas not unite with them those of the Garde Doloureuse—Eveline Berenger, if I do not greatly mistake, will scarcely say nay. Ay, more—I vouch it on my soul that she will say yes, for I have sure information of her mind; and for her pre-contract, a word from Henry to his holiness, now that they are in the way day of their reconciliation, will obliterate the name Hugh from the parchment, and insert Damian in its stead."

"Now, by my faith," said Damian, arising and placing his foot upon the stool, that the warder might more easily strike off the last ring by which he was encumbered,—“I have heard of such things as ve heard of beings who, with seeming grandeur and aspect—with subtle counsels, arted to the frailties of human nature—have the cells of despairing men, and made them swear promise, if they would but exchange for ways the paths of salvation. Such are the arrest agents, and in such a guise hath the self been known to appear. In the name of man, if human thou art, begone!—I like not thy presence—I spit at thy counsels. “Kiss me,” he added, with a menacing gesture, “thy own safety—I shall presently be at replied the Palmer, folding his arms consily in his cloak, “I scorn thy menaces—I will not till we know each other better.”

“said Damian, “would fain know whether thou art man or fiend; and now for the trial.” As the last shackle fell from his leg, and clashed on the pavement, and at the same moment he saw the Palmer, caught him by the waist, and as he made three distinct and desperate attempts to lift him up and dash him headlong to the ground. This for maligning a nobleman—this for the honour of a knight—and this (with a yet more exertion) for belying a lady!”

Fort of Damian seemed equal to have rooted him; yet though they staggered the old man, he threw him not; and while Damian panted from last exertion, he replied, “And take thou care so roughly entreating thy father’s bro-spoke, Damian de Lacy, the best youthful knight in Cheshire, received no soft fall on the ground of the dungeon. He arose slowly and astounded; the Palmer had now thrown back both hood and mantle, and the features, though bearing marks of a hard climate, were those of his uncle the Constable. He calmly observed, “I think, Damian, thou art stronger, or I weaker, since my breast was pressed against yours in our country’s celebrated tournament. Thou hadst nigh had me down in that last trial that I knew the old De Lacy’s back-trip as thou.—But wherefore kneel, man?” He raised his hand much kindness, kissed his cheek, and proposed, “Think not, my dearest nephew, that I will use my late disguise to try your faith, which I have ever doubted. But evil tongues had been saying it was this which made me resolve on an attack, the result of which has been, as I expect, honourable for you. And know, (for these are sometimes ears, even according to the proverb, there are ears and eyes not far distant which heard and seen the whole. Marry, I wish, my last hug had not been so severe a one. I will feel the impression of thy knuckles.” “I am thy first and honoured uncle,” said Damian, “ex-

“is nothing to excuse,” replied his uncle, “I forgive him. “Have we not wrestled a turn or two?—But there remains yet one trial for thee to go through—Get thee out of this hole speedily, and make the best array to accompany me to the church for, Damian, thou must be present at the wedding of the Lady Eveline Berenger.”

proposal at once struck to the earth the unwilling man. “For mercy’s sake,” he exclaimed, “I am excused in this, my gracious uncle!—I am of late severely wounded, and am very “bones can testify,”—said his uncle. “Why, then, hast thou the strength of a Norway bear?” “No,” answered Damian, “might give me strength for a moment; but, dearest uncle, ask any other knight rather than this. Methinks, if I have any other punishment might suffice.” “Hee,” said the Constable, “thy presence is necessary—indispensably necessary. Strange reports have been abroad, which thy absence on this occasion would go far to confirm. Eveline’s character and mine own are concerned in this.”

“If so,” said Damian, “if it be indeed so, no task will be too hard for me. But I trust, when the ceremony is over, you will not refuse me your consent to take the cross, unless you should prefer my joining the troops destined, as I heard, for the conquest of Ireland.”

“Ay, ay,” said the Constable; “if Eveline grant you permission, I will not withhold mine.”

“Uncle,” said Damian, somewhat sternly, “you do not know the feelings which you jest with.”

“Nay,” said the Constable, “I compel nothing; for if thou goest to the church, and likest not the match, thou may’st put a stop to it if thou wilt—the sacrament cannot proceed without the bridegroom’s consent.”

“I understand you not, uncle,” said Damian; “you have already consented.”

“Yes, Damian,” he said, “I have—to withdraw my claim, and to relinquish it in thy favour; for if Eveline Berenger is wedded to-day, thou art her bridegroom! The Church has given her sanction—the King his approbation—the lady says not nay—and the question only now remains, whether the bridegroom will say yes.”

The nature of the answer may be easily conceived; nor is it necessary to dwell upon the splendour of the ceremonial, which, to atone for his late unmerited severity, Henry honoured with his own presence. Amelot and Rose were shortly afterwards united, old Flammoek having been previously created a gentleman of coat armour, that the gentle Norman blood might, without utter derogation, mingle with the meaner stream which coloured the cheek in crimson, and meandered in azure over the lovely neck and bosom of the fair Fleming. There was nothing in the manner of the Constable towards his nephew and his bride, which could infer a regret of the generous self-denial which he had exercised in favour of their youthful passion. But he soon after accepted a high command in the troops destined to invade Ireland; and his name is found among the highest in the roll of the chivalrous Normans who first united that fair island to the English crown.

Eveline, restored to her own fair castle and domains, failed not to provide for her confessor, as well as for her old soldiers, servants, and retainers, forgetting their errors, and remembering their fidelity. The Confessor was restored to the flesh-pots of Egypt, more congenial to his habits than the meager fare of his convent. Even Gillian had the means of subsistence, since to punish her would have been to distress the faithful Raoul. They quarrelled for the future part of their lives in plenty, just as they had formerly quarrelled in poverty; for wrangling curs will fight over a banquet as fiercely as over a bare bone. Raoul died first, and Gillian having lost her whetstone, found that as her youthful looks decayed her wit turned somewhat blunt. She therefore prudently commenced devotee, and spent hours in long panegyrics on her departed husband.

The only serious cause of vexation which I can trace the Lady Eveline having been tried with, arose from a visit of her Saxon relative, made with much form, but, unfortunately, at the very time which the Lady Abbess had selected for that same purpose. The discord which arose between these honoured personages was of a double character, for they were Norman and Saxon, and, moreover, differed in opinion concerning the time of holding Easter. This, however, was but a slight gale to disturb the general serenity of Eveline; for with her unhopd-for union with Damian, ended the trials and sorrows of THE BETROTHED.
